Pikayev expressed deep doubt that any Russian organization was behind Litvinenko's death — which he said could only hurt Putin's reputation — and suggested that if a Russian intelligence agency had wanted to kill him, it would have been foolish to use polonium because its source could probably be traced.

"If any Russian special services were behind it, it was not a good idea to use this polonium, because they could find its origin," he told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

Slivyak also said British authorities might have a good chance of determining where the polonium was produced. However, he argued that the information would be far short of proof of a plot in the country of origin because the substance could have been acquired on the black market.

"To say precisely after this that a concrete intelligence agency or government is involved would be difficult," he said.

If Russia's Federal Security Service, or FSB, wanted to use polonium to kill somebody, "from the point of the view of the FSB it would be better not to bring it from Russia but to buy it on the black market in Europe" in order to avoid leaving a trail, Slivyak said.

"Even if it was produced in a Russian laboratory, and even if this is documented, anyway it will be possible to say that this is not true, it's a falsification, or to say, 'We don't know, one gram was lost 10 years ago and we're not to blame,'" he said. "And in any case nobody from abroad will be allowed into the laboratory to check, because they'll say it's a closed enterprise, it's related to defense or to the space program."

Conversely, he said, a country of origin other than Russia would not rule out Russian involvement.

A senior Putin aide suggested Friday that Litvinenko's killing was part of a campaign to discredit Russia and its president, and Russian lawmakers and state-run television networks pointed the finger at Berezovsky, a more prominent associate of Litvinenko who provided financing for a book detailing allegations that the FSB was behind deadly 1999 apartment-building bombings that stoked popular support for a new war in Chechnya.

The government newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta added to the speculation that Berezovsky was involved, running an article whose sub-headline read: "Theories about the former FSB colonel's death are in one way or another linked with Berezovsky."

Among other scenarios, the article included speculation that Berezovsky could have had Litvinenko killed and "masked the crime to bring suspicion on the FSB" or that associates of Berezovsky could have had Litvinenko killed as a warning to the tycoon over a business dispute.

It portrayed Litvinenko — a former FSB agent who publicly accused his superiors of ordering him to kill Berezovsky and later fled to Britain — as a violent and unintelligent pawn who "made his choice and drank his poison ... when he betrayed those he worked for."

Television networks had few reports Saturday on Litvinenko's death, but a news announcer on state-run Channel One singled out what she said was "a theory (that) Litvinenko poisoned himself."

Protestant Militant Charged In Belfast Attack (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Nov. 25 — A Protestant militant was charged with attempted murder on Saturday, a day after being arrested in an attempt to attack Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, leaders of the main Roman Catholic party Sinn Fein, as they and other legislators worked toward a power-sharing agreement to restore local rule to Northern Ireland.

The militant, Michael Stone, who was released from prison six years ago after serving time for some of the most high-profile sectarian killings at the height of Northern Ireland's conflict, was stopped at the main entrance to the provincial assembly, carrying an imitation gun and a bag of homemade pipe bombs.

As Mr. Stone shouted Protestant militant slogans, he was disarmed in a struggle with security guards at the revolving doors leading to the lobby and was later led away by two police officers.

On Saturday, Mr. Stone, 51, was charged with five counts of attempted murder and possession of articles for terrorist purposes, including nail bombs, an ax and a garrote. He was also charged with possessing explosives with intent to endanger life and possessing an imitation firearm.

The attack disrupted an assembly of Northern Ireland politicians, including the Sinn Fein leaders Mr. Adams and Mr. McGuinness, who had met with Protestant politicians to discuss proposals to restore a power-sharing local government for the province. The debating chamber is close to the main lobby of the assembly buildings.

The meeting itself was a failure before the attack, as Rev. Ian Paisley, a Protestant leader, declined to nominate himself to be first minister, a post in which he would have served with Mr. McGuinness. That failure technically broke a deadline set by the British and Irish governments to organize a new power-sharing government. Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain has said that the overall goal of putting a government in place by next March still stands.

Mr. Stone became an iconic figure for Protestant militants when he killed three mourners in an attack on an Irish Republican Army funeral in Belfast in 1988, as Sinn Fein leaders, including Mr. Adams and Mr. Guinness, stood by the grave.

Ecuador's Path And Alliances At Stake In Runoff Election (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Nov. 25 — No one can accuse Ecuador, which will elect its eighth president in 10 years on Sunday, of dull politics.

Rafael Correa, a candidate in Sunday's runoff, strums a guitar before audiences between promises to whip Ecuador's political elite with his belt and shut the last American military base in South America. He chastises the Bush administration in the polished English he learned while earning a doctorate in economics at the University of Illinois.

Álvaro Noboa, his rival, is a billionaire who hands out free computers and fistfuls of dollars at his rallies. Mr. Noboa, a banana tycoon who is Ecuador's richest man, dropped to his knees this month at a campaign stop to ask for votes as a self-described "messiah of the poor."

But the contest is far more than entertaining; the outcome could actually redraw power relations in Latin America.

Mr. Noboa, 56, surprised analysts by winning the first round of voting in October and maintaining a double-digit lead for much of the past month. A victory by Mr. Noboa, who has failed in two other campaigns for the presidency, would align Ecuador, an oil-exporting country of 13 million people, with Andean countries like Colombia and Peru that have strengthened ties with the United States.

By law here, the results of opinion polls may not be published in the 20 days before an election, and in recent days, each candidate has claimed a wide lead. However, the results of polls conducted in part for foreign banks were exchanged by e-mail throughout the country, creating a rift of information between those with Internet access and those without.

One such poll, by Cedatos-Gallup and released Friday for clients of the investment bank Credit Suisse, showed that among those who plan to cast a vote for one of the candidates, Mr. Correa had the support of 52 percent against 48 percent for Mr. Noboa. The poll has a margin of error of three percentage points, essentially putting the candidates in a statistical tie. Though polls are often unreliable in Ecuador, the results put financial markets on edge with investors selling off Ecuadorean bonds in New York on Friday.

Ramiro Crespo, president of Analytica Securities, a Quito investment bank, said he was so fed up with Ecuador's recent history of political instability that he would declare his vote null. (Voting is obligatory in Ecuador.)

"I'm tired of choosing the lesser evil," he said, adding, "Correa is a sophisticated academic who sees economics in the abstract, but he has never had to make a payroll each Friday, let alone run a country."

Mr. Correa, 43, has moderated his radical talk somewhat in recent weeks, meeting with the American ambassador in Quito and saying his harsh comments about President Bush were "imprudent." But he still says he would renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt and opposes renewing an agreement that allows the United States military to operate from Manta, a port city on the Pacific coast.

Most controversially, Mr. Correa also boasts of his friendship with President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, who would be glad to fold Ecuador into an anti-American alliance that now includes Bolivia and Cuba.

Mr. Chávez had been unusually quiet about Ecuador's presidential race, perhaps stung by the recent defeats of candidates with perceived ties to Venezuela in Peru and Mexico, but he broke that silence this month in a news conference with foreign journalists in Caracas, describing Mr. Noboa as "the banana king who exploits his workers and exploits children and puts them to work."

Mr. Noboa denies that children have worked in banana plantations connected to his company, though Human Rights Watch in 2002 documented cases of children in such circumstances working in plantations that supplied his company.

Sometimes appearing in public with a large crucifix around his neck, Mr. Noboa has repeatedly called Mr. Correa a "communist devil" and "colonel," an allusion to his admiration of the militaristic Mr. Chávez.

"Noboa has been a pure demagogue with promises that are impossible to fulfill, like building 300,000 houses, curing the sick, cutting electricity costs in half," said Fernando Santos, a political analyst and former energy minister.

Still, Mr. Noboa also grew more moderate in recent days, saying he would not cut diplomatic ties with Venezuela and Cuba as he had earlier pledged.

The winner, who will serve a four-year term, will face a fractious and powerful congress, one of the biggest impediments to presidents finishing their terms in Ecuador, though Mr. Correa would be in a weaker position than Mr. Noboa, who has a stronger congressional base.

Some analysts fear that Mr. Noboa, already a towering business figure who controls more than 100 companies, would use the presidency to advance his economic interests, concerns echoed by Mr. Correa's frequent contention that his opponent would rule the country like a "banana plantation."

In Ecuadoran Vote, Rhetoric Gives Way To Popular Pledges (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, November 26, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador, Nov. 25 -- No matter who wins Ecuador's presidential election on Sunday, many outside the country will view it as a decision between dueling political stereotypes: Venezuelan President Hugo ChÃ¡vez's dream of a unified region liberated from U.S. influence, or that of free-market backers embracing a globalized economy.

For most who will actually make the choice, it's nothing of the sort.

Public opinion polls show leftist economist Rafael Correa and banana tycoon Alvaro Noboa locked in a near dead heat, and in recent weeks broad ideological rhetoric has given way to specific promises of concrete and cash. Each candidate has tried to one-up the other with vows of massive government housing projects, new jobs and low-interest loans.

In a country where no president has served a full term in more than a decade, voters want to see some tangible results from their next leader, and it matters little what overarching political philosophy stands behind his pledges.

The campaign since last month's first-round election has been bitterly divisive, with repeated allegations of electoral fraud, increasing the possibility that either candidate would face a rough honeymoon. Throw in serious doubts about the pre-election promises -- some are simply unfeasible, according to analysts -- and many fear that the election will do little to ease Ecuador's chronic political instability.

"It doesn't matter which of the two candidates wins, Ecuador will have a weak president, at the mercy of the Congress and facing difficulties of governability," said AdriÃ¡n Bonilla, director of the Latin American Faculty of Social Sciences in Quito.

In last month's election, Noboa got 26.8 percent of the vote to edge out Correa by four percentage points. The latest polls give Correa a slight edge, though few political observers put much faith in them; the same polls had predicted that Correa would finish ahead of Noboa in the first round.

Correa, 43, a charismatic economist who received his doctorate at the University of Illinois, spent the early stages of his campaign promising to kill a proposed free-trade agreement with the United States, close a U.S. military base used for anti-drug operations and default on the nation's foreign debt so that social spending could be increased. He has also vowed to revamp Ecuador's political system by disbanding Congress and convening a constituent assembly in its place.

But after the first round, Correa retooled his campaign to focus on specific domestic spending programs, such as housing grants and microcredits for the poor. Though he has never backed away from his belief that globalization works against small countries like Ecuador, he spoke little of his broad economic theories or of his more controversial plans, such as the constituent assembly.

"I think he got some people a little nervous in Ecuador, which is why he didn't do as well in the first round as many expected," said Michael Shifter, an analyst with Inter-American Dialogue, a policy forum in Washington. "Now he's trying to moderate and tone down his rhetoric. I suspect this also reflects a realization that some of these proposals just aren't going to be politically palatable, both in Ecuador and internationally."

Unlike ChÃ¡vez, whom he considers a friend, Correa would not have the benefit of plentiful oil revenue to help underwrite his policy initiatives. And while some of his proposals are similar to those of Bolivian President Evo Morales, Correa has neither the popular support that gave Morales a comfortable first-round election victory last year nor a political party to back him in Congress. Correa's proposed constituent assembly thus could be difficult to achieve.

"If he takes it to the people and gets popular backing for an assembly, then Congress won't be a problem," said Orazio J. Bellettini, executive director of Faro Group, a political policy group in Quito that promotes governmental transparency. "But the second scenario is that the people don't support it overwhelmingly, and then he would face a very strong crisis, standing on his own with no Congress members."

Difficulties with Congress have contributed to the early downfalls of several Ecuadoran presidents, including Lucio GutiÃ©rrez, who was ousted last year after the legislature accused him of abandoning his post.

Correa paints Noboa -- Ecuador's richest man -- as the face of an oligarchy that he says has corrupted the highest reaches of government. Noboa owns more than 110 businesses, including one of the world's largest banana exporting companies, which he inherited from his father. Correa has repeatedly told his followers to suspect fraud if Noboa wins on Sunday.

"There is no place for indecision," Correa said at a rally Friday. "The decision is between being patriotic or becoming the plantation of the richest and most conceited heir in this country."

Noboa, 56, is an old-fashioned populist who dropped to his knees during stump speeches, holding a Bible in his hands and saying he was sent by God to help rid the world of communism. He tells voters that God gave him riches to share with them, often passing out T-shirts, wheelchairs and other gifts at public appearances. He favors free trade and says he will work to encourage foreign investment, but the cornerstones of his campaign are promises of more jobs and government housing. He has vowed to build 300,000 homes each year, or 1.2 million over a four-year term -- a huge number, considering there were 6.6 million voters in the first-round election.

"In my 15 years of working with him, I know that no one cares more about this country and no one has more to lose if the country collapses than does Alvaro," said Bernardo Manzano, director general of the Noboa company that exports millions of Bonita brand bananas to markets all over the world.

But those strong business ties to the country's economy are a source of worry for his detractors, who argue that they could easily produce conflicts of interest.

Already, the lines between his businesses and his political party and campaign are barely distinguishable. As Manzano toured one of Noboa's plantations this week, he consulted his BlackBerry to check results of the latest poll, which he had commissioned himself.

Noboa's business history has also forced him to defend himself against allegations of exploitation. In 2002, a Human Rights Watch report stated that Noboa employed child laborers on some of his banana plantations. Later that year, a conflict with workers led to a violent standoff and contributed to Noboa's lingering reputation for being hard on organized labor. Manzano said the company no longer employs children, offering as evidence reports from local and international inspectors, copies of which he keeps at hand in his office.

"See? No child labor," he said, flipping through pages of recent reports. "They keep coming back, and coming back, and not finding anything. All of the accusations are just part of a very dirty political campaign."

Divided, Unhappy Ecuadoreans Head To Polls (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

QUITO, ECUADOR — Divided and disenchanted, Ecuadoreans vote today for a new president, choosing between two populists who seemed to spend more time during the campaign trading insults than offering ideas.

Right-wing billionaire Alvaro Noboa accused his opponent, economist Rafael Correa, of being a puppet of Cuba's Fidel Castro and Venezuela's Hugo Chavez who doesn't have the guts to admit he is a communist.

Correa accused Noboa of exploiting child labor and cheating his family out of control Ecuador's largest banana plantation.

The ugly rhetoric has turned off voters and deepened the divide between right and left, analysts say. Recent newspaper editorials reflected the disaffection that voters feel toward the pair, who were the top two finishers among 13 candidates in an Oct. 15 primary.

Public opinion polls indicated that the outcome of today's vote would be too close to predict.

To avoid miscues that could set off civil disturbances, Ecuador's electoral tribunal said it could take two days to review and certify the result.

Officials at the Organization of American States, which is monitoring the vote, said they feared an aftermath similar to that in Mexico, where a disputed presidential election in July spawned continuing unrest.

"Neither one is going to last six months in office before the people drive them out," predicted a municipal official in the southern city of Loja, who asked that his name not be used.

Ecuador's last two elected presidents, Jamil Mahuad and Lucio Gutierrez, were driven from office by street protests.

Both candidates have promised to provide more housing, education and health coverage if elected.

But the newspaper El Mercurio of the southern city of Cuenca voiced the fear in an editorial Saturday that the winner would be forced from office "within a few months" if he failed to deliver on promises.

Noboa, 56, who inherited Ecuador's largest banana plantation, near Guayaquil, and who has been listed by Forbes magazine as among the world's richest men, has run twice for president. He lost to Mahuad in 1998 and to Gutierrez in 2002. He has promised to build 300,000 housing units his first year in office.

Noboa frequently handed out cash, computers and wheelchairs at his campaign rallies. He also frequently knelt, Bible in hand, in front of crowds to pray to God to protect Ecuador from a Correa victory.

"I am on my knees to pray for housing, stability and jobs for Ecuador," Noboa said Thursday at his closing campaign stop in Guayaquil.

Correa, 43, has tapped into many Ecuadoreans' disgust with the nation's corrupt and fractured political system.

But he saw a big lead over the field of candidates evaporate in the final days before the presidential primary, partly because of his harsh anti-U.S. stance.

He has toned down the rhetoric, but remains opposed to a free-trade agreement with the United States, the "dollarization" of the Ecuadorean economy and extending the lease on the Manta air base, which the U.S. uses for spying on the drug trade.

A self-professed admirer and friend of Chavez, Correa has made the U.S. government and Wall Street nervous.

If elected, he would join a group of Latin American leaders who are sharply critical of Washington, including the leaders of Venezuela, Argentina and Bolivia.

Correa has said he would seek to renegotiate payment on Ecuador's foreign debt.

Ecuador Votes To Decide President (BBC)

BBC.com, November 26, 2006

Ecuador goes to the polls to elect a new president on Sunday, in a tight run-off vote with the two candidates running neck-and-neck.

Opinion polls suggest left-wing Rafael Correa and conservative Alvaro Noboa are both attracting equal support.

International observers have urged both candidates to be restrained when early results start to come in.

The Organisation of American States wants all results to be officially counted before a victor is proclaimed.

Both candidates have promised to create jobs and fight poverty and corruption.

Mr Correa has gained a slight edge over Mr Noboa in opinion polls but the large number of undecided voters make the victor uncertain.

Insults traded

Ecuador is in a delicate state, says the BBC's correspondent Daniel Schweimler in Ecuador's capital Quito.

The country is becoming increasingly polarised, says our correspondent, people are disillusioned with its politicians and are impatient for change.

Three presidents in the past ten years have been forced from office by angry crowds.

Only three presidents since 1979 have served full terms.

The election has been marred by allegations of fraud In October's first-round vote, Mr Correa said the count was fraudulent and that he had won a clear victory.

Mr Noboa, Ecuador's richest man, said Mr Correa's campaign had been financed by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

"Correa wants an insurrection, a civil war in which the poor will die," said Mr Noboa.

He has already made two unsuccessful runs for the presidency, in 1998 and 2002.

He has accused his opponent of wanting to install a communist dictatorship and drive Ecuador into the camp of Venezuela's anti-American President Chavez.

Mr Noboa made his fortune in bananas and has promised to bring foreign investment to Ecuador. He frequently campaigned carrying a bible.

Mr Correa has said he would maintain good relations with the United States despite having called President George W Bush a "dimwit".

He has said he wants to renegotiate contracts with foreign oil companies and has threatened to reduce payments on Ecuador's foreign debt.

At his final rally, Mr Correa urged his supporters to follow the vehicles transporting ballot boxes to make sure votes were not tampered with.

"Watch out for alterations of results, ballot box switching; ensure there is no vote-buying."

An election win for Mr Noboa, he warned, would turn Ecuador into the banana magnate's "estate".

Police, Protesters Clash In Mexican City (AP)

By Rebeca Romero, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Police fired tear gas at dozens of protesters hurling gasoline bombs, rocks and powerful fireworks near the main square of this southern Mexican city troubled by months of unrest.

The clashes erupted as some 4,000 leftist protesters marched to within two blocks of the main square. They had announced plans to "encircle" police forces who dislodged demonstrators from the main square in a raid a month ago.

Federal detained at least three dozen mainly youthful protesters.

The government news agency Notimex reported that nine people suffered minor injuries in the confrontation, and that the fireworks — large bottle rockets fired from shoulder-mounted tubes — started fires in several houses near the plaza.

The demonstrators, some with their faces covered with bandanas, T-shirts or ski masks, hurled insults at the lines of federal police blocking the way into the square. The police used their riot shields to fend off the objects, then fired tear gas canisters, forcing the protesters to retreat.

The protesters are demanding the resignation of Oaxaca state Gov. Ulises Ruiz, accusing him of brutality, corruption and electoral fraud.

Chanting "Ulises Ruiz, get out of Oaxaca," the demonstrators were angered by reports that a spokesman for their movement — the People's Assembly of Oaxaca — had been detained by police earlier in the day. Those reports could not be immediately confirmed.

Alongside striking teachers — most of whom have returned to work and did not take part in Saturday's demonstration — the protesters seized much of the city starting late May. Police regained control of much of the downtown area in an October raid.

The protesters set up camp at a square a few blocks away and still retain control of barricades in some sectors; they are now demanding that federal police leave the city.

Nine people have been killed in the clashes, including freelance video journalist Bradley Roland Will, 36, of New York, who was filming leftist protesters who clashed with a group of armed men. Both sides fired. It is not clear who shot first.

Pinochet Takes Responsibility For Regime (AP)

By Eduardo Gallardo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 26, 2006

Gen. Augusto Pinochet took full responsibility for the first time Saturday for the actions of his 1973-90 dictatorship, which carried out thousands of political killings and is blamed for widespread torture and illegal imprisonment.

At a celebration of his 91st birthday, Pinochet also defended the bloody military coup that toppled freely elected Marxist President Salvador Allende, in a statement read aloud by his wife as he sat by her side.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all and that I take political responsibility for everything that was done which had no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration," he said.

"I assume full political responsibility for what happened."

Pinochet, surrounded by family, bodyguards and retired generals outside his home, raised his hand to acknowledge about 200 supporters gathered outside who sang him "Happy Birthday" and chanted "Long live Chile! Long live Pinochet!" A mariachi band played one of his favorite songs. After about a half-hour, he slowly stood and walked inside supported by a cane and the arm of a bodyguard.

According to an official report, 3,197 people were killed for political reasons under Pinochet, including more than 1,000 who were made to disappear. Thousands more were illegally imprisoned, tortured or forced into exile.

Pinochet rarely speaks in public and has not made such extensive comments for several years.

Ricardo Israel, a political scientist at the University of Chile, said Pinochet has never taken full responsibility for his regime's actions, instead blaming abuses on subordinates.

"But I think it's too late," Israel told The Associated Press. "He should have done it while he was in power, or when he remained as army commander after stepping down. Things would have been different."

In his statement, Pinochet claimed the military had to act against Allende's government because the social and political convulsions at the time were threatening the country's integrity.

He also sent "a message of support to my comrades in arms, many of whom are imprisoned, suffering persecution and revenge," in a clear reference to the scores of trials of military officers for rights abuses.

"It is not fair to demand punishment for those who prevented the continuation and worsening of the worse political and economic crisis than one can remember," he added.

Pinochet is currently under indictment in two human rights abuse cases and for tax evasion, and has scores of others criminal suits pending, filed by victims of abuses or their relatives. Until now, the courts have dropped the charges against him citing his poor health.

He spoke of his own legal problems in the statement, and indicated that he accepted the prosecutions as a necessary part of the process of national healing.

"All the vexations, persecutions and injustices affecting me and my family, I gladly offer for the sake of harmony and peace that must prevail among Chileans," Pinochet said.

He defended his 1973 coup and the military regime, saying it left "a vigorous, modern, admired country."

"I am absolutely certain that tomorrow, once the political passions and resentments are ended, history will judge our work objectively and will recognize that we put Chile on top of the nations in our continent."

Rebels Take Control Of City In Eastern Chad (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

BANGUI, Central African Republic, Nov. 25 — Rebels seeking to topple the government of Chad seized a crucial eastern city early on Saturday, according to aid workers based in the region.

Gunfire erupted about 6:30 a.m. in Abéché, the largest city in eastern Chad and the operating base for dozens of aid organizations looking after 200,000 Sudanese refugees and 50,000 displaced Chadians, said Claire Bourgeois, chief of the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Abéché.

“The rebels are in the city,” Ms. Bourgeois said by satellite phone. After several hours of artillery and gunfire, the rebels had control of the city, she said, and several government buildings had been looted. At least 13 people were wounded, but that figure will probably rise, she said, once more people trickled from their homes to the city hospital.

The rebels are believed to be militants from a group known by the initials U.F.D.D., one of several groups based in Sudan seeking to overthrow Idriss Déby, the president of Chad. The rebels instructed city residents and aid workers to remain in their homes and offices and said that they did not intend to harm any civilians.

"The situation now is completely calm," Ms. Bourgeois said. "They have sent a message saying we should not be worried, they have nothing against humanitarian actors, nothing against the local population."

France, the former colonial power in Chad, has a military base in Abéché, but it was not fired upon, according to the French Embassy in Ndjamena, the capital. French soldiers took control of Abéché's airport, according to aid officials.

Speaking on Chadian national radio, a top military official said that the army had withdrawn for tactical reasons and to avoid loss of civilian life, but had the city surrounded. Mahamat Nouri, leader of the U.F.D.D., told the BBC that his men would march to Ndjamena.

Several Chadian rebel groups have been trying to remove Mr. Déby for more than a year, saying his government is despotic and corrupt. Chad, one of the poorest and most volatile nations in Africa, has become even more unstable as the conflict in Sudan's western region of Darfur between non-Arab insurgents and the Arab-dominated government has spilled over the border into Chad.

The Sudanese government accuses Chad of supporting the Darfur rebels, and Chad's government accuses Sudan of supporting the rebel groups menacing the capital. Chadian rebel groups have operated openly inside Sudanese territory, using Darfur as a base, and Darfur rebels are similarly brazen in their use of Chadian territory to regroup, rearm and organize.

In April, a month before a presidential election was scheduled, a rebel group attacked the capital but was repulsed by Chadian troops. Last month a rebel group briefly overran several provincial towns in the southeast, but then fell back. Since then, the government has been bracing for a new attack.

Rebels "Seize" Two Chadian Towns (BBC)

Rebel forces in Chad say they have captured the eastern town of Biltine, hours after another group said it had taken control of nearby Abeche.

The government has denied that either town is under rebel control, although the army said it had withdrawn troops from Abeche for tactical reasons.

Several rebel groups in eastern Chad want to depose President Idriss Deby.

Observers say this appears to be the first time two rebel groups have launched co-ordinated attacks.

The BBC's Stephanie Hancock in the Chadian capital, N'Djamena, says this could prove a turning point in Chad's rebellion.

A spokesman for UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said he was concerned by the reports of violence in Chad.

"The secretary general reiterates his condemnation of any attempt to seize power by force. He urges the Chadian protagonists to engage in dialogue," the spokesman said.

Heavy gunfire

The first attack came at around dawn in Abeche, about 700km (440 miles) east of N'Djamena.

Aid workers and residents reported heavy gunfire as rebels approached the city, and small arms fire was heard in Abeche itself.

The rebel group involved, the Union of Forces for Democracy and Development (UFDD), later issued a statement saying its men had taken over Abeche with little resistance from the Chadian army.

However, the government continues to claim that the rebels are not in control of what is a key town in the east.

Speaking on national radio, the Chadian army's second-in-command said troops had withdrawn to the outskirts of the town for tactical reasons and to avoid civilian losses.

He urged people to stay calm and accused neighbouring Sudan of backing rebel forces in Chad.

The UFDD's leader, Mahamat Nouri, told the BBC he would continue to fight until his men had captured Chad's capital, N'Djamena.

Ethnic clashes

Hours later, a second rebel alliance claimed that it had taken control of the town of Biltine, some 80km (50 miles) to the north of Abeche.

Chad's defence minister told the BBC a column of rebel vehicles had been detected in the Biltine area but denied rebel claims the town had been taken.

Rebel groups want to oust President Idriss Deby's government

On Friday there were reports of as many as 200 rebel vehicles circulating in eastern Chad and the Chadian army was on full alert.

The last major rebel attack was in April, when rebels drove from eastern Chad to N'Djamena before being overpowered.

Much of Chad is under a state of emergency, after ethnic clashes which are reported to have killed hundreds of people in recent weeks.

The French embassy in Chad issued warnings to its citizens, following reports that rebels in the east were planning a new offensive and moving west.

Conflict in Sudan's Darfur region has spilled across the border into Chad, which accuses the country of exporting its violence. Khartoum denies this.

The UN estimates that more than 200,000 refugees from Sudan are in Chad and that more than 50,000 Chadians have been displaced by fighting between Arab and non-Arab groups.

Sudan denies claims that it backs Chad's rebels, while Chad denies supporting the black African rebels in Darfur.

A Sister's Sacrifice (NYT)

GOZ AMIR, Chad

When the janjaweed militia attacked Fareeda, a village here in southeastern Chad near Darfur, an elderly man named Simih Yahya didn't run because that would have meant leaving his frail wife behind. So the janjaweed grabbed Mr. Simih and, shouting insults against blacks, threw him to the ground and piled grass on his back.

Then they started a bonfire on top of him.

But his wife, Halima, normally fragile and submissive, furiously tried to tug the laughing militia members from her husband. She pleaded with them to spare his life. Finally, she threw herself on top of the fire, burning herself but eventually extinguishing it with her own body.

The janjaweed may have been shamed by her courage, for Mr. Simih recalls them then walking away and saying, "Oh, he will die anyway." He told me the story as he was treated at a hospital where doctors peeled burned flesh from his back.

Atrocities like this make up the news and constitute the Sudanese-sponsored genocide here in the region surrounding Darfur, but it is also stories like this — of superhuman courage — that keep me going through my reporting here. Invariably, the most memorable stories to emerge from genocide aren't those of the Adolf Eichmanns, but those of the Anne Franks and Raoul Wallenbergs. Side by side with the most nauseating evil, you stumble across the most exhilarating humanity.

So this is a column about the uplifting side of genocide.

I see examples all the time, from the aid workers who persevere against impossible odds (13 have been murdered in Darfur since May) to the children who carry bows and arrows to try to protect their parents from men with machine guns.

One of the most inspiring people here is Suad Ahmed, a 25-year-old mother of two from Darfur. She lives here in the Goz Amir refugee camp, and last month she was collecting firewood with her beloved little sister, Halima, when a band of janjaweed ambushed them.

The janjaweed regularly attack women and girls — part of a Sudanese policy of rape to terrorize and drive away black African tribes — and Ms. Suad knew how brutal the attacks are. A 12-year-old neighbor girl had been kidnapped by the janjaweed and gang-raped for a week; the girl's legs were pulled so far apart that she is now crippled.

But Ms. Suad's thoughts were only for her sister, who is just 10. "You are a virgin, and you must escape," she told her. "Run! I'll let myself be captured, but you must run and escape."

The local culture is such that if the little girl were raped, she might never be able to marry. So Ms. Suad made herself a decoy and allowed herself to be caught, while her sister escaped back to the camp.

Ms. Suad plays down her heroism, saying that even if she had tried to escape, she might have been caught anyway, for she was five months pregnant. Or, she says, maybe she and her sister both would have been captured.

In any case, however, the janjaweed beat Ms. Suad, and seven of them gang-raped her despite her pregnancy. "You black people have no land," she recalls them telling her. "This land is not for you."

People from the camp found Ms. Suad in the hills that evening, too injured to walk, and carried her back. Ms. Suad said she didn't seek medical treatment, because she wanted to keep the rape as much of a secret as possible and didn't even tell her husband, although he eventually found out along with a few others. He accepted that it was not her fault.

(She found the courage to give an on-the-record interview, a video of which is with the online version of this column, after a tribal leader told her that it might help other Darfuris if the world knew what was happening to women here.)

The gang rape and beating were excruciating, she says, but her sacrifice was worth it. "When my sister saw me brought back and saw what had happened to me, she understood," Ms. Suad says. "She is very grateful to me."

So, yes, this is a land of numbing brutality, scarred by what may be the ugliest crime of all, genocide — abetted by indifference abroad. But it has elicited the best of humanity along with the worst. In Ms. Suad and those like her, I find a courage, nobility and compassion that offer a perfect contrast to the fecklessness of the rest of the world.

Sri Lanka Rebels' Critic Silenced By Bullet (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka — The killer asked for "Keteshwaran," the man's battle name from his years in the Tamil militant movement. For whatever reason, it made Kethesh Loganathan come quickly down the stairs and to the front gate of his house. He did not have a chance to open the gate. Through the grille, his killer put a bullet through his head. He died quickly.

In his death lay a vital lesson for outspoken Tamils, the country's largest ethnic minority and a group whose political rights are at the center of Sri Lanka's intensifying, nearly 25-year conflict.

Mr. Loganathan, 54, was among the fiercest critics of the ethnic separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, and they are widely blamed for his death. The group has neither accepted nor rejected the accusation.

No one has been arrested in connection with the killing.

The Tamil Tigers have likewise been blamed for the killings of some of Sri Lanka's most prominent Tamil intellectuals, especially those who ally themselves with the government, as Mr. Loganathan did this year when he became deputy secretary general of the government agency coordinating the peace process.

His killing, on Aug. 12, occurred exactly a year after the assassination of Lakshman Kadirgamar, the former Sri Lankan foreign minister and the highest-ranking ethnic Tamil in the government. Shortly after his death, a rebel-affiliated Web site described Mr. Loganathan as "Tamil betrayer Kadirgamar Junior."

In 1999, Neelan Thiruchelvan, the architect of a seminal power-sharing arrangement that would have offered broad political autonomy to the Tamils, though not necessarily to the Tamil Tigers, was killed in a suicide bombing. Anti-rebel politicians like Douglas Devananda, leader of the Eelam People's Democratic Party, have eluded so many assassination attempts that most people here have lost count; he lives today in a virtual bunker under state protection.

Dissent, as critics of the Tamil Tigers are fond of reminding, is decidedly unwelcome in the rebel playbook. Or, as the stridently anti-rebel group University Teachers for Human Rights declared in a statement three days after Mr. Loganathan was killed, "this organization can and would pick off its unarmed opponents at will, should they persist in giving hope to the people."

Mr. Loganathan, his friends and colleagues recalled, was unusual among the many detractors of the Tamil Tigers. He was a Tamil nationalist, deeply versed in the language and ideology of the Tamil Tiger cause, but virulently opposed to its methods. He belonged to another Tamil militant group, the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front, until the mid-1990s. The Tamil Tigers systematically killed many of his comrades.

Mr. Loganathan was unforgiving of the Tamil Tigers' human rights record. He was a strident critic of their fundamental claim that only the Tigers represented Tamil interests in Sri Lanka.

"He knew their thinking," said Jehan Perera, media director of the National Peace Council, a nonpartisan research and advocacy group. "He critiqued them in their language."

Mr. Perera described Mr. Loganathan's approach as "adversarial." The day of his assassination, Mr. Loganathan, who was as critical of the way the Norwegian-mediated peace talks were moving as he was of the rebels, was writing a response to an essay that Mr. Perera had written for an upcoming seminar on the peace process. He had spent the day working at home. He had told his wife, Bhawani, that he would have to opt out of their Saturday habit of visiting a Hindu temple somewhere in the city, then eating out.

They were a reclusive pair, Mrs. Loganathan recalled, childless and averse to social outings. They lived on a narrow street in an unremarkable, ethnically mixed middle-class neighborhood here in the capital. She said her husband was resolutely opposed to having a security guard at home. She opposed his joining the state peace secretariat. But she knew there was no blocking her husband's aspirations.

"He was a very stubborn person," Mrs. Loganathan recalled recently at home. "He would do what he wanted to do. No one could stop him."

By the time he was killed, he was in frail health and had been gradually losing his hearing. A few days before his death, for reasons that still puzzle her, he told her he wished to die before she did. She remembered looking at him and asking him flatly, "Have you received a threat?" He said he had not.

Later that night, she said she quietly prayed that she would survive him; she knew she was his sole caretaker.

Shortly before his death, Mrs. Loganathan recalled, they were upstairs watching the 9 p.m. television news together, when a man called out from the front gate. She went to the balcony to have a look. She could make out a dark-colored, old-model car parked outside and a man saying he had come from the police department for "Keteshwaran." It wasn't entirely unusual for a police officer to visit.

At the mention of the name, her husband rushed downstairs. From upstairs, she heard him asking for the visitor's identity card. Then she heard the gunfire.

Awaiting Lengthy Lab Confirmation Of Bird Flu Risks Treatment Delays, Studies Find (NYT)

By Donald G. McNeil Jr.

The New York Times, November 26, 2006

Because detecting Avian flu with standard tests is so difficult and time-consuming, waiting for laboratory confirmation of an outbreak would cause dangerous treatment delays, according to new studies of two flu outbreaks.

The studies, published Thursday in The New England Journal of Medicine, were of family clusters of flu cases in Turkey and Indonesia.

Rapid tests on nose and throat swabs failed every time, and in Turkey, so did all follow-up tests known as Elisas. The only tests that consistently worked were polymerase chain reaction tests, or PCRs, which can be done only in advanced laboratories and take several hours.

"It'll be a disaster if we have to use PCRs for everybody," said Dr. Anne Moscona, a professor of pediatrics and immunology at Weill Cornell Medical College. "It just isn't available at a whole lot of places."

If the A(H5N1) flu mutates into a pandemic strain, rapid tests "will be really key," she said.

The studies followed clusters in three families in Indonesia in 2005 and in what appears to have been one extended family near Dogubayazit, in eastern Turkey, in January. Case clusters particularly worry public health authorities because they raise the possibility that the flu is mutating to spread faster between people.

In the Indonesian cases, the authors, from Indonesia, the World Health Organization and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, concluded that human-to-human transmission had probably taken place in two of the three family clusters. In one case, a 38-year-old government auditor appeared to have caught the flu from his 8-year-old daughter or her 1-year-old sister. All three died; his wife and two sons did not get sick. No one in the family had any known contact with poultry, wild birds, animals or sick people, so the source was a mystery.

"But you can't always tell what a young child has done," said Dr. Tim Uyeki, a Centers for Disease Control flu specialist and an author of the study. "There's no magical test, and you don't always get a perfect explanation."

The Dogubayazit cluster was a cause célèbre for some Internet flu-watchers following Turkish news reports in January. They contended that widespread human-to-human transmission seemed to be taking place, and that it may have begun at a banquet attended in late December by members of two related families named Ozcan and Kocyigit. The Turkish government and the World Health Organization did not link the cases or families and tentatively blamed birds for all transmission.

The studies showed how wide a net was cast: 290 people were tested at one hospital because they either had flu symptoms or contact with dying birds, or both. All were given the antiviral drug oseltamivir, which is also sold as Tamiflu, and about half were hospitalized. That accorded with health organization recommendations: widespread testing and use of antivirals, both to save lives and to snuff out any suspected outbreak of a mutant strain.

Only 10 came up positive on PCR tests, and 8 of those were confirmed by a World Health Organization laboratory. All were children; four died. The studies confirmed suspicions that the families were linked; 7 of the 8 children were related or lived near each other. The December banquet was not mentioned.

It was impossible to tell whether the other argument made by the Internet flu-watchers was correct: that poor testing and the oseltamivir had disguised the extent of the outbreak. But the lead author, Dr. Ahmet Faik Oner, a professor of medicine at Yuzuncu Yil University in Turkey, said in a telephone interview that he believed that there had been no human-to-human transmission because all the children had been in close contact with poultry within seven or fewer days before they fell ill and none of their parents or the hospital staff members that treated them had become sick.

Dr. Uyeki declined to comment on the Turkey outbreak, but said both studies lent support to the theory that some people were genetically more susceptible to the flu.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Despite A Year Of Ire And Angst, Little Has Changed On Wiretaps (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 — When President Bush went on national television one Saturday morning last December to acknowledge the existence of a secret wiretapping program outside the courts, the fallout was fierce and immediate.

Mr. Bush's opponents accused him of breaking the law, with a few even calling for his impeachment. His backers demanded that he be given express legal authority to do what he had done. Law professors talked, civil rights groups sued and a federal judge in Detroit declared the wiretapping program unconstitutional.

But as Democrats prepare to take over on Capitol Hill, not much has really changed. For all the sound and fury in the last year, the National Security Agency's wiretapping program continues uninterrupted, with no definitive action by either Congress or the courts on what, if anything, to do about it, and little chance of a breakthrough in the lame-duck Congress.

While the Democrats have vowed to press for more facts about the operation, they are of mixed minds about additional steps.

Some favor an aggressive strategy that would brand the program illegal and move to ban it even as the courts consider its legality. Others are more cautious, emphasizing the rule of law but not giving Republicans the chance to accuse them of depriving the government of important anti-terrorism tools.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, who will take over as House speaker in January, favors an investigation to determine how the security agency's program actually operated and what its legal framework is under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, a senior aide to Ms. Pelosi said. Administration officials said they were concerned they could have to shut down a program they deemed vital to national security.

The 1978 law requires counterterrorism officials to obtain court orders to eavesdrop on people inside the United States. But the security agency's program involved eavesdropping without warrants on the international telephone and e-mail communications of Americans and others in this country suspected of links to Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

Congressional Republicans, for their part, see a missed opportunity to resolve the many questions hovering over the operation during a year in which they still commanded majorities in the House and Senate.

"We could've fixed this early on," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and a believer that the surveillance program violates the 1978 law.

"For every day that passes," Mr. Specter said in an interview, "there's an invasion of privacy that could be cured."

To understand the helter-skelter nature of the debate over the wiretapping program, one need look no further than Mr. Specter.

After the program was publicly disclosed last Dec. 15, the senator called it an "inappropriate" usurpation of presidential authority that "can't be condoned." He signed onto a bill last summer written by Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, that would effectively ban the program as it is now operated and require a court order for all wiretapping of Americans.

Then, after a series of confidential meetings with the White House, Mr. Specter worked out a compromise to bring the program before a secret intelligence court to test its constitutionality. He was promptly pummeled by Democrats and editorial writers for giving away too much to the White House.

Mr. Specter changed course again last week and submitted yet another proposal that would require warrants for eavesdropping on communications coming out of, but not into, the United States, and would put the whole issue on a fast track to the Supreme Court. Its fate, like its predecessors', is unclear.

Along the way, Mr. Specter has clashed with politicians on the left and the right. He got into a public spat with Vice President Dick Cheney when the latter succeeded in keeping Mr. Specter from subpoenaing telecommunications executives to testify about cooperation with the security agency, and he traded terse words with Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, over Mr. Feingold's efforts to have the Senate vote to censure the president over the wiretapping.

"It's always difficult," Mr. Specter said, "to get legislation on a controversial issue that has such political overtones."

The lack of a resolution has left many shaking their heads. Some officials said the unanswered questions had cast doubt on the public credibility of broader intelligence operations and created occasional confusion among intelligence agents over what was and was not allowed in tracking terrorism suspects.

"There's a lot of uncertainty over this program," said a former senior intelligence official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the wiretapping program is classified.

"We've had a wasted year at this point," the former official said, "and nothing has been done to try to really figure out how or whether we should amend the process."

The program was secretly approved by Mr. Bush weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks. Since then, the security agency, which has historically been restricted from spying within the United States, has monitored thousands of international telephone calls and e-mail messages to and from people in this country, people with knowledge of the operation say. Senior administration officials say it has been critical in helping to identify previously unknown plots, but other government officials involved in the operation have said that it has often led to dead ends and to people with no clear links to terrorism.

The administration has steadfastly defended the program and has warned of a serious threat to national security were it stopped.

In a speech last week, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales labeled as "myth" the idea that the program "is an invasion of privacy and an unlawful eavesdropping tool." The program, he said, "does not invade anyone's privacy, unless you are talking to the enemy in this time of war."

The legal authority, the administration argues, rests on both the president's inherent constitutional authorities as commander in chief as well as a Congressional resolution passed days after Sept. 11 that authorized the use of military force against Al Qaeda.

The only judge to rule directly on the question, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of Federal District Court in Detroit, rejected the administration's claims to broad executive authority, ruling the program illegal in August and ordering it shut down.

"There are no hereditary kings in America and no powers not created by the Constitution," the judge wrote.

The Justice Department is appealing that decision, as well as a separate ruling in San Francisco allowing lawsuits against telecommunication companies to proceed. In that case, Judge Vaughn Walker of Federal District Court rejected the government's assertion that the lawsuits should be quashed because they touched on "state secrets" and risked harming national security.

Justice Department officials said they were hopeful they would succeed in overturning the Detroit ruling, but they acknowledged they were concerned over where the courts would ultimately come down.

"It would certainly be good to have clarity on this," said a senior Justice Department official, who was given anonymity to discuss the department's internal thinking. "Do people want resolution on a program this important? Sure."

Even after the Democrats won control of Congress this month, Mr. Bush pushed the passage of wiretapping legislation as a priority for the lame-duck session that concludes next month. During that brief window before Democrats take power, administration officials also hope to push through related measures that would effectively insulate telecommunications and government officials from legal liability growing out of the wiretapping.

But Republicans and Democrats alike give the White House virtually no chance of moving substantive wiretapping legislation before January.

An aide to Ms. Pelosi noted that the White House has until now agreed only to limited briefings on the program.

"There is bipartisan interest in seeing whether the administration's claims that the program can't comply with F.I.S.A. are indeed so," the aide said. "We were legislating on an issue where the full parameters were not known or well understood."

Times Seeks To Bar Review Of Phone Data (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

DOJ_NMG_0098398

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

The New York Times asked the Supreme Court yesterday to bar a federal prosecutor from reviewing the phone records of two of its reporters. The records, lawyers for The Times said, would allow the government to learn the identities of many of the reporters' confidential sources.

The case arose from a Chicago grand jury's investigation into who told the two reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government was planning to take in 2001 against two Islamic charities. The United States attorney in Chicago, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, sought the reporters' records directly from their phone companies, and The Times filed suit to stop him.

In August, a divided three-judge panel of the federal appeals court in Manhattan ruled in favor of Mr. Fitzgerald, saying the reporters were not entitled to shield their sources. The needs of law enforcement, the majority said, outweighed any protections the reporters might have in the First Amendment or other areas of law.

Ms. Miller left the paper last year after spending 85 days in jail in connection with a separate leak investigation, also supervised by Mr. Fitzgerald.

The paper's filing yesterday was a limited one, seeking an order from Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg staying the appeals court decision until the Supreme Court has an opportunity to decide whether to hear the case. The deadline for seeking review of the appeals court's decision is in January, but The Times said it would move faster.

In a letter filed in response to yesterday's application, the Justice Department said it "desires to review the records in question as expeditiously as possible" but agreed not to do so until Wednesday. Yesterday afternoon, the court ordered the government to submit a formal response to the stay application by today at 4 p.m.

The press has been on a losing streak of late in the federal courts, with several decisions refusing to recognize protection for confidential sources. The Supreme Court has not weighed in on the question since 1972.

Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for The Times, said the case now before the court could give it an opportunity to clarify the law.

"If the government is permitted to proceed to scrutinize the telephone records of The New York Times and its journalists," Mr. Abrams said, "it will be in a position to identify literally scores of confidential sources, thus imperiling both the ability of the press to gather the news and of the public to learn it."

N.Y. Times Asks Court To Limit Probe (WP/AP)

The New York Times asked the U.S. Supreme Court yesterday to block the federal government from reviewing the phone records of two reporters in a leak investigation.

The case involved stories written in 2001, by Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, that revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

In a 2 to 1 decision, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit ruled in August that federal prosecutors can see the phone records of Shenon and Miller. Miller retired from the Times a year ago.

The government says phone calls placed by the reporters seeking comment for a story tipped off the charities to planned government raids. A federal judge who ruled in the newspaper's favor said there is no evidence in the record suggesting the reporters even knew of the government's plans to raid either charity.

The Times wants Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg to temporarily block the government from going through the records so that the newspaper can prepare a petition arguing why the justices should step into the case. Ginsburg asked the Justice Department for a response.

U.S. District Judge Robert W. Sweet had ruled that the records were off-limits unless prosecutors could show that they had exhausted all other means of finding out who spoke to the reporters.

But the three-judge appeals court panel said a grand jury investigation of the disclosures would be unlikely to go anywhere without help from the reporters or access to their records.

SEC Quizzes Ford On "terrorist" State Sales (FT)

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098399

The Securities and Exchange Commission has raised concern about the investment risks of US companies doing business in countries deemed to be terrorist-supporting states by asking Ford Motor, and possibly others, about its dealings in Iran, Sudan and Syria.

The enquiries emerged in a series of letters dating back to July between the SEC and Ford's chief financial officer, Don Leclair.

The SEC asked the Detroit-based carmaker to demonstrate that its "reputation and share value" were not at risk as a result of business dealings in the three countries. All three countries are designated as state sponsors of terrorism by the US state Department.

Ford replied that its interests, comprising mainly Ford, Land Rover and Mazda dealerships, were small relative to its worldwide operations. Ford owns 33 per cent of Mazda.

Referring to Syria, the carmaker added that "our limited and lawful business activity is public information, and we have not been able to identify any resulting negative impact on our reputation or share value".

Ford said it had no reason to believe that vehicles sold by its dealerships in recent years had gone to the Syrian government or government-controlled groups.

Referring to Mazda's business in Iran and Syria, it said "we do not believe that this de minimis business activity by Mazda impacts Ford's reputation or share value, or the value of Ford's ownership interest in Mazda".

The SEC specifically asked Ford whether the Syrian government or government officials had an interest in the dealerships that sell its vehicles. It also asked the company to confirm that business volumes had not changed significantly in the past three years.

The SEC declined to comment on Friday whether it was satisfied with Ford's responses, and whether it was asking other companies similar questions.

But an industry source said such queries had been directed to several prominent multinationals. The SEC has reportedly asked European and US oil companies to tell investors about the risks they face from operations in countries that Washington has identified as supporting terrorism.

The US has modest direct trade links with the three countries. According to the Commerce Department, two-way trade with Syria totaled $479m last year, Iran $271m and Sudan $126m.

Cars and trucks were the second biggest export to Syria, after farm products. The US's main export to Iran is tobacco.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Careless Contracting (WP)

THE DEPARTMENT of Homeland Security is an MBA's nightmare. When Congress cobbled DHS together in 2002, it took apart and reassembled elements from disparate federal agencies into an uneasy consolidation, too big and too varied, some say, for even the department's tireless head, Michael Chertoff, to adequately control. Instead of synergy, a fair measure of incompetence followed, including, The Post reported Wednesday, embarrassingly poor oversight of the billions of dollars the department has paid to private contractors.

The Post's Robert O'Harrow Jr. and Scott Higham obtained an internal review of the department's Office of Procurement Operations, one of many agencies that handles contracts within the department. According to the review, which was drafted by outside specialists on government contracting, almost none of the contract files examined met standards of quality or even completeness. The documentation for 33 of 72 contracts the investigators sought to evaluate could not even be located, which makes you wonder how DHS ensures that contractors aren't wasting government money.

Further, many of the files that were available were "not substantive" and offered "little evidence of fair and reasonable pricing or competition," among other problems, the investigators found. An alarming number were "seriously inadequate," with "major policy, regulatory or legal issues." Poor contract management, the report concluded, has led to "the inability to obtain quality goods and services on time and at a fair price." These contracts date from fiscal 2005, during which DHS distributed nearly $17.5 billion to contractors and the federal government ran a deficit of $318 billion.

The story isn't as bad these days, a department spokesman says. The fact that Homeland Security hired consultants to review its contracting indicates that managers want to improve the process, and the spokesman says the procurement office is working to implement each of the report's recommendations, which officials received in March. But according to the department's inspector general, poor contract management persists. Money and security alike are put at risk.

WAR NEWS:

White House Confirms Bush-Maliki To Meet As Iraq Violence Spirals (AFP)

By Laurent Lozano

AFP, November 25, 2006

The White House reiterated that President George W. Bush would meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki in Jordan next week amid a sharp rise in Shiite-Sunni violence.

As Vice President Dick Cheney took off on a trip to Saudi Arabia on Friday, the White House said there would be no change to Bush's planned summit with Maliki even as a top Shiite cleric said he would pull his faction out of the Baghdad government if the meeting takes place.

"Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item when President Bush meets with Prime Minister Maliki in just a few days," said White House spokesperson Scott Stanzel.

The spike in violence in Iraq Friday left at least 202 dead in a wave of bombings in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City, the deadliest attack since the war began in 2003.

Apparent revenge efforts by Shiite militias left dozens more feared dead in attacks on Sunni mosques in Baghdad.

Separately a triple bomb attack in the northern town of Tal Afar killed 23 people and wounded 45 others Friday, according to police.

The White House condemned the attacks by both sides.

"These ruthless acts of violence are deplorable. It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed," said White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

How to quell the violence will likely be the focal topic in talks that Cheney holds with Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah and Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz, and the Bush-Maliki meeting on November 29-30 in Amman.

Cheney could ask Abdullah to use his influence to help foster reconciliation between warring factions in Iraq, and also press for Riyadh to come through with its promised reconstruction aid.

But Friday's violent surge has added urgency to both trips. A few hours before the attack on Sunni mosques in Baghdad, the political group of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose base is in Sadr City, threatened to quit the national unity government if Maliki meets Bush.

But Stanzel confirmed that the meeting will take place despite the threats by Sadr's allies. Bush and Maliki are also to see Jordan's King Abdullah II, as pressure mounts for all of of Iraq's neighbors to help contain the daily bloodshed.

With US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also due to visit the region soon, the top-level travel reflects the seriousness of the situation on the ground in Iraq, as does Bush's stated openness to potential policy change there.

The rising violence, a surge in US casualties in Iraq, and the victory of opposition Democrats in Congressional elections on November 7 have piled pressure on Bush to change US policy in Iraq, if not to begin withdrawing troops -- something Bush has steadfastly refused to commit to.

But after an October that was the bloodiest month for Iraqi civilians -- according to the United Nations -- and one of the bloodiest for US troops since the March 2003 invasion, the latest anti-Shiite attack and counterattacks will only elevate the pressure on the president to change course.

Stanzel said Friday that the violence is "clearly aimed at undermining the Iraqi people's hopes for a peaceful and stable Iraq."

He added that "the United States is committed to helping the Iraqis."

It remains unclear, however, what resources Bush and Cheney can marshal to stop the country from plunging into all-out civil war.

Bush has started a comprehensive review of his Iraq policy. Two reports are expected in the coming weeks -- one from the administration and another from a high-powered independent panel -- which could play a big role in decisions on strategy and US troop levels.

The worsening situation in recent months also raises questions about US trust in Maliki and, specifically, his ability to end attacks by militia.

So far, Bush has publicly stood by Maliki, but his confidence seems to be increasingly in doubt.

U.S. Says Violence Is Meant To Topple Iraqi Government (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

The Bush administration charged yesterday that the escalating violence in Iraq committed by both Shiites and Sunnis over the past two days is a "brazen effort" to bring down the fragile government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The White House also said President Bush has no intention of backing out of talks next week with the Iraqi leader, despite threats yesterday from a powerful Shiite militia to pull out of the government if Maliki goes ahead with the meeting. The talks, set for Thursday in Amman, Jordan, have suddenly taken on the air of a crisis summit, as Iraq slides closer to all-out civil war.

The latest attacks, including six car-bomb attacks on Shiite targets in Baghdad on Thursday and retaliatory strikes on Sunni targets yesterday, killed more than 200 people in the deadliest wave of violence since the U.S.-led coalition invaded Iraq in 2003.

Rumors of yesterday's atrocities included one report of six Sunni men who emerged from services at a Baghdad mosque and were doused with kerosene and burned alive. But two Baghdad imams, in an interview, denied that the incident took place.

"These ruthless acts of violence are deplorable," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. "It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed.

"Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item when President Bush meets with Prime Minister al-Maliki in just a few days."

In a major shift, much of the recent violence has come from militias linked to parties in Iraq's government and from death squads with ties to government agencies. The trend is important because a common benchmark in the slide from strife to civil war is the government falling apart and factions within it fighting each other.

"Iraq is breaking down, not breaking up" into pieces, said Patrick Clawson of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

The ferocity of the latest attacks complicates the prospects of major progress at the talks in Amman, U.S. experts warned.

"This summit is an act of desperation. The White House doesn't know what it can do," said David Rothkopf, a Carnegie Endowment for International Peace fellow and the author of "Running the World: The Inside Story of the National Security Council and the Architects of American Power." "The situation is deteriorating more rapidly than anyone anticipated and to an unending depth.

"I don't think, in modern American history, there is another example of such egregious failure of policy and execution. We're really seeing something unprecedented here. Even Vietnam was a slower decline, and the military forces were more in balance. . . . I don't know anyone who thinks there is an outcome in Iraq now that is hopeful."

The crisis atmosphere deepened in Iraq yesterday when followers of radical Shiite militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr pledged to walk out of parliament and Maliki's cabinet if the prime minister attends the Jordan summit. Sadr's powerful political bloc has 30 members in Iraq's new parliament. It was also pivotal in backing Maliki as prime minister during heated months-long debate over the new government.

The Bush administration has been increasingly frustrated by Maliki's leadership, particularly his inability or unwillingness to rein in fellow Shiites, including militias such as Sadr's. But the White House has limited alternatives because the Iraqi leader was democratically selected and the next election is not due until 2009. Maliki is, for now, the only political game in town.

And any U.S. exit strategy will rely on accelerating the transfer of security responsibilities to Iraqi forces under Maliki's control.

Maliki faces his own constraints. He needs to maintain his own power base to bring the Shiites along for reconciliation efforts with the Sunni minority, experts said, adding that, to be credible at home, he also has to keep a certain distance from Bush.

Bush is "in a very tight spot," said Henri Barkey, a Lehigh University professor who was a State Department policy-planning expert on Iraq. "He now has to strike a balance between three conflicting constituencies. He has to show respect for Maliki, that he is an independent actor and not a stooge. But he also has to worry about his own priorities. At the same time, the Democrats are increasingly breathing down his neck about withdrawal.

"The drumroll for withdrawal is only going to get stronger in January."

Syria Appears To Be Summit Wild Card (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Iran and the United States are playing a complicated diplomatic game, jockeying for influence in Iraq as violence there spirals out of control. But there is one major wild-card in dueling summits planned for coming days: Syria.

Vice President Dick Cheney was heading to Saudi Arabia for key talks with King Abdullah on Saturday, apparently looking for its influence and tribal connections help to calm Iraq.

President Bush is due to meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan on Wednesday and Thursday, an unusual succession of trips that reflects U.S. determination to rally allies at a time when Washington is considering overhauling its Iraq policy.

But an especially violent week in Iraq threatened to overshadow the planned Bush-Maliki meeting.

After suspected Sunni insurgents slaughtered 215 people with a series of car bombs in Baghdad's Shiite Sadr City slum the day before, a top Shiite party on which al-Maliki relies for power threatened to walk out of the government if he meets with Bush in Amman.

Iran, meanwhile, was having its own diplomatic troubles.

It has been trying to organize a summit Saturday joining its president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and the presidents of Iraq and Syria, in a bid to assert its role as the top regional powerbroker.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani agreed to attend. But on Friday, he had to postpone his trip until Baghdad's airport — closed in a security clampdown after the violence — reopens, no sooner than Sunday. "The Tehran visit is still on," he said. "The airport will be closed tomorrow but if it opens after tomorrow we will go."

It also appeared unlikely on Friday that Syria's Bashar Assad would participate at all.

A top official at Iran's presidency on Friday said Syria has not responded to Iran's invitation and that "there is no plan for Assad visit to Tehran at least for the next 24 hours." He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the press.

On Thursday, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said there was no agreement yet on a three-way summit. "We will announce such a summit as soon as it is finalized. Of course, this is a good idea and we welcome it," he said.

Syrian officials have been silent for days over whether Assad would attend, apparently to avoid embarrassing Iran with a direct rejection — though the delay in Talabani's arrival could give Syria a chance to reconsider coming.

Iran is Syria's only close ally and a rejection would be an unusual snub, but Damascus may be more worried about angering the United States by joining Iran's overt attempt to assert itself in Iraq. Instead, Syria is likely looking further down the road to potential talks with Washington.

"Syria is after concessions from Washington. Assad wants doesn't want to annoy Washington," said Leila Chamankhah, an Iranian political analyst.

After the Democratic victory in U.S. midterm elections, the Bush administration is under increased pressure at home to approach Iran and Syria for help in Iraq. Such a step is believed to be one of the recommendations by a blue-ribbon panel on Iraq led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton.

On the face of it, an Iranian-Syrian-Iraqi summit would fit into U.S. hopes that Iraq's neighbors will step in to help ease the bloodshed. Iran is believed to back Iraqi Shiite militias blamed in sectarian killings that have killed thousands this year.

But Iran has made clear that the summit aimed to assert its influence in Iraq on Tehran's terms, not Washington's. Iran's conservative Kayhan newspaper boasted on Wednesday that the gathering would "shake the U.S. president."

Syria is accused by the United States of turning a blind eye to Iraqi insurgents that use its territory as a base. Damascus denies this, but it could be looking to trade stronger action in return for concessions from the U.S.

At the top of Syria's concerns are Lebanon and Israel. Syria is seeking to regain influence in Lebanon but has been opposed by the United States and the U.S.-backed Lebanese government.

Syria also wants a resumption of the Arab-Israeli peace process that it hopes would bring the return of the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in 1967.

Wave Of Retaliation Sweeps Iraq (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's civil war worsened Friday as Shiite and Sunni Arabs engaged in retaliatory attacks after coordinated car bombings that killed more than 200 people in a Shiite neighborhood the day before. A main Shiite political faction threatened to quit the government, a move that probably would cause its collapse and plunge the nation deeper into disarray.

The massacre Thursday in Sadr City — a stronghold of Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr and his Al Mahdi militia — sparked attacks around the country, reinforced doubts about the effectiveness of the Iraqi government and U.S. military and emboldened Shiite vigilantes.

In a sermon Friday, Sadr, a strong opponent of the United States, said the Pentagon's refusal to grant full control of Iraqi security forces to the Baghdad government was leaving the populace vulnerable to insurgent attacks.

And as Sadr's militiamen took matters into their own hands in battles with Sunni Arabs, his political representatives demanded that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki signal his displeasure with the U.S. military occupation by canceling a meeting with President Bush next week in Jordan.

Sadr's representatives said they would withdraw from Maliki's government if the prime minister did not meet their demands.

In spite of an emergency curfew, gunfire crackled throughout the day and mortar rounds arced over Baghdad's jagged skyline, smashing into houses of worship, residences and shops.

By Friday night, at least 65 deaths had been reported in the capital and elsewhere.

A dozen or more Sunni mosques around the country were hit by mortar rounds and gunfire or were burned down by Shiite mobs. Masked members of Sadr's militia swept through Sunni areas, setting up checkpoints and threatening to execute families that didn't leave their homes within 48 hours.

Hurriya, a mixed area of the capital, saw some of Friday's fiercest fighting. Uniformed men in police vehicles roared through the streets launching rocket-propelled grenades into houses and raking Sunni mosques with gunfire, said an Iraqi police officer stationed in the area. The attackers killed three security guards at a mosque and injured 10 worshipers inside.

"They proceeded to bombard the building with rocket-propelled grenades and hand grenades, starting a fire that consumed the structure," said the officer, who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisal.

Attackers ambushed

As the uniformed assailants advanced to another area, members of the Battawia tribe, a prominent Sunni clan in the area, fought back.

DOJ_NMG_0098404

"They were ready for them and … ambushed the attackers, countering them with RPGs and machine guns," the officer said. The ensuing fight brought casualties on both sides. A nearby hospital reported that it had received 28 dead and 32 injured.

The policeman said he and fellow officers stood alongside Iraqi army units near the battle, watching the bloodshed.

"The army did not interfere," he said. "And we [the police] didn't receive any orders to interfere. We would not have interfered even in the event that we were ordered to do so, because this is the Iraqi army's turf."

By Friday night, police had discovered at least 11 bodies around Baghdad. But the reprisals were not limited to the capital.

In Baqubah, 25 miles to the northeast, Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen exchanged ragged bursts of machine-gun fire in the streets and lobbed thunderous explosives as imams called out "Allahu akbar," or "God is great," from the city's mosques.

Insurgents used bombs to destroy an office of the Sadr movement shortly after U.S. troops raided the building and detained six militiamen. Later in the day, militiamen responded by destroying a Sunni mosque and toppling its minaret.

In the far northern town of Tall Afar, a car bomb blast ripped through a crowded car dealership, killing at least 22 people and injuring 26.

In the northern oil hub of Kirkuk, police found the bulletriddled body of a pipeline security guard, and a bomb damaged the Wahab mosque, one of the largest Sunni mosques in the city.

In the southern port city of Basra, rocket-propelled grenades damaged a mosque, the headquarters of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq and an apartment complex, injuring 15 people.

In Fallouja, a restive Sunni city in western Al Anbar province, a car bomb exploded at an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing at least six soldiers.

Meanwhile, a caravan of grieving Shiites drove casket-laden vehicles from Sadr City to Najaf's ancient necropolis to bury victims of Thursday's attack, the deadliest single incident in Iraq since U.S. forces toppled Saddam Hussein in 2003.

Mourners carried the dead around the shrine of Imam Ali, the most important religious figure for Shiites after Muhammad, before burying them in the "martyr's cemetery," a series of plots festooned with Al Mahdi banners and posters of Muqtada Sadr on the edge of Najaf's tombstone forest. Amid wailing relatives and chanting militiamen, mourners lowered the remains into the earth.

"The reaction [to the bombings] will be huge," said Tahseen Ali Shareef, 28, a Najaf resident who watched the funeral processions. "The families of the victims will not be silent. The streets will be haunted with fear."

As Sunni and Shiite gunmen fought in the streets, Sadr and his followers lobbed rhetorical bombs into Iraq's political arena.

From his pulpit in the southern city of Kufa, Sadr called on Iraq's most prominent Sunni cleric, Harith Dhari — who became a fugitive this month after the government issued a warrant for his arrest for his alleged support of terrorism — to publicly forbid Sunnis to kill Shiites or to join Al Qaeda.

Sadr also demanded that Dhari, who is currently not in Iraq, issue an edict urging Sunnis to fund the reconstruction of a revered shrine in Samarra. Insurgents blew up the shrine in February, launching a similar storm of sectarian battles that left hundreds of people dead.

Sadr also reiterated his demand for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, whom he blamed for the violence.

"I denounce and condemn this incident which targeted the beloved Sadr City," Sadr said. "From this pulpit … I renew my demand for the withdrawal of occupation forces."

Sadr's political representatives in Baghdad, meanwhile, threatened to withdraw from the government if Maliki met with Bush as scheduled on Wednesday and Thursday in Jordan.

"If the situation does not improve, the government does not offer services and the prime minister doesn't cancel his meeting with George Bush in Amman, we shall suspend our membership in the parliament and any participation in the government," the Sadr bloc said in a statement.

White House officials said Maliki had confirmed that he would attend the meeting, and Iraqi officials discounted the Sadr group's demands as empty threats.

"I think this is a red herring," national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie said. "It is more political posturing, but it doesn't mean anything."

But some observers say Sadr's demands could pose a serious challenge to Maliki.

A potential vacuum

If the Sadr bloc carries out its threat of a political walkout, Maliki's government will almost certainly collapse, leaving an even greater authority vacuum that militias and insurgents could exploit.

However, if Maliki backs out of his meeting with Bush, he could be severely weakened, losing any chance of reining in Sadr's paramilitary forces.

Canceling would also signal to other factions that they might be able to run roughshod over Maliki.

"Sadr is basically challenging Maliki's ability to govern," said P.J. Crowley, a retired U.S. Air Force colonel and a fellow at the Center for American Progress, a think tank in Washington. "He has to respond in a way that allows him to survive and actually strengthens his hand."

Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official and a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, another Washington think tank, said Sadr's challenge to Dhari might be even more dangerous than that to Maliki. If the Sunnis fail to satisfy Sadr, Cordesman argued, sectarian violence could grow even worse.

"It's going to take a couple days to know how serious this is," he said. "Will this lead to a large-scale civil war? The worse case is that this leads to enough misunderstanding and anger to drive the country into full-scale civil war. The more likely result is that it will take a week to 10 days to play out and depend on the Sunni response. A lot will also depend on what Maliki does."

Despite frequent complaints about the Iraqi government and the U.S. military, most of Iraq's political and religious leadership called for calm Friday.

In a display of unity, several members of Maliki's Cabinet — Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds among them — held an emergency meeting to discuss the deteriorating situation.

And in mosques around Iraq, clerics preached about unity, intra-sectarian accord and blame for the United States.

"As we denounce the killings of the innocent in Sadr City yesterday, we must also hold the U.S. and British troops as well as the government responsible for what happened," said Abdul Kareem Ghazi, a preacher and supporter of Sadr.

"It is true that the perpetrators of these operations are the terrorists and Saddamists, but their tactics are designed by the occupation forces, and they are the beneficiaries of what is happening."

No One To Lose To (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

Washington

After the Thanksgiving Day Massacre of Shiites by Sunnis, President Bush should go on Rupert Murdoch's Fox News and give an interview headlined: "If I did it, here's how the civil war in Iraq happened."

He could describe, hypothetically, a series of naïve, arrogant and self-defeating blunders, including his team's failure to comprehend that in the Arab world, revenge and religious zealotry can be stronger compulsions than democracy and prosperity.

But W. is not yet able to view his actions in subjunctive terms, much less objective ones. Bush family retainers are working to deprogram him, but the president is loath to strip off his delusions of adequacy.

W. declined to tear himself away from his free-range turkey and pumpkin mousse trifle at Camp David and reassure Americans about the deadliest sectarian attack in Baghdad since the U.S. invaded. More than 200 Shiites were killed and hundreds more wounded by car bombs and a mortar attack in Sadr City. October was the bloodiest month yet for civilians, and in the last four months, some 13,000 men, women and children have died.

American helicopters and Iraqi troops did not arrive for two hours after Sunni gunmen began a siege on the Health Ministry controlled by the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who has a militia that kills Sunnis and is married to the Maliki government.

Continuing the cycle of revenge yesterday, Shiite militiamen threw kerosene on six Sunnis and set them on fire, as Iraqi soldiers watched, and killed 19 more.

The New York Times and other news outlets have been figuring out if it's time to break with the administration's use of euphemisms like "sectarian conflict." How long can you have an ever-descending descent without actually reaching the civil war?

Some analysts are calling it genocide or clash of civilizations, arguing that civil war is too genteel a term for the butchery that is destroying a nation before our very eyes. Anthony Shadid, The Washington Post reporter who won a Pulitzer Prize for his Iraq coverage, went back recently and described "the final, frenzied maturity of once-inchoate forces unleashed more than three years ago by the invasion. There was civil-war-style sectarian killing, its echoes in Lebanon a generation ago. Alongside it were gangland turf battles over money, power and survival; a raft of political parties and their militias fighting a zero-sum game; a raging insurgency; the collapse of authority; social services a chimera; and no way forward for an Iraqi government ordered to act by Americans who themselves are still seen as the final arbiter and, as a result, still depriving that government of legitimacy. Civil war was perhaps too easy a term, a little too tidy."

It will be harder to sell Congress on the idea that America's troops should be in the middle of somebody else's civil war than to convince them that we need to hang tough in the so-called front line of the so-called war on terror against Al Qaeda.

With Iraq splitting, Tony Snow indulges in the ludicrous exercise of hair-splitting. He said that in past civil wars, "people break up into clearly identifiable feuding sides clashing for supremacy." In Iraq, "you do have a lot of different forces that are trying to put pressure on the government and trying to undermine it. But it's not clear that they are operating as a unified force." But Lebanon was a shambles with multiple factions, and everybody called that a civil war.

Mr. Snow has said this is not a civil war because the fighting is not taking place in every province and because Iraqis voted in free elections. But that's like saying that the Battle of Gettysburg only took place in one small corner of the country, so there was no real American Civil War. And there were elections during our civil war too. President Lincoln was re-elected months before the war's end.

The president's comparison to how Vietnam turned out a generation later, his happy talk that Iraq is going to be fine, is preposterous.

As Neil Sheehan, a former Times reporter in Vietnam who wrote the Pulitzer Prize-winning "A Bright Shining Lie," told me: "In Vietnam, there were just two sides to the civil war. You had a government in Hanoi with a structure of command and an army and a guerrilla movement that would obey what they were told to do. So you had law and order in Saigon immediately after the war ended. In Iraq, there's no one like that for us to lose to and then do business with."

The questions are no longer whether there's a civil war or whether we can achieve a military victory. The only question is, who can we turn the country over to?

At the moment, that would be no one.

In Iraq, Reprisals Embolden Militias (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

BAGHDAD, Nov. 24 -- In a wave of reprisal killings, Shiite militiamen attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq on Friday, defying a government curfew and propelling the country further toward full-blown civil war.

The exacting of revenge for the deaths of more than 200 Shiites on Thursday came as powerful politicians linked to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr threatened to pull out of Iraq's coalition government if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki attends a scheduled meeting with President Bush next week in Amman, Jordan. A boycott by loyalists of Sadr, on whom Maliki relies for political support, could upend Iraq's fragile unity government.

Friday's attacks illustrated Iraqi security forces' inability to rein in violence, at a time when U.S. leaders want them to take greater responsibility for the country's security, a vital benchmark for any strategy to withdraw U.S. troops.

In the mixed Hurriyah neighborhood, Shiite militiamen torched at least five Sunni mosques on Islam's holiest prayer day, police and residents reported. Other mosques were attacked by gunmen spraying bullets from the rooftops of nearby houses, witnesses said.

In one mosque, militiamen detonated a cooking gas cylinder. In another, they declared that it was now a husseiniya, a Shiite mosque, and posted pictures of Sadr, whose stronghold of Sadr City was attacked Thursday. At least 18 people were killed Friday and 24 injured in the mosque attacks in Hurriyah, said Adil Mahmoud, a physician from al-Nouman Hospital in the nearby Adhamiyah neighborhood.

"They started attacking with grenades and RPGs," said Abu Abdallah, the imam at one of the attacked mosques, referring to rocket-propelled grenades. "Then shooting started from nearby houses. Then they entered and burned the mosque before they left." Abdallah, interviewed by telephone, asked that his mosque not be named. "I might be killed," he said.

In the Ghazaliya neighborhood, at least eight mortar shells hit a mosque run by the Association of Muslim Scholars, one of the most outspoken defenders of Iraq's Sunni Arab minority since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. The house of worship is one of Baghdad's best-known.

Northeast of the capital, Shiite gunmen in Baqubah opened fire at a Sunni mosque during Friday prayers, killing a mosque guard, said imam Osama al-Ani. Near the northern city of Kirkuk, a roadside bomb exploded in front of one of the biggest Sunni mosques in the area, injuring five people and damaging the building, according to police.

Meanwhile, in the northwestern city of Tall Afar, two bombs exploded near a car dealership, killing 22 people and wounding more than 40 others, police said.

The scale of Friday's revenge attacks was smaller than the wave of killings by Shiite militiamen after the bombing of the Shiite shrine in Samarra in February. That bombing triggered cycles of retaliation that further ruptured the bonds between Iraq's two major sects.

U.S. troops bolstered their patrols on Friday, flying helicopters over Sadr City and operating checkpoints. One helicopter destroyed a rocket launcher manned by a Shiite crew that had fired six rockets into the Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiyah, near the Abu Hanifa mosque, one of the most revered Sunni shrines in Baghdad, the military said.

Friday's attacks unfolded in the aftermath of the bombs, mortars and missiles that hit Sadr City on Thursday in the deadliest single assault on Iraqi civilians since the U.S.-led invasion began. The death toll in those attacks rose to more than 200. Thousands of mourners, flanked by minivans carrying wooden coffins, paraded solemnly through Sadr City on Friday, paying last respects before the dead were taken to the southern Shiite holy city of Najaf for burial.

Later, in an address after the midday prayer, members of Sadr's political party denounced the U.S. military, saying its presence was the reason for Iraq's escalating violence. They demanded a U.S. withdrawal or, at least, a timetable for the troops to leave, a demand echoed by Sadr in his Friday sermon at his mosque in the southern city of Kufa.

In previous periods of tension, Sadr loyalists have threatened to walk out of the government. Still, the current climate is unlike anything Iraq has experienced since the invasion. The attacks on Sadr City appeared to embolden Sadr and his followers as they try to capitalize on Thursday's carnage, which Shiite leaders, including Maliki, have blamed on Sunni Arab insurgents.

As long as such attacks continue, and as long as Iraqi security forces are ineffective in providing security, Sadr can justify the existence of his Mahdi Army militia.

"If the prime minister does not give up his intention to meet Bush the criminal in Amman, we will suspend our membership at the council of representatives and the government," Salih al-Ighaeli, head of Sadr's bloc in parliament, told a solemn crowd gathered on the street in front of Sadr's headquarters.

Ali Adeeb, a member of parliament and close Maliki aide, said the Sadr camp was trying to apply pressure tactics, but that the meeting would take place as planned.

The meeting between Bush and Maliki comes at a politically sensitive moment for both leaders. Bush is under pressure from Democrats who have won control of both the House and Senate to come up with a viable strategy to tamp down Iraq's violence and open the way for U.S. troops to come home.

As the sectarian divide within his government widens, Maliki is under U.S. pressure to disarm the Shiite militias, a step the U.S. military believes is needed to tame the violence. But the very people who control the militias, such as Sadr, are key political figures in Maliki's government, capable of causing his downfall.

Friday's reprisal attacks underscore how powerful the Mahdi Army and other militias have become in Iraq, operating above the law, spreading violence even under an indefinite 24-hour lockdown of the capital.

By Friday evening, the attacks were still unfolding. With no other alternative, many Sunnis were hoping for the intervention of U.S. forces.

"Up till now we are waiting for the American forces, and they haven't shown up yet," said Salman al-Zobaye, imam of al-Hashab mosque, in a telephone interview. An attack on the mosque by Shiite militiamen killed four guards.

Throughout Friday, rumors of new atrocities committed against Sunnis floated across Baghdad, including one in which six Sunnis were doused with kerosene and torched to death in Hurriyah. But two local imams, in an interview, denied such an attack took place.

But there was no shortage of confirmed incidents. In Hurriyah, militiamen Friday morning expelled Sunni families who were living near tea warehouses, and more than 90 Sunni families received letters threatening them if they did not leave their houses within 72 hours, authorities said.

In the Amiriyah neighborhood, Sunnis started to form neighborhood militias under the guidance of local clerics to protect themselves. By Friday evening, 25 volunteers signed up, and those without weapons were handed AK-47 rifles, residents said.

By nightfall, the imams of mosques in three Sunni neighborhoods -- Ghazaliya, Amiriyah and Adhamiyah made a joint announcement to their followers.

"We would like to ask you to take care and be careful for the next hours of tonight," they said. "Open fire toward any gunman who enters the city, such as the Mahdi Army, except the Americans, because they will come to protect the people from the death squads and guard the neighborhood."

The imams gave one more piece of advice to their followers: Open fire on any members of the mostly Shiite police forces. What happened in Hurriyah, the imams alleged, was done with their help.

Shiite Militia In Iraq Strike At Sunni Mosques (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 24 — Defying a government curfew, Shiite militiamen stormed Sunni mosques in Baghdad and a nearby city on Friday, shooting guards and burning down buildings in apparent retaliation for the devastating bombings that killed more than 200 people the day before in the capital's largest Shiite district, residents and police officials said.

Militia fighters drove through neighborhoods in Baghdad and the provincial capital of Baquba, firing at mosques with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades on the Muslim day of prayer.

The vengeance attacks unfolded while lawmakers loyal to the virulently anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr threatened to boycott the government if Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki met with President Bush next week in Jordan. Mr. Sadr controls one of the biggest blocs of seats in Parliament, and on Friday he reiterated his claim that the American presence was the root cause of the rising violence in Iraq.

But it was Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, that Sunni residents blamed for the attacks on Friday. From morning until afternoon, at least four mosques were attacked in Hurriya, a mixed neighborhood in the capital. Two were destroyed, and at least 5 Sunnis were killed and 10 wounded, an Interior Ministry official said. A hard-line Sunni Arab group, the Muslim Scholars Association, said 18 people had been killed when one of the mosques burned down.

Iraqi security forces were absent, unwilling or unable to stop the attackers.

"I live near Akbar al-Mustafa Mosque, which came under attack by gunmen around 7 this morning," said a man who gave his name as Abu Ruqaiya and lives in Hurriya. "Around 3 in the afternoon, those gunmen bombed this mosque and destroyed part of it. They left only after American and Iraqi soldiers arrived."

Some fighting continued into the evening, as gunmen in the neighborhood battled the invading fighters, the Interior Ministry official said.

President Jalal Talabani urged calm at a news conference after an evening meeting of Iraq's top leaders. He also said he was postponing a weekend trip to Iran because the government had shut down Baghdad International Airport.

White House officials ignored the Sadr bloc's threats to withdraw from the government, and said there were no plans to cancel the president's meetings with Mr. Maliki scheduled for Wednesday and Thursday. "Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item when President Bush meets with Prime Minister Maliki in just a few days," said Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman. "These ruthless acts of violence are deplorable. It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocent civilians in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed."

He also repeated the administration's insistence that Iraq was not in a civil war. "We're constantly asked that question, and while the situation is serious, Prime Minister Maliki and President Talabani have said they do not believe it is a civil war," he said.

The bloodletting over the past 24 hours amounted to one of the worst spasms of violence since the Americans toppled Saddam Hussein in 2003, raising fears that vengeance attacks could grow to the level of those after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February. Then, over five days, hundreds of people were killed, with Shiite militiamen shooting Sunni imams, burning down mosques and stalking Sunni Arabs door-to-door in neighborhoods.

The attacks on Friday came despite a traffic ban the Iraqi government imposed across the capital starting Thursday evening. American troops stepped up patrols and operated checkpoints across much of the city, and most of the capital's neighborhoods remained calm as residents heeded the curfew. In the downtown neighborhood of Karada, children could be seen playing soccer in the empty streets.

In the vast Sadr City district, where the Thursday bombings took place, an attack helicopter destroyed a rocket launcher seen firing into the nearby Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiya, the military said. An official from the Sadr office said at least three civilians had been wounded.

In the far north, two suicide bombers, one in a car and the other on foot, attacked an outdoor car market in the insurgent-rife city of Tal Afar, killing at least 20 people and wounding at least 42.

The violence comes at a politically fraught time for Mr. Maliki, particularly since he is preparing to meet Mr. Bush in Amman. Both men face increasing pressure from their publics to come up with a strategy for stemming the carnage in Iraq, and both are navigating rising tensions between their governments.

The announcement of a possible boycott by Mr. Sadr's bloc further endangers Mr. Maliki's political fortunes. Mr. Sadr effectively controls Sadr City, and the attacks on Thursday appeared to have strengthened his standing and emboldened him. Mr. Sadr has used attacks against Shiites as a justification for keeping his militia despite demands by the Iraqi and American governments that he disband it.

"The occupation forces should shoulder the full responsibility for these deeds, and we call for them to end their rule in Iraq by withdrawing or at least setting a timetable for withdrawal," Salih al-Igaili, a Sadr legislator, said. "If the security situation does not improve, as well as basic services, and if the prime minister does not retreat from his intent to meet the criminal Bush in Amman, we will suspend our membership in the Iraqi Parliament and the government."

Mr. Sadr, in a speech delivered at Friday sermons in the southern city of Kufa, did not mention the boycott threat, but did repeat his usual demand of a timetable for withdrawal from the Americans. He also called on a militant Sunni Arab cleric, Sheik Harith al-Dhari, to issue an edict forbidding the murder of Shiites.

Blocs in Parliament, including Mr. Sadr's, have threatened to walk out before. Mr. Maliki, a conservative Shiite, relies on Mr. Sadr for political support against Shiite rivals, and a withdrawal of Mr. Sadr's legislators from the 275-member Parliament could upend the power balance within the main Shiite political coalition. Mr. Sadr controls at least 30 seats in Parliament and three cabinet positions, including that of the Health Ministry, which was besieged for two hours on Thursday by Sunni Arab insurgents armed with mortars and assault rifles.

Some American officials also argue that Mr. Sadr's engagement in politics is necessary for any hope of a peaceful disarmament of his militia, which has thousands of fighters and has twice rebelled against the American military. But at the same time, Mr. Sadr's strong ties to Mr. Maliki make it difficult for the prime minister to crack down on the Mahdi Army. The mosque attacks on Friday underscored the dangers posed by the militias and highlighted the means by which they are ratcheting up, day by day, the violence here.

"My daughter lives near Mishhada mosque in this neighborhood, and she says gunmen killed and wounded some people there," Abu Ruqaiya said in a phone interview. "There were clashes with the guards of the mosque." Another resident of Hurriya said militiamen burned down the empty home of a former member of the Baath Party.

Fanned by fear, rumors spread quickly throughout the day. In the evening, a resident named Imad al-Hashemi said in a telephone interview on Al Jazeera, the Arab news network, that gunmen had doused some people with gasoline and set them on fire. Other residents contacted by telephone denied this.

In Baquba, northeast of Baghdad, gunmen opened fire on a Sunni mosque and battled with guards there, a police official said. Militants also shot at the provincial government center and the police headquarters. Insurgents destroyed the minaret of a Shiite mosque near the market with explosives or projectiles, the police official said.

The police in Baghdad discovered at least 31 bodies across the city on Friday, most showing signs of torture, The Associated Press reported.

The Interior Ministry official in Baghdad updated the death toll from the Sadr City bombings on Thursday to 202. At least 256 others had been wounded. In the morning, hundreds of mourners poured into the streets of the sprawling district to join processions of cars with wooden coffins strapped to their roofs. Women in black robes beat their chests while men waved pistols from car windows to clear the streets.

"I stayed up the entire night talking with friends and neighbors about what happened," said Ghaith Qassim, 35, a clothing vendor at a funeral. "We're so angry and sad over this. The people here blame the leaders of the government."

In one corner of Sadr City, a three-minibus convoy wound its way through fetid streets, bound for the Shiite cemetery in the holy city of Najaf. The first two vehicles each had a single coffin strapped to its roof. The third had three, all with the bodies of victims from the same family.

Sunnis Set On Fire (NSDY)

By Timothy M. Phelps

Newsday, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Militiamen doused six Sunnis with kerosene and burned them alive as they left Friday prayers in Baghdad, sending new shocks through a city that thought it had seen it all.

Despite a total curfew, the capital was a battle zone, complicating major diplomatic initiatives from the Bush administration and the independent Baker commission.

Four mosques and several homes in the neighborhood of Hurriyah were attacked by Shia militiamen in apparent reprisal for a string of car bomb explosions Thursday in Sadr City, Baghdad's Shia heartland. In that violence, Sunni insurgents killed at least 215 people in Iraq's deadliest week in more than three years of destruction since the U.S. invasion.

Friday's gruesome immolations -- a seemingly new method of brutality in the sectarian fighting -- were reported by the Associated Press, quoting an Iraqi police captain, and topped off a day in which at least 87 people were killed or found dead across Iraq.

Imad al-Hasimi, a Sunni elder in Hurriyah, told Al-Arabiya television he saw people who were drenched in kerosene and then set afire, burning to death before his eyes, according to the Associated Press.

Reports from correspondents in Baghdad indicated gun battles continued into the night despite the curfew, a measure that had been effective in past crises.

There also was fighting in Sadr City on Friday between Shia militiamen and a U.S. helicopter. Further north in Tal Afar, an area supposedly pacified by a concentration of U.S. troops, 23 people were killed and 43 wounded by two bomb explosions outside a car dealership, police said.

A major political crisis also loomed, as supporters of Muqtada al-Sadr, the most militant Shia leader in the government, demanded that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki cancel meetings planned in Amman, Jordan, next week with President George W. Bush -- or the al-Sadr faction would "suspend" its participation in Maliki's government.

Such an edict is not easy for Maliki to ignore because al-Sadr is his biggest supporter and his government would likely fall if the cleric fully withdrew his support. On the other hand, Maliki can hardly afford to offend Bush at this precarious moment, either.

There has been a frenzy of diplomatic activity in the region in apparent anticipation of sweeping new recommendations expected next month from the Baker-Hamilton commission that is studying U.S. Iraq policy. Syria and Iran were holding top-level meetings with Iraqi leaders as Vice President Dick Cheney flew to Saudi Arabia for meetings there Saturday.

The White House insisted Friday that Bush's unprecedented two-day meeting with Maliki, starting Wednesday, would continue as scheduled despite the threats from al-Sadr's followers.

Baker's report is expected in mid-December and, because the commission's work already has been embraced by Bush, it could have a major impact on restructuring U.S. policy toward Iraq.

The fighting in Baghdad this week came despite months of effort by U.S. troops brought in from other parts of Iraq to pacify the capital. An estimated 70 percent of the population of the city is Shia; 20 percent is Sunni and 10 percent Kurd. But the Sunnis are hardened fighters who control the western section of the city and if the fighting continues to rage, they are likely to call in reinforcements from Sunni areas to the west, according to Iraq experts.

CNN.com, November 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Enraged Shiites burned people to death, torched mosques and denounced Sunni leaders and the United States a day after a bloody assault on Sadr City, the Iraq capital's Shiite bastion.

That coordinated strike, which killed more than 200 and wounded more 250 Thursday, is considered the worst of the Iraq war, and Sunni militants are widely assumed to have carried it out.

Witnesses said Shiite gunmen on Friday attacked two mosques with rocket-propelled grenades and burned two other Sunni mosques in the largely Shiite area of Hurriya in northwestern Baghdad.

They reported people attacking Sunni houses with hand grenades and rocket-propelled grenades. Shiite militiamen are also said to have doused Sunnis with kerosene and burned them, and shot at other people.

One witness reported at least five people were killed. An official with the Association of Muslim Scholars, a Sunni group, said many more were killed and wounded but could not confirm numbers.

Iraqi Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said clashes erupted between two groups in Hurriya. U.S. and Iraqi troops then arrived at the scene, set up checkpoints and restored control.

The U.S. military said it could not confirm the reports of people and mosques being torched.

In Sadr City itself, two people were hurt when U.S. helicopters fired on tents set up for funerals, police said.

Mourners said they were shooting weapons in the air to commemorate the dead -- not firing at the helicopters.

But the U.S. military said troops destroyed rocket launchers that had fired six rockets.

Two Sunni Arab neighborhoods -- Ghazaliya and Adhamiya -- also withstood a barrage of mortar fire that wounded 10 people earlier.

The new attacks and counterattacks threaten to bring Iraq to the brink of all-out civil war, a process that has escalated since the February bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad. Since then, thousands have fled their homes for other neighborhoods and countries in the face of Sunni-Shiite vendettas.

Thousands more have been slain. Sectarian violence has left its imprint with the daily discovery of tortured bodies around the capital despite U.S. and Iraqi military efforts to stem the brutality.Al-Sadr bloc threatens walkout

The carnage came as anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's bloc threatened to withdraw support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki should he meet President Bush as planned next week.

Such a move could jeopardize the stability of al-Maliki's administration, which has relied on the support of both the United States and fellow Shiites.

In a statement that aired on Iraqi TV, al-Sadr representative Salih al-Akeili blamed U.S.-led forces for fostering conditions that led to the massacre Thursday in Sadr City.

"We announce that if the security situation and the basic services do not improve, and if the prime minister goes ahead and meets with the criminal Bush in Amman, then we will suspend our memberships with the Iraqi parliament and the government," said al-Akeili, a member of al-Sadr's bloc in Iraq's parliament.

Al-Akeili said his bloc -- with 30 seats in the 275-member parliament and six Cabinet ministries -- is demanding an end to the occupation and a withdrawal from Iraq, with a timetable for such a departure.

The White House said the talks in Jordan would go forward.

DOJ_NMG_0098412

"It's an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government, and it is not going to work," deputy White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. "Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item" when Bush and Maliki meet.

Al-Maliki's office has not responded to the threat.

U.S. commanders suspect al-Sadr's militia, the Mehdi Army, has been responsible for sectarian violence against Sunnis, although the cleric has denounced such attacks.Al-Sadr challenge to Sunni leader

Meanwhile, al-Sadr challenged a top Sunni leader -- Sheikh Hareth al-Dhari, the head of the Association of Muslim Scholars -- to take steps to end the violence, including the issuance of fatwas, or Islamic decrees.

Speaking in the southern city of Kufa, near Najaf, during prayers Friday, al-Sadr said one fatwa should "prohibit the killing of all Shiite Muslims because this will save the blood of Muslims in Iraq."

Another should prohibit people from joining al Qaeda or any party "harboring hatred against the descendants of the Prophet Mohammed."

"We condemn and denounce the blasts," he said.

Police called the strikes the worst since the war began in 2003. The Iraqi Interior Ministry imposed a curfew for Baghdad on Thursday evening. It's unclear how long the curfew will last. Baghdad International Airport also was closed till further notice.

The bloodshed drew a strong denunciation from the United States.

"We condemn such acts of violence that are clearly aimed at undermining the Iraqi people's hopes for a peaceful and stable Iraq," said deputy White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

Meanwhile, police reported a U.S. raid on al-Sadr's office in Baquba, a provincial capital northeast of Baghdad. Five people were detained, and weapons were seized. The U.S. military said it was checking the report. Other violence

Also Friday, a suicide bomber killed 22 and wounded 30 after detonating explosives strapped to his body and in a car in the northern city of Tal Afar, authorities said.

The attacker parked his vehicle, got out and set off the car bomb in a car lot before detonating himself, police said. Tal Afar, a largely Turkmen city in Nineveh province, is about 250 miles (400 kilometers) north of Baghdad. Tal Afar has endured Sunni-Shiite sectarian fighting in the past, but it isn't clear what the motive was for Friday's attack.

In the southern city of Basra, a British soldier was shot dead Friday during a "search and detention operation," the British Defense Ministry said. The number of British military deaths in the Iraq war stands at 126.

Mosques Hit Amid Baghdad Clashes (BBC)

Gunmen have attacked a Sunni Arab area of Baghdad, burning mosques and homes, with at least 30 people reported killed, according to police officials.

The attacks were in apparent revenge for Thursday's bombings that killed more than 200 people in the Shia Sadr City district of the Iraqi capital.

Fleets of vans left Baghdad to take the coffins of those victims for burial in the ancient Shia holy city of Najaf.

The latest violence came despite a city-wide curfew and appeals for calm.

To add to the Iraqi government's woes, a key Shia group threatened to quit parliament and the cabinet if Prime Minister Nouri Maliki goes ahead with a planned meeting with President Bush next week.

It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government

White House spokesman

There is a real feeling that the situation is moving to the brink amid the cycle of attacks, says the BBC's David Loyn in Baghdad.

Thursday's bombing and retaliatory attacks were "deplorable", the White House said.

"It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

DOJ_NMG_0098413

Iraqi police said some 30 people had been killed, but a defence ministry officials told the French news agency, AFP, that the clashes were so intense that precise information was difficult to obtain.

Clashes also erupted in Sadr City on Friday, where residents said a US helicopter fired on militiamen who were launching rocket attacks.

Violence was also reported in other parts of Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq, including in the northern town of Talafar where a suspected double suicide bombing killed at least 22 people.

Baghdad has been under an indefinite curfew since Thursday's bombings and the airport remains closed.

The security situation has forced Iraqi President Jalal Talabani to postpone a visit to Tehran on Saturday for talks with his Iranian counterpart Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

During the curfew, the only people and vehicles officially allowed on the streets of Baghdad were the residents of Sadr City who began the journey to bury their dead.

Thousands of mourners came out onto the streets, walking alongside a seemingly endless fleet of mini-buses, each carrying a coffin on its roof.

The bodies were then driven to an ancient cemetery in the holy city of Najaf, the traditional burial place for Shias, 160km (100 miles) south of Baghdad.

Thursday's multiple car bomb attacks in Sadr City - in which 250 people were also wounded - were the deadliest in Iraq since the US-led invasion of 2003.

Moqtada Sadr's group is calling for US forces to leave

Sadr City is largely controlled by the Mehdi Army, a Shia Iraqi militias accused of carrying out many sectarian attacks on Sunni areas.

Thursday's bombings could have a deep political impact, with the group led by radical cleric Moqtada Sadr calling on Mr Maliki to call off his planned talks with President Bush.

People in Sadr City faced insurgent attacks as well as repeated raids by US forces, the group said in a statement.

Mr Sadr's followers hold six cabinet posts and have 30 members in the 275-seat parliament.

The withdrawal of the group headed by Mr Sadr would be a major blow to an already unstable government, the BBC's Andy Gallacher in Baghdad says.

The meeting with Mr Maliki is due to take place in Jordan, and a White House spokesman said on Friday there had been no changes to Mr Bush's schedule.

The U.S. In Iraq: What's Next? (WSJ)

By Lauren Etter

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

President Bush said last week he won't make any immediate decisions about troop levels in Iraq, despite mounting pressure to change course on the war. * * *

But it is clear the administration is in search of a new strategy. The electoral shake-up in Congress and recent sharp rise in sectarian violence in Iraq have served as a powerful wake-up call. Prominent politicians from both parties are offering up ideas for a change -- ranging from an immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops to a substantial increase.

Meantime, a bipartisan team led by former Secretary of State James Baker is expected to present the president with a report on recommended next steps in Iraq sometime next month. A separate military panel will provide its own strategy recommendations in the coming weeks.

Here's a look at some of the proposals being floated:

Withdrawal: Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) is calling for all troops to withdraw from Iraq "at the earliest practicable date." Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) is proposing a gradual withdrawal over the next four to six months. The Levin proposal has become one of the more popular views among Democrats, and even has the support of some Republicans. Critics say that an abrupt U.S. withdrawal would only open the door to deeper sectarian violence.

Leslie Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations and an adviser to the Baker commission, says any talk about troop withdrawals needs to be coupled with a political settlement. He advocates splitting Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions that divide oil revenue. Some are calling for Iraq's neighbors, Syria and Iran, to be included in any discussion on Iraq's future.

More troops: There are about 141,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) is calling for a boost to stabilize the country and provide Iraqis more security and training. He has informally proposed sending an additional 20,000 troops to Iraq, which he says would entail expanding the Army and Marine Corps by as many as 100,000 people. Analysts say it is unlikely the Pentagon would send that many -- if it increases troop levels at all.

One problem with a sharp troop increase: U.S. ground forces are already stretched thinly around the world. About 40% of the U.S. military's deployable combat brigades are in Iraq and Afghanistan. In theory, a troop increase could come from decreasing the time between deployments and increasing the length of combat time. But that could result in exhaustion among soldiers. Already more soldiers are receiving just one year at home -- instead of two -- for every year deployed.

Unchanged troop levels: The middle-road option is to maintain current troop levels. Central Command leader General John Abizaid told the Senate Armed Forces Committee earlier this month that "the troop levels need to stay where they are." He said a reduction would lead to more sectarian violence, while an increase would further strain the military. However, he would have troops shift their role to more of an advisory one, making sure Iraqi security forces are "more capable in their ability to confront the sectarian problem."

This view is in line with the one voiced by Mr. Bush, who has maintained that U.S. troops need to stay in Iraq until "victory" is achieved -- that is, until Iraq can govern and defend itself. Public opinion polls, however, show that about 52% of Americans want to see the number of troops in Iraq reduced, while 39% of Americans would like to see troop levels maintained.

Draft: Rep. Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.) advocates reviving the military draft, which was ended in 1973. He argues the costs of the current war are falling too heavily on the underprivileged. That proposal, however, is unlikely to generate much support in Congress, and has little support at the Pentagon.

Army Expands Training For Advisers Who Will Try To Improve Iraq's Security Forces (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

FORT RILEY, Kan., Nov. 18 — This wind-swept stretch of Kansas has become the hub of a major new push by the United States Army to overhaul its effort to advise Iraq's fledgling security forces.

Following a disappointing performance by many Iraqi units and complaints that earlier efforts to train American advisers had been handicapped by bureaucratic inertia, the Army has handed the mission to Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, who had a previous stint as a commander in Iraq.

Along with nearly 1,000 soldiers from his First Infantry Division, General Ham has sought to improve the training of the advisers as the Army has moved to upgrade the quality of these teams.

The revamped effort began with little fanfare this summer, but has gained prominence in recent weeks as experts inside and outside the government have recommended that the military expand the advisers' ranks as part of a renewed push to strengthen the Iraqi security forces.

The Army is "transitioning from an endeavor that has been less than a high priority to one that is of the highest priority," said Jack Keane, a retired four-star general who served as the Army vice chief of staff during the first months of the war. "And it is long overdue."

Senior American military commanders calculate that strengthening the Iraqi forces, paired with efforts at political reconciliation by the Iraqi government, will enable the Iraqis to take more responsibility for their security and allow the United States to eventually begin withdrawing its forces.

But to date, the Iraqi Army has had trouble providing all the reinforcements American commanders have requested for the stepped-up security operation in Baghdad, even as the level of sectarian violence there soars. At the same time, Iraq's government has yet to confront the country's militias, some of which have significant sway over police units. It remains far from clear whether increasing the number and caliber of American advisers can provide enough of the security gains the United States is seeking.

Still, in recent exercises, the would-be advisers were confronted with an early dose of reality, in training that included some of the vexing scenarios they are likely to face in Iraq: an Iraqi battalion commander quarreling angrily with his Iraqi police counterpart, Iraqi troops who roughed up a detainee and an Iraqi crowd irate at the troops who had conducted a surprise raid.

The American Army has long experience in training and deploying military advisers, most notably in Vietnam. There, the Army began with an active advisory program before the fighting escalated into a major conflict. In Iraq, however, the war began with major combat; American advisers, now called "transition teams," were introduced later, almost as an afterthought. "When we first started this transition-team business in both Iraq and Afghanistan, it was very much a hit-and-miss proposition," said General Ham, who acknowledged that the program faced early problems. "The selection of individuals for duty on transition teams was probably more haphazard than any of us would have liked. The training was not standardized across the various training locations. It does not appear that it was well-resourced across the force.

"I think that was what led to some of the earlier criticisms, and in my view the criticism was fair and justified," General Ham added. "We need to do it better, and this initiative that started the training here at Fort Riley is a part of that."

There are currently more than 4,000 American troops organized into more than 430 teams to advise the Iraqi Army, police forces and border guards. General John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, said recently that the United States planned to increase the size of the teams, which generally have 11 members, so that they can better train Iraqi battalions, which can have more than 700 soldiers. General Abizaid also said that the plan was to attach the advisers not only to Iraqi battalions but also at lower levels, to companies and possibly even platoons. Those ideas, however, have yet to be incorporated in the advisers' training program.

General Ham worked with senior officers from two of his brigades to organize the program, which lasts a jam-packed 60 days. Soldiers practice a variety of combat skills, including how to counter the ever-present roadside bombs. They also receive some cultural training and, for those headed to Iraq, 50 hours of Arabic language instruction — enough to provide only the most rudimentary skills but more training than most advisers had previously received. There is additional training in Kuwait and at the sprawling American military base at Taji, Iraq.

According to General Ham, the advisory teams include more active-duty soldiers than during the early days of the program, when reservists were more commonly used. As a matter of Army policy, staffing the teams is now a higher priority for Army personnel officers than filling the empty slots in units on alert to deploy to Iraq and Afghanistan.

According to current plans, Fort Riley will train the majority of the Army teams that are sent to advise the Iraqi Army, national police and border guards. The rest of the Army teams are to be drawn from units in Iraq. (The Marines train their own advisers separately.)

In the field, the teams are managed by Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, an assistant division commander, who provides feedback to Fort Riley. The expectation is that American advisers will still be attached to Iraqi military and police units even after the withdrawal of American combat forces is under way.

"I feel like we'll be the last men standing at the end of the U.S. presence here," General Pittard observed in August.

Maj. Andrew Yerkes, who is leading a team that is to advise Iraq's National Police, was thrust in a difficult situation during a recent exercise. A squabble broke out between a person playing the role of an Iraqi battalion commander and another acting as an Iraqi police captain over how to secure the town, a possible situation since Iraq's army is largely Shiite and the police in Sunni areas are recruited from local communities. Within minutes, the Iraqi battalion commander stormed off, leaving Major Yerkes and his soldiers to ponder how they might better defuse tensions in the future.

"It showed my team a different piece of culture we have not been exposed to and forced us to think our way through a problem," he said.

General Ham is still looking for ways to improve the training. For instance, he hopes to arrange for the teams of advisers to do some training with the American combat brigades they will work with in Iraq.

Another constraint is the absence of actual Iraqis, or in the case of teams being trained for Afghan duty, Afghan soldiers.

Qualified Iraqi commanders are needed far more urgently in Iraq, so the roles of commanders, interpreters and townspeople in the exercises are played by American soldiers and contractors who were born in Iraq or are of Arab descent. (The battalion commander in Major Yerkes's exercise lives in San Diego and left Iraq many years ago.)

Even so, the trainees say the exercises are useful. Maj. William Cotty, one of a small number of Special Forces officers who have volunteered to serve as advisers, is leading an advisory team that will be assigned to an Iraqi Army unit. A seasoned officer who served in Colombia and Afghanistan, Major Cotty was put to the test during a raid he conducted with a mock Iraqi battalion commander.

Major Cotty helped the "Iraqis" plan a raid to capture a suspected insurgent in the fictional town of Surdash, speaking through an interpreter to the battalion commander, in this case an Arabic-speaking American soldier who was born in Sudan. In the exercise, the operation led to a firefight in which a suspected insurgent was killed. The "Iraqis" hauled away a captive and began to pummel him as an angry crowd began yelling at the Americans. In an effort to disperse the crowd, Major Cotty fired several blanks into the air.

At a review conducted immediately afterward, the advisers were cautioned to make sure the suspected insurgents they planned to capture had not been picked out by Iraqi units as part of a sectarian or personal vendetta.

Officers observing the exercise also suggested that the major might have taken other steps before firing warning shots, since the shots might encourage Iraqi soldiers to fire wildly. The Americans, for example, might have brought along a loudspeaker and used their interpreter to talk to the townspeople about the point of the raid. Major Cotty said the exercise was helpful.

"According to the book on direct action, I had speed, surprise and violence of action," he said. "The number one thing I probably took away from this was the loudspeaker," he said.

Funerals, Revenge Killings After Iraq Attacks (AP)

Associated Press, November 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Gunmen raided two Shiite homes in Diyala province, a hotbed of Iraq's Sunni-Arab insurgency, and shot and killed 21 men in front of their relatives, police said Saturday.

The attack by suspected insurgents on Friday night targeted members of the al-Sawed Shiite tribe in the village of Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, a police officer said, speaking on condition of anonymity to protect his own security, as officials often do in the increasingly volatile province.

He said police could not reach the remote village to collect the bodies and take them to a morgue until Saturday morning. The province, almost equally divided between Sunnis and Shiites, is the site of many sectarian attacks.

Also Saturday, U.S. and Iraqi forces killed 22 insurgents and an Iraqi civilian, and destroyed a factory being used to make roadside bombs, during several raids north of Baghdad. No coalition casualties were reported.

Baghdad remained under a 24-hour curfew Saturday as coalition forces tried to prevent a surge of revenge attacks for the five bombings and two mortar rounds that killed 215 people in the Shiite slum of Sadr City on Thursday.

Such violence was particularly gruesome on Friday, when suspected Shiite militiamen seized six Sunnis as they left prayer services at mosques and burned them alive with kerosene in an attack in the mostly Shia neighborhood of Hurriyah.

Iraqi soldiers at a nearby army post failed to intervene in the assault by suspected members of the Shiite Mahdi Army militia or subsequent attacks that killed at least 19 other Sunnis, including women and children, in the same neighborhood, said police Capt. Jamil Hussein.

In recent months, most of the thousands of dead bodies that have been found dumped across Baghdad and other cities in central Iraq have been of victims who were tortured and then shot to death, according to police.

The suspected militia killers often have used electric drills on their captives' bodies before killing them. The bodies are frequently decapitated. But burning victims alive introduced a new method of brutality that was likely to be reciprocated by the other sect as the Shiites and Sunnis continue killing one another in unprecedented numbers.

Friday's gruesome attack capped a day during which at least 87 people were killed or found dead in sectarian violence across Iraq. In Hurriyah, the rampaging militiamen also burned and blew up four mosques and torched several homes in the district, Hussein said.

The chaos cast a shadow over the Amman, Jordan, summit next week between Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. President George W. Bush.

Politicians loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr have threatened to boycott parliament and the Cabinet if al-Maliki goes ahead with the meeting. The political bloc, known as Sadrists, is a mainstay of support for al-Maliki. The Mahdi Army is the organization's armed wing.

For a second day Saturday, funeral processions were held in Sadr City for the victims of Thursday's deadly attack by Sunni insurgents there. An official from al-Sadr's main office in Sadr City visited hospitals treating some of the 257 people who were wounded in the attack, and he gave them small donations of cash in envelopes.

Visiting tents that have been set up in Sadr City for families conducting funerals, the official, Ibrahim al-Jabiri, sharply criticized Iraq's government and its forces for failing to stop such attacks.

During three of the coalition raids that took place north of Baghdad on Saturday morning, soldiers killed 10 insurgents near the city of Taji, which is 12 miles north of Baghdad and home to a major U.S. air base. An Iraqi teenage boy also was killed and a pregnant Iraqi woman was wounded in the crossfire, the military said.

U.S. aircraft were called in to destroy a factory being used to make roadside bombs, and soldiers searching the area also found hidden caches of rocket-propelled grenades, machine guns, anti-aircraft weapons and pipe bombs.

Many U.S. soldiers are killed and wounded in Iraq by powerful roadside bombs used by insurgents.

"Coalition forces strive to mitigate risks to civilians while in pursuit of terrorists. It is always a shame when terrorists hide among civilian women and children, putting them in harm's way," the U.S. military said.

In another area north of Baghdad, coalition forces attacked three vehicles carrying 12 insurgents, including one they were searching for because he allegedly was involved in the manufacture of car bombs, the coalition said. The soldiers opened fire on the cars when they ignored warning shots, and all the militants were killed, the military said.

No soldiers or civilians were wounded during that operation. The coalition declined to give its exact location.

More U.S. Troops Dying In Anbar Province (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

In the three months since thousands of U.S. forces poured into Baghdad to quash escalating violence, far more American troops have died in Iraq's volatile western Anbar province than in the capital city.

More than two-thirds of the 245 U.S. casualties between Aug. 7, the start of the Baghdad offensive, and Nov. 7 occurred outside Baghdad — which military leaders have called the "center of gravity" of Iraq, and the key to success in the war. Four in 10 deaths over those three months have been in Anbar province, a Sunni insurgency stronghold where U.S. Marines have largely taken the lead.

Marines, who comprise only about 15 percent of the 141,000 U.S. forces currently in Iraq, accounted for nearly 28 percent of the fatalities over the three-month period.

The Baghdad assault, dubbed Operation Together Forward, started slowly in June. It escalated in early August when about 7,200 additional U.S. troops, including an agile Stryker brigade, were brought into enforce a broad array of checkpoints, curfews and house-to-house searches.

As total U.S. war casualties mounted through this summer and into the fall — from a total of about 2,500 by mid-June to more than 2,870 now — military officials blamed the rise on the Baghdad offensive, as well as the holy observance of Ramadan. The escalating violence made October the fourth deadliest month since the war began.

"Baghdad is the center of gravity for Iraq. We must get it right in Baghdad," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said at the time. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld added, "Most of the violence occurs within 30 kilometers of Baghdad."

In terms of actual U.S. casualties, the opposite was true.

Most of the 245 deaths during the first three months of Operation Together Forward occurred beyond Baghdad's boundaries. According to an analysis by The Associated Press, there were 73 casualties in Baghdad between Aug. 7 and Nov. 7, while there were 103 in Anbar.

In comparison, during the first three months of 2006, there were 148 U.S. military deaths in Iraq — nearly 100 fewer than the August-November timeframe.

The death count in Anbar, combined with the deadly spike in sectarian attacks in Baghdad this week, paints a picture of an Iraq still teetering on the brink of civil war, battered by religious divisions, al-Qaida terrorists and a stubborn and diverse insurgency.

The unabated violence comes as the Bush administration and the U.S. military are conducting several wide-ranging reviews of Iraq war policy under the critical eyes of Democrats who are poised to take control of both houses of Congress early next year. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton, is expected to issue its report soon.

Little more than a week ago, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, Gen. John Abizaid, acknowledged that the Sunni-dominated Anbar province was still not under control. Yet, military officials and Rumsfeld have often asserted that most of the violence in Iraq has been near Baghdad, and that the military effort must be centered there.

The problems in Anbar prompted U.S. military officials last week to move more than 2,200 additional Marines to the western province in a short-term effort to shore up U.S. combat power there.

Such troop shifts have drawn criticism from Congress in the past. In August, as the Pentagon prepared for the Baghdad operation, Republican Senator John McCain likened the positioning of forces in Iraq to a game of "whack-a-mole," where generals try to curb violence in one area only to see it pop up somewhere else.

Overall, the U.S. Army — which has roughly 108,000 soldiers in Iraq — has borne the brunt of the deaths throughout the war, including 163 of the 245 deaths the AP looked at during the three-month period. There were 68 Marines killed during that time, along with seven Navy members and six in the Air Force, and one was unknown.

The most prevalent cause of death has remained the same across the country. Roadside bombs and other improvised explosive devices caused about 40 percent of the casualties, while another 13 percent were caused by small arms fire or snipers and 33 percent by unspecified combat incidents. Other causes of death included vehicle and helicopter crashes and non-combat incidents.

The high rate of Marine deaths is due in part to the fact that most are performing combat duties in the dangerous Anbar region. While the Army has a much larger presence in Iraq, some soldiers are serving in support roles or working in the headquarters units and are not doing combat duty.

Gen. James T. Conway, commandant of the U.S. Marine Corps, said this week that the decision to send more troops to Anbar is an effort to take advantage of "some of the momentum that is taking place. ... It is reinforcing success based on what we see the tribes doing."

Brzezinski Calls Idea To Boost U.S. Forces In Iraq A `Gimmick' (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson

Bloomberg, November 25, 2006

Nov. 24 (Bloomberg) -- Zbigniew Brzezinski, a former U.S. national security adviser, said it would be ``a gimmick" for the Defense Department to increase the number of troops in Iraq temporarily before beginning to withdraw them.

``I wouldn't be at all surprised if that actually happens," Brzezinski said on ``Political Capital with Al Hunt," to air on Bloomberg Television this weekend.

``It's a gimmick because it satisfies McCain, it satisfies the hardliners," Brzezinski said, referring to Senator John McCain. The Arizona Republican, who is exploring a run for the presidency in 2008, said Nov. 19 that U.S. troops are ``fighting and dying for a failed policy" in Iraq unless they get enough reinforcements to ensure a military victory.

A Defense Department review of Iraq options is likely to advocate an immediate increase of as many as 30,000 American troops, followed by a reduction to perhaps less than half the 140,000 now there, the Washington Post reported Nov. 20. President George W. Bush is also expecting advice from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group on stabilizing Iraq for an eventual pullout.

Brzezinski said U.S. and Iraqi officials should jointly announce a withdrawal date for American troops that comes before the end of 2007. Even in the best possible outcome, though, Iraq isn't likely to be secular or democratic, he said.

``Obviously it's not going to be what we have previously described as a victory," he said.

Advising Democrats

With Democrats set to take control of the U.S. Congress, Bush is under pressure to address concerns about how long U.S. military personnel will be in Iraq. Brzezinski is scheduled to discuss the issue with House Democrats at a Dec. 5 meeting.

Brzezinski, 78, advised President Jimmy Carter from 1977 to 1981 and is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. During his White House tenure, the U.S. normalized relations with China and reached an agreement with the former Soviet Union to curtail nuclear weapons.

His prediction about Iraq coincides with assessments by other former policy makers. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who negotiated the Paris Peace Accords in 1973 that led to the U.S. pullout from Vietnam, said Nov. 19 that a ``clear" military victory in Iraq isn't ``possible."

Vietnam Worry

Brzezinski, addressing whether U.S. officials will temporarily boost the number of troops and then cut them, said:

``My concern is that they'll do it slowly and then, in the end, inadvertently, they will imitate our bug-out from Vietnam," he said. ``Namely, we'll blame the Iraqis and leave, thereby creating the worst of all situations."

Brzezinski said the U.S. should talk to Iraqi leaders about a date for a U.S. departure from the country to ``flush out those Iraqi leaders who have staying power," and then make sure to announce the pullout jointly.

The Iraqis should then invite their Muslim neighbors, along with Pakistan, Morocco and Algeria, to an international conference to discuss ways to stabilize the country after the Americans leave, Brzezinski said.

Lastly, the U.S. should organize an international effort to help the economic recovery of Iraq after the U.S. withdrawal, Brzezinski said.

``With the passage of time, the chances of implementing that advice effectively are being reduced," he said. ``That's a tragedy."

`Basis for Power'

After a U.S. withdrawal, Iraq isn't likely to be stable, and the ``basis for power" will be a coalition between the Shiites and Kurds, Brzezinski said.

Brzezinski also questioned the Bush administration's policy on Iran, calling it ``self-defeating." Asked whether the U.S. should have to accept the reality of the Iranians obtaining nuclear weapons, he said, ``I'm not entirely convinced they are really seeking them."

The Iranian leadership is ``seeking a comprehensive nuclear program" that would put the country in a position to produce nuclear weapons, Brzezinski said.

``Japan can produce nuclear weapons very quickly, but they haven't done it, and I think that's where Iran wants to end up," he said.

Uncle Charlie Wants You! (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Harlem Congressman Charles Rangel created a stir once again this week with his call for renewing the military draft. His own party leaders quickly disavowed any such plan, suggesting just how unpopular the idea is among most Americans. Yet the proposal deserves some further inspection before it vanishes, if only to expose its false assumptions about the current U.S. military.

A vocal Iraq war critic, Mr. Rangel told CBS News recently, "There's no question in my mind that this President and this Administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the Administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way."

In other words, Mr. Rangel's real argument is about class in America, not over the best way to fight Islamic terrorism overseas. He's suggesting that somehow only the poor serve in Uncle Sam's Army. But his views are both out of date and condescending to those who do serve. Alas, they are shared by many on the political left, who think that the military places an unfair burden on the working class. * * *

In this mythology, the military is overly reliant on uneducated dupes from poor communities because those from more affluent backgrounds don't want to serve. But the truth is closer to the opposite, according to a recent Heritage Foundation report on the demographic characteristics of the military. It's titled "Who Are the Recruits?" and Mr. Rangel, a Korean War veteran, might want to read it before implying that the military doesn't look like America.

According to the report, which analyzed the most recent Pentagon enlistee data, "the only group that is lowering its participation in the military is the poor. The percentage of recruits from the poorest American neighborhoods (with one-fifth of the U.S. population) declined from 18 percent in 1999 to 14.6 percent in 2003, 14.1 percent in 2004, and 13.7 percent in 2005." Put another way, if military burdens aren't spread more evenly among socio-economic groups in the U.S., it's because the poor are underrepresented.

Or consider education levels. In the general U.S. population, the high school graduation rate is a little under 80%. But among military recruits from 2003-2005, nearly 97% had high school diplomas. The academic quality of recruits has also been rising this decade. According to Heritage, the military defines a "high quality" recruit as someone who scores above the 50th percentile on the Armed Forces Qualifying Test and has a high school degree. The percentage of high quality recruits had climbed to 67% in 2004 and 64% in 2005, up from 57% in 2001.

And what about race? In 2004, about 76% of the U.S. population was white, which was only slightly above the 73% of military recruits (and 72% of Army recruits) who were white. Blacks made up 12.17% of the population in 2004, and made up 14.54% of recruits in 2004 and 13% in 2005. Hispanic Americans are also slightly overrepresented in the military compared to their share of the population, but also not to a degree that suggests some worrisome cultural chasm among the races.

The overall truth is that today's recruits come primarily from the middle class, and, more importantly, they come willingly. This makes them more amenable to training and more likely to adapt to the rigors of military culture. An Army of draftees would so expand the number of recruits that training resources would inevitably be stretched and standards watered down. Meanwhile, scarce resources would be devoted to tens of thousands of temporary soldiers who planned to leave as soon as their year or two of forced service was up.

It's true that such training would help to shape up more young Americans who could use a few weeks of Marine discipline at Parris Island, and if this is what Mr. Rangel has in mind he should say so. But the price would be a less effective fighting force, and precisely at a time when experience and technological mastery are more important than ever in a fighting force.

"The military doesn't want a draft," says Tim Kane, an Air Force veteran and author of the Heritage study. "What the military wants is the most effective fighting force they can field. They want to win wars and minimize casualties. And you don't do that when you're forced to take less-educated, unmotivated people."

What about Mr. Rangel's point that conscription would have made intervention in Iraq less likely? It's impossible to know, but this is a dangerous argument for the future in any case. The main reason for having an effective Army is to deter enemies by making them believe we have the will to fight if we must. Mr. Rangel is saying the U.S. needs a conscript Army precisely to show an adversary we'll never use it. This is a good way to tempt Iran, say, into provocations that could lead to larger conflicts in which we would have no choice but to fight. * * *

Mr. Rangel insists he will reintroduce a draft bill "as soon as we start the new session," but for all of these reasons it isn't likely to go anywhere. In 2004 GOP House leaders scheduled a floor vote on Mr. Rangel's Universal National Service Act, which would have required "all persons" to perform military or civilian service "in furtherance of national defense." The bill lost 402-2, and even Mr. Rangel opposed it.

Inspect Baluchistan (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0098421

By Ashley Bommer

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Hamid Karzai and Pervez Musharraf are arguing about the Pakistani province of Baluchistan. Intelligence sources -- and President Karzai -- say that the Taliban's kingpin, Mullah Omar, is operating out of Quetta, Baluchistan's capital. And he is sending arms and fighters into southwest Afghanistan. No wonder President Karzai is upset. The frontline of the Taliban and al Qaeda insurgency has a backline in Pakistan. But U.S. troops cannot go into Pakistan -- precisely where al Qaeda and the Taliban are. So there is a simple next step: Gen. Musharraf should agree to U.N. inspectors.

Pakistan continues to challenge the facts. Last month, Gen. Musharraf said, "So, let's nail these people, like President Karzai, who think they are coming from Pakistan. And I am suggesting we will mine the borders. Let anyone who's going from here get into the mines. We will fence the borders. Let's fence the borders."

An independent evaluation of the facts is necessary. The only system in the world that can do this is the U.N.'s Monitoring, Verification, and Inspection Committee (Unmovic). With over 300 experts, it can conduct a comprehensive fact-finding mission in Baluchistan immediately. Their experts, ready to be dispatched, include weapons specialists, scientists, engineers and analysts. They can determine if the Taliban command hubs do exist. They will report back to the international community truthfully. Unmovic's record of independence speaks for itself. At no time, for instance, did it find WMD or the continuation of such programs in Iraq.

Unmovic's mission in Baluchistan will be dangerous. But we cannot continue to sit by idly while al Qaeda and the Taliban gain more control in Afghanistan. International observers will not only deter efforts by al Qaeda and the Taliban, they will verify if Taliban hubs are providing military, financial and propaganda to operatives in Afghanistan. Gen. Musharraf should prove he does not want terrorism to destroy Afghanistan. To do this, he should invite U.N. inspectors to Baluchistan immediately.

Ms. Bommer worked at the U.S. Mission to the U.N. during the Clinton administration.

Gonzales Defends Detainee Policy In Academy Speech (AFT)

Air Force Times, November 24, 2006

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Air Force Academy cadets recently that terrorists will not rise to the example of the U.S. when it comes to treatment of prisoners.

In a lecture on civil liberties and the war on terrorism to about 700 cadets, Gonzales said the U.S. has “rightfully positioned itself in this conflict and other conflicts throughout history as a mature and moral leader — an example to follow,” according to an Air Force press release.

“Yet we know that the fair and humane treatment of the detainees at [the U.S. military’s detention facility in] Guantanamo [Bay, Cuba] will have absolutely no effect on how their confederates treat our soldiers and civilians,” he said.

Gonzales is one of a dozen Bush administration officials named Nov. 14 in a lawsuit brought in Germany by civil rights groups for abuses of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and at Guantanamo.

The release did not say whether Gonzales addressed the charges made against him and others, including departing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Calls placed Friday to the academy press office were not immediately returned.

During his lecture, Gonzales defended the domestic surveillance program that the Bush administration began in secret, saying it is not damaging the civil rights of American citizens.

“It protects citizens from terrorist attacks,” he said. “Critics who say otherwise are perpetuating myths.”

Gonzales was an enlisted airman from 1973 to 1975 before being accepted at the Air Force Academy. He was a cadet from 1975 to 1977 before transferring to Rice University in Houston.

Prosecutors Have A Few Options For Pursuing Barge Case (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, November 25, 2006

They could take it to high court or choose retrial

Federal prosecutors are pondering their next step after an appeals panel last August threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions against several ex-Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in a 2004 Enron case.

They have asked a judge to waive the men's right to a speedy trial so the government can decide whether to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court to reinstate their convictions or move forward with a retrial.

Otherwise, a retrial would have to start a few days after Christmas.

"As long as the possibility exists that the government may seek Supreme Court review, it would be impractical to begin trial or hold pretrial proceedings," prosecutors said in a recent court filing.

They want U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein, who presided over the original case, to schedule a status conference in the case for February next year. The judge has yet to rule.

The trial of four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives and two former Enron executives centered on a year-end 1999 sale of power barges moored off the coast of Nigeria to the brokerage so the energy company could appear to have met earnings targets.

The case was the only Enron-related criminal trial to ensnare a chunk of Wall Street, accusing the Merrill executives of participating in a crime to curry favor and gain more lucrative investment banking business from the energy company.

The barge deal was a disguised loan because it went through after ex-Enron finance chief Andrew Fastow assured Daniel Bayly, former head of investment banking at Merrill, that Enron would buy back or resell the barges within six months.

Fastow testified during the criminal trial of former Enron Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling earlier this year that he made that promise to Bayly.

Fastow is serving a six-year prison term for orchestrating schemes to cook Enron's books while enriching himself.

Jurors in the barge trial convicted five of the defendants and acquitted one of the Enron executives.

The Merrill defendants appealed, and last August a three-judge panel from the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 to throw out fraud and conspiracy convictions against Bayly, James Brown and Robert Furst because prosecutors used a flawed theory.

Specifically, the panel said the Merrill defendants could not have deprived Enron of their honest services because they didn't rob the company of money or property.

The panel also tossed out fraud and conspiracy convictions against the fourth Merrill defendant, William Fuhs, for lack of evidence.

Perjury and obstruction of justice convictions against Brown were upheld.

The Enron felon, Dan Boyle, didn't appeal and is in prison. The four Merrill defendants each spent a year or less in prison before they were released on bond before or after the August ruling.

The Justice Department has until mid-January to appeal to the Supreme Court. The government also can retry Bayly, Brown and Furst or walk away. Werlein has wiped Fuhs' record clean.

Gary Brown, former special counsel for the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs in its Enron investigation after the company imploded in December 2001, said it was worth the government's effort to retry the trio for aiding and abetting fraud.

He said banks and brokerages are more likely to refuse to participate in fraudulent deals to please clients if they know they face possible prosecution and prison.

"The thing that gets the attention of corporate executives is watching people go to jail for securities fraud and other kinds of frauds," he said. "All these guys have gone to jail for some period of time, but I can see a lot of merit for going back and retrying it."

Antagonist of Allied Capital Now Accuses Local Company of 'Pretexting'

They call it the Hundred Years' War.

Not because it involves brutish medieval unpleasantries like the battle axe. It involves only the sharp edge of cutting words between a Washington area company and a New York investor in a war of Wall Street that merely feels like it has lasted a century.

In the latest salvo, hedge fund manager David Einhorn has accused Allied Capital Corp., a company that lends money to and invests in private businesses, of fraud. He also suspects that Allied may have broken into his personal records in a mode of corporate espionage called "pretexting." Some unknown party, Einhorn said, illegally gained access to his telephone records and those of other Allied critics. "The only group of individuals with any motive to access my phone records and the records of four other prominent Allied critics is Allied management," Einhorn wrote in a Sept. 15 letter to Allied's board of directors.

Allied denied authorizing someone to use pretexting to access Einhorn's phone records. Rather, it continued its long-standing position that Einhorn has malevolent intent, saying he is trying to spread false information in an attempt to drive down the company's stock price. Einhorn is a well-known short seller of Allied, meaning that he's betting that the company's stock will fall. Short sellers borrow shares and sell them in anticipation of buying the shares later at a lower price, hoping to pocket the profit.

"David's motives are simple. He makes money if he can drive down the price of Allied Capital stock," said William L. Walton, Allied's chairman and chief executive, according to a transcript of the company's earnings conference call with Wall Street analysts on Nov. 8.

The basic plot of this battle begins in May 2002, when Einhorn told a conference in New York that he was shorting Allied's stock because he believed the company had overvalued some of its assets. Allied's stock price plunged, but then recovered when the company denied wrongdoing and continued paying high dividends to shareholders.

Einhorn and others who questioned Allied's accounting for some of its loans did not go away. They were joined in 2004 by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department, which opened inquiries that neither will comment on but appear to be ongoing. Allied disclosed in its latest federal filing that the Small Business Administration's Office of the Inspector General has begun its own investigation into Business Loan Express, the same Allied unit that has drawn the attention of just about everyone else. BLX, as it is known, makes loans backed by the SBA to other businesses.

The SBA and Allied declined comment on the investigations. But Allied did disclose this: It has spent about $4 million this year and $36 million last year in legal and other fees dealing with these investigations.

Einhorn's allegations of pretexting are not the first that have emerged in this long-running feud.

Herb Greenberg, a senior columnist for MarketWatch.com, said that he, too, was a victim of pretexting. Greenberg wrote stories critical of Allied, including a piece that ran on Street.com in 2003 in which he questioned why Allied's BLX unit employed a convicted felon who had served time in prison in 1996 for securities fraud. Allied confirmed that the individual still works in its Richmond office helping borrowers through the lending process, but noted that the company received permission from the SBA to retain him as long as he didn't hold a position where he would be involved in the company's financial affairs.

After his 2003 story, Greenberg said that someone unknown to him opened an online telephone account using his name. "I felt violated," Greenberg said. "It felt like the house had been broken into." This happened long before pretexting emerged as a flashpoint at Hewlett-Packard Co. during revelations that the technology company had conducted a spy operation to ferret out media leaks.

In 2004, someone sought to examine the bank records of retired real estate developer James Brickman, another frequent critic of Allied. "Someone was asking about my deposit history," he said. Charles Gunther, a financial analyst who had written a negative report on Allied before retiring, was also a victim of pretexting but declined to comment.

Allied officials have denied any wrongdoing.

In Einhorn's case, the hedge fund manager first wrote to Allied's board in 2005 that someone pretending to be his wife opened an online account for his long-distance telephone service and "directed the phone company to send copies of our bills to an AOL account." He also accused Allied of inflating the value of its assets and violating other SBA rules.

Einhorn, 38, co-founded Greenlight Capital Inc. about five years after graduating from Cornell University, after being rejected from every PhD program in economics to which he applied. He started with $1 million, including contributions from his parents back home in Milwaukee. Ten years later, he oversees a hedge fund believed to possess more than $4 billion in assets.

A few years ago, Einhorn donated about a quarter-million dollars to a homeless charity as part of a winning auction bid to eat lunch with Warren Buffett. And earlier this year, Einhorn entered the World Series of Poker, winning more than $600,000 against, and then donating the proceeds to the Michael J. Fox Foundation.

His is mostly a private world. Hedge funds, a largely unregulated sector of finance, are commonly misunderstood but rapidly growing. They are private pools of capital, primarily from wealthy individuals and institutions, like endowments, that invest in various securities. Hedge funds often try to produce a profit regardless of market conditions, and they will frequently employ aggressive strategies, like short selling, that are only permitted on a limited basis to more regulated entities like mutual funds.

In its most recent letter to Einhorn on Sept. 29, Allied said it remains skeptical of his motives, given what it described as his "apparent financial motive to depress Allied's stock price." The company underscored that its investments have netted strong returns and its stock is hovering near its 52-week high of $32.26. "Allied Capital's performance over the past five years speaks for itself," said Walton, the company's chief. "Since the beginning of 2002, we have paid almost $11 per share in dividends and the stock has performed accordingly."

Einhorn remains skeptical as well. "We are short because there are problems here; we're not saying there are problems because we're short."

Litigation Nation (WSJ)

By Stephen C. Dillard

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

For the past three years our law firm has surveyed U.S. corporate law departments to better understand which kinds of disputes keep general counsels awake at night, and which ones are most likely to lead to all-out litigation. We also ask companies how many lawsuits they face and how much of their overall legal budgets they spend on disputes.

The latest Litigation Trends Survey makes it plain that litigation is now a major feature of the business landscape -- even we were surprised by the volume and scope of legal actions across all major industries and regardless of company size. Consider a few key findings based on reporting by 310 in-house counsel, more than half of whom work for public companies with revenues over $1 billion:

Some 89% of companies report being hit with at least one new lawsuit in the past year, compared with only two-thirds in the 2005 survey. Meanwhile, U.S. companies face an average of 305 lawsuits pending world-wide. For companies with sales of $1 billion or more, the average number of cases jumps to 556, with 50 fresh suits emerging each year for nearly half of these firms. While the majority of actions are in U.S. courts, a third of the respondents said that at least 20% of their litigation now originates in foreign venues.

Some industries are clearly tagged more than others, none more so than insurance, where participants reported a whopping average of more than 1,600 pending cases (although representing a small pool of the survey, insurers are frequently drawn into disputes with policyholders over claims that run from environmental clean-up and hurricane damage to directors and officers liability and more recently, losses due to terrorist acts). Energy companies averaged 364 cases, retail 333, financial services 300, manufacturers 206, and so on across 13 separate sectors. At the lower end, facing fewer than 25 cases per company, were education providers, nonprofits and trade associations -- but even the latter reported an average of four pending lawsuits.

Half of the in-house counsel reported that their companies also faced at least one new arbitration and one new regulatory proceeding in 2005-06. Biggest government instigators? The SEC and OSHA. But state attorneys general are also regular players, as are the FTC, EPA, the FDA and multiple other federal agencies with the power to subpoena. Pharmaceutical companies reported the highest incidence of regulatory scrutiny, followed by energy firms, insurers, retailers and manufacturers. A number of companies faced more than 50 regulatory proceedings.

One byproduct of America's litigation and enforcement culture is the internal investigation. Some 63% of the law departments surveyed said their companies had launched at least one internal probe requiring outside counsel in the past year alone -- more than a quarter of the billion-dollar companies undertook three or more investigations. And our survey was completed before the recent rash of investigations into stock options backdating.

Of course, every lawsuit has at least two sides and our survey reveals how active U.S. business is in playing offense: More than 70% of companies commenced at least one action as plaintiff in 2005-06, and nearly half filed up to five new cases. Manufacturers and retailers were the most frequent plaintiffs: 90% of the companies in both industries initiated at least one suit in the past year. Next in line were real estate and insurance firms. Even a full third of nonprofits filed at least one lawsuit, as did half of the companies with under $100 million in revenue.

Are these statistics a confirmation of America's vicious, tail-chasing lawsuit crisis? Or are they a vote of high confidence in the judicial system as a means of enforcing contracts, safeguarding intellectual property and brand assets, and stopping fraud? It's worth thinking about.

So what is tops on the corporate lawyer worry-list? Securities-related cases may grab the headlines, but more than half of the in-house counsel cited employment as their top litigation concern. The workplace has become a legal minefield over issues ranging from pay and promotion to harassment and discrimination, and claims of wrongful termination. Disgruntled workers are a fact of life, with aggrieved employees quicker to sue than almost any other group -- and disputes over wages and hours can be brought as class actions in many jurisdictions, creating more waves of litigation.

Contract disputes were the second most-cited litigation concern -- old-fashioned, not very sexy, but a time-honored source of business disagreements. From there followed the litany of modern litigation anxieties: IP/patent disputes; personal injury filings; regulatory actions; product liability; toxic torts; and securities and antitrust issues. Only a small percentage of counsel reported dwelling on bankruptcy, real estate or tax problems, although litigation on these issues could increase in the next economic cycle.

What about financial exposure? Many cases on company dockets are mere bagatelles, disputes valued in thousands of dollars. But nearly four in 10 of our respondents were hit with least one $20 million suit in the past year; and for billion-dollar firms, it was almost seven in 10. A number of companies admitted they were looking at least 50 new lawsuits involving at least $20 million, representing more than $1 billion in claims.

Meanwhile, companies report spending an average of $12 million on litigation annually, apart from any judgments or settlements. That compares with only $8 million a year ago, reflecting in part the growth of our sample but also, we think, bigger-stakes cases and better tracking of litigation costs. For some industries -- engineering and insurance -- spending on litigation exceeded $35 million. Especially striking was the portion of overall company legal budgets taken up by lawsuits -- an average of 71%.

Nevertheless, one of the more curious survey findings is that 94% of U.S. companies reporting said they had at least one legal action currently pending in an American court. To which we feel compelled to inquire, "Who are the other 6%?" Something to explore for next year.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Court To Probe 'Improper Communications' With Reporter (AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, Associated Press

LOS ANGELES – A federal court plans to investigate whether government officials illegally supplied grand jury information in a U.S. military secrets case to a Washington Times reporter.

Court papers show the investigation seeks to uncover a possible source and content of “improper communications” with Times reporter William Gertz for a story he wrote in May.

DOJ_NMG_0098426

The order, entered Wednesday by a federal judge in Orange County, comes at the request of a defense attorney for Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, one of five family members indicted in an alleged scheme to send sensitive information about Navy warships to China. The request was joined by the other defendants.

The defense argued Gertz received information about a then-pending grand jury indictment of Chiu and the others on additional charges in violation of grand jury secrecy rules. Some of the charges cited in Gertz's May 16 story are contained in an indictment returned last month.

The story was sourced to "senior Justice Department officials (who) have approved the new charges," court papers said.

U.S. District Judge Cormac Carney said in court papers the alleged violation "triggers the duty of the court to investigate further."

Carney ordered the government to submit a status report by early January on "the investigation it has undertaken to determine whether any government official had improper communications with Mr. Gertz," according to court papers.

The government was also told to report measures it's taking to prevent such communications with the public.

A Justice Department spokesman for the Central District of California did not immediately return a phone message left late Friday. A message left with a The Washington Times communications manager also was not immediately returned.

Chiu is married to Chi Mak, who allegedly took computer disks from an Anaheim defense contractor where he was lead engineer on a sensitive research project involving propulsion systems for Navy warships. Also charged in the case are Mak's brother, Tai Wang Mak, his wife, Fuk Heung Li, and their son, Yui "Billy" Mak.

A federal indictment alleges counts of conspiracy to export U.S. defense articles to China; possession of property in aid of a foreign government; making false statements to federal investigators; and acting as agents of a foreign government, namely China, without prior notification to the U.S. attorney general.

Not all five face the same charges. All have entered not-guilty pleas.

Chiu's attorney, Stanley Greenberg, said he was "pleased to see the court recognizes its duty to investigate." At the same time, he questioned the court's reliance on the government in the investigation.

"I don't think the government has the same motivation that the court should," he said.

The government claims that Chi Mak passed information about U.S. naval technology from his employer to his brother and that his nephew, Billy Mak, then helped encrypt the files onto a CD-ROM computer disk. That disk was found hidden the luggage of Tai Mak and his wife after they were arrested in October 2005 at Los Angeles International Airport as they prepared to travel to Hong Kong and Guangzhou, China, authorities said.

According to the FBI, Chi Mak told investigators his brother was giving the information to a researcher at a Chinese university center that conducts operations research for and receives funding from the People's Liberation Army.

Prosecutors have said previously that authorities recovered from the disk restricted documents on the DDX Destroyer, an advanced technology warship. They also allege that they found lists in Chinese asking Chi Mak to get documents about submarine torpedo technology, electromagnetic artillery systems, weapon standardization, early warning technology used to detect incoming missiles, and defenses used against nuclear attack.

Federal Law No Minor Concern (LVS)

Las Vegas Sun, November 25, 2006

Justice Department does public, Rep. Jon Porter no favors by turning away investigation

The Justice Department has declined to pursue an investigation into allegations that Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., made fundraising calls from his office, a serious charge.

All a Justice Department spokesman would say is that the FBI referred the investigation to the department and it was "declined."

Unfortunately, that doesn't give any indication as to whether there's any truth to the allegation. Former Republican National Committee general counsel Jan Witold Baran told reporter Tony Cook in Wednesday's Las Vegas Sun that the Justice Department "doesn't devote its limited resources to something that is relatively very minor and that is unlikely to occur again."

If those are the reasons for dropping the investigation, that's a shame. We don't consider violations of federal law "minor" - the law carries a penalty of up to three years in prison and a fine of $5,000 - and it shouldn't ever be an issue. Members of Congress know this law well. They are taught to leave federal buildings to make fundraising calls.

The FBI investigation still leaves questions. Jim Shepard, Porter's former scheduler who made the claims, said no one interviewed him about the allegations.

Shepherd says he has a sponsor to take the complaint to the bipartisan House Ethics Committee, which we believe should conduct a full and fair investigation into the matter and release its findings. If he has done nothing wrong, Porter should welcome such action that would clear his name, as the Justice Department probe did not.

Cartoonist Charged After Siege Ends Peacefully (AP)

MIAMI, Florida (AP) -- A cartoonist carrying a toy gun that looked real surrendered to police at The Miami Herald's building Friday, more than two hours after arriving and demanding to see an editor of the newspaper's Spanish-language sister paper, police said.

Jose Varela, 50, carried a knife and a black plastic toy gun that resembled a real semiautomatic weapon, police said. He was charged with three counts of aggravated assault with a firearm. He was being held on $22,500 bond, jail officials said.

Varela had problems with El Nuevo Herald, where he worked as a contractor, including its position on Cuban emigres, said Police Chief John Timoney.

He had routine access to the building, officials said.

A police negotiator talked Varela into surrendering peacefully about 2:45 p.m., Timoney said. No injuries were reported.

"Once he calmed down and he realized what he was doing was not appropriate, he decided we would work to bring him out," said police negotiator Serafin Ordonez, who spoke with Varela for 30 to 40 minutes in Spanish. "No one was in danger. He kept repeating that he didn't want to hurt nobody, that he's not a violent person, that he's not a criminal."

Varela told a reporter for The Miami Herald during the incident that he was "the new director of the newspaper."

"I'm here to unmask the true conflicts in the newspaper," Varela told The Miami Herald. "They laugh at exiles here. There are problems with payment."

Varela called attorney Joe Garcia a couple of times from inside the building, Garcia told The Associated Press. Garcia said Varela was concerned about a conflict of interest at El Nuevo Herald.

"All that he wants people to know is that he wants the truth to come out," Garcia said. "I think he needs some time to work some things out."

Varela isolated himself in an editor's office on the sixth floor of the downtown Miami building that houses The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald, police said.

Dressed all in black with the letters "FBI" across the back of his polo shirt, he pointed the plastic gun at three El Nuevo Herald employees and demanded to see the newspaper's executive editor, Humberto Castello, police said.

The floor was evacuated, and officers carrying weapons and wearing protective gear set up a perimeter around the building, where evacuees gathered.

News staff remained on the fifth floor to cover the story.

Varela landed on Key West during the Mariel boatlift, in which more than 125,000 Cubans fled the island in 1980. In a December 2004 El Nuevo Herald article, he recalled how drawing got him into trouble as a child.

"I remember that I was always a bad student in school because I would draw cartoons of the teacher. For that, they would remove me from class," he told the newspaper.

It was the second situation involving a gun at the newspaper in the past year and a half. In July 2005, former City Commissioner Arthur E. Teele Jr. fatally shot himself in the Herald lobby after asking to speak with columnist Jim DeFede. Teele had been under investigation for corruption and had just been indicted by a federal grand jury on fraud charges.

DeFede was fired for recording his telephone conversations with Teele just before the incident without the politician's permission.

News broke in September that eight of El Nuevo Herald's reporters and 29 of its freelancers were paid to work for the U.S. government's Radio and TV Marti networks. The government beams programming into Cuba aimed at undermining the communist government of Fidel Castro.

The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald are separate newspapers, but they share an office and are both published by The Miami Herald Media Co. El Nuevo Herald is one of the nation's largest Spanish-language newspapers.

Cartoonist Held After Siege At Miami Paper (WP)

Police Negotiator Helps End Standoff After 31/2 Hours; Gun Turns Out to Be Toy

MIAMI, Nov. 24 -- Dressed in camouflage and brandishing what looked like a submachine gun, the cartoonist for this city's leading Spanish-language newspaper strode into the office of the top editor Friday morning and told startled staff, "I am the new executive editor, and that is my new office."

It was not a joke.

The demands of El Nuevo Herald cartoonist JosÃ© Varela to see the editor, with whom he had unspecified grievances over ethics and what he told police were censorship issues, set off a tense 3 1/2 -hour standoff at the offices of the Spanish newspaper and the Miami Herald, which share a six-story building on the northern outskirts of downtown. Executive Editor Humberto CastellÃ³ was not in.

"He said, 'Just bring me the editor,' " said Gus Perez, director of operations for the newspapers, who confronted Varela on the sixth floor. "He said, 'I have 30 rounds.' I said, 'I'm really asking you to point that at the floor,' and he did."

Perez said he had been told that Varela was carrying a "toy gun," and police corroborated that later, saying it resembled a MAC-11. Authorities added that Varela was also carrying a knife.

As Perez spoke to Varela, about a dozen Nuevo Herald staffers were directed to leave the building, Perez said. Scores of other employees had already made it outside.

"When I came back to my office from the cafeteria, I just saw a crowd of people coming toward me saying, 'Get out, get out,' " said Tanya Byng, 43, an accounts manager.

As helicopters hovered, knots of spectators and evacuated employees formed outside the building, though there was some fear that anyone in the vicinity could have become a target.

"If he turns into a sniper suddenly, then we've got a problem," said Detective Delrish Moss, a police spokesman.

Eventually, a police negotiator reached Varela by phone and coaxed him into giving up. No one was injured.

"I just calmed him to the point to where he realized this was inappropriate behavior," said police negotiator Serafin Ordonez.

Varela, 50, was charged with three counts of aggravated assault with a firearm and was being held on $22,500 bond, jail officials told the Associated Press.

He apparently was disgruntled by some ethics issues and the "way the newspaper was being run," Ordonez said. "He's an intelligent man, and he realized this was not appropriate behavior."

According to the Miami Herald, Varela spoke disjointedly. "You are speaking with the new director of the newspaper, and I'm here to unmask the true conflicts in the newspaper," the newspaper quoted Varela as saying. "They laugh at exiles here. There are problems with payment."

The exact nature of his complaints could not be immediately determined.

El Nuevo Herald has undergone repeated upheavals in recent months, most of them involving Cuban American politics and the relationship between El Nuevo Herald and the Miami Herald.

Earlier this fall, El Nuevo Herald fired two writers and a freelancer amid a controversy over reporters working for Radio Marti and TV Marti, which are run by the U.S. government. But then the publisher of the two newspapers resigned, and the three were hired back.

During the standoff, Varela demanded the resignations of CastellÃ³ and Miami Herald Executive Editor Tom Fiedler, according to the Miami Herald.

The Miami Herald building was the scene of gunfire last year, when, in July, former city commissioner Arthur E. Teele Jr. fatally shot himself in the lobby after asking to speak with a Herald columnist. Teele had been under investigation, suspected of corruption and fraud.

Varela, who was born in Cuba, has been the newspaper's cartoonist for several years. His most recent work appeared Friday. Titled, in Spanish, "The Biggest Sale of the Year," it showed shoe prints going in, presumably to a store, and prints of bare feet coming out.

Standoff At Miami Papers Ends In Cartoonist's Arrest (NYT)

By Andy Newman

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 24 — A political cartoonist for the Spanish-language counterpart of The Miami Herald stormed the newspaper building on Friday morning dressed in an F.B.I. shirt and armed with a fake semiautomatic weapon, issued threats against the paper's editor and others and held officers at bay for three hours before surrendering, the police said.

The cartoonist, José Varela, 50, was charged with three counts of aggravated assault, the police said. No one was hurt.

Mr. Varela, a Cuban-born freelancer who until February had worked as a staff cartoonist at the paper, El Nuevo Herald, claimed to be upset about biased coverage of Cuban-Americans in both El Nuevo Herald and its sister paper, The Miami Herald, said the Miami police chief, John F. Timoney.

"One of his demands was he wanted that the truth be told," he said.

The newspapers, which are owned by the McClatchy Company and published in the same building, have been engulfed in Cuban-American politics and intrigue of late.

Last month, The Miami Herald broke the story that some reporters for El Nuevo Herald were also working for and being paid by Radio and TV Martí, the Bush administration's anti-Castro propaganda radio station broadcast to Cuba. Relations between the two papers, often tense, became outright hostile, and the publisher of both papers resigned.

According to The Herald's Web site, Mr. Varela, a Cuban immigrant, demanded the resignations of its executive editor, Tom Fiedler, and El Nuevo Herald's executive editor, Humberto Castelló, accusing him of backing Mr. Fiedler.

This week, Mr. Fiedler accused an op-ed contributor for El Nuevo Herald of "blood libel" for suggesting that a Herald reporter who broke the Martí story had ties to Cuba's spy agency. In an editor's note, Mr. Castelló called the spy claim unfounded.

Mr. Varela was also apparently having personal problems. El Nuevo Herald's Web site said he had recently divorced and told colleagues last week that he had gotten a submachine gun and a sawed-off shotgun because he felt unsafe in his new home in Jupiter, a wealthy town near West Palm Beach.

It was not the first time that a gunman caused havoc at The Herald's boxy tan headquarters on Biscayne Bay. Last year, a former city commissioner facing corruption charges killed himself in the building's lobby after an anguished phone call to a Herald columnist. The columnist was later fired after it was revealed he had taped the conversation.

Around 11 a.m. Friday, the police said, Mr. Varela came to the building, was allowed in by the security desk since he was a frequent visitor, and, once at El Nuevo Herald's offices on the sixth floor, demanded to speak to Mr. Castelló.

"He threw a bunch of papers in the air," said Alejandra Chaparro, a reporter for El Nuevo Herald. "He was demanding that the editor has to take responsibility."

Told that Mr. Castelló was not in the building, Mr. Varela declared, "I am the publisher until Humberto Castelló gets here," The Herald reported on its Web site.

A building security manager, Arturo Le Fleur, told The Herald that Mr. Varela had pointed the gun at him.

Police officers quickly evacuated the building and isolated Mr. Varela on the sixth floor. Two hours of negotiations ensued. Detective Serafin Ordoñez, a police negotiator, said he talked with Mr. Varela about his art, his family and a shoulder injury to try to calm him down.

Mr. Varela also gave a rambling interview to a Nuevo Herald reporter during the standoff. “Somebody has to pay,” he said. “Somebody has to do it because this is going be like cleaning excrement. Enough time has passed now that they are mocking the people. So somebody has to pay, and that will be Castelló.”

He continued, “How long will I put up with this nonsense of drawing cartoons on Bush and a Fidel Castro dum-dum? The newspaper is much more than that.”

Ivette Diaz, a spokeswoman for the paper, declined to say what had precipitated Mr. Varela’s change in employment status from staff cartoonist to freelancer in February. She described him as “a jokester.”

In a profile on El Nuevo Herald’s Web site, Mr. Varela wrote: “I’m a happy man. In spite of that, I cry when I see a movie like the Titanic. Because I don’t like sinkings.”

Search Underway For Two Boys From Minnesota Reservation (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

RED LAKE, Minn., Nov. 24 -- Dozens of trained searchers took to the woods, lakes and air Friday to continue searching for two preschool-age brothers, missing for two days in the remote Red Lake Indian Reservation in northern Minnesota.

Tristan Anthony White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, disappeared Wednesday from a yard in a heavily wooded area in the town of Red Lake.

"They were just playing outside the last time I seen them, just playing outside," Alicia White, the boys' mother, told reporters.

She appealed for anyone who knows or has seen anything to come forward.

FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said authorities are trying to determine whether the boys wandered off or whether foul play was involved.

"We don't have any information that would lead us either way," he said.

Family members said they were preparing for the worst because it has been cold and searchers have found nothing since the boys disappeared. Temperatures were expected to drop below freezing overnight, weather forecasters said.

Hundreds of volunteers on foot, on horseback and in four-wheel-drive vehicles have joined in the search.

In March 2005, the Red Lake reservation was in the news when Jeff Weise, 16, shot and killed nine people before killing himself.

Friday: FBI Offers $20,000 Reward (MINNST)

By Chuck Haga, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 25, 2006

As a third day of intensive searching yields no sign of two missing boys on the Red Lake Reservation, their mother pleads for help and the FBI offers a $20,000 reward.

RED LAKE, MINN. -- As the third day of intensive but so-far fruitless searching for her young sons wore on Friday, Alicia White said that she is "prepared for the worst" but still hopeful that Tristan A. White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, will be found alive and unharmed.

"I'm trying not to think the worst, but it's been so cold out there and people have been searching all over and can't find them," she said.

Flanked by other family members, White pleaded for help from anyone who "knows anything or has seen anything about the whereabouts of my babies," who have been missing since Wednesday morning.

"They were just playing outside," she said. "That's the last I saw them."

The FBI announced a $20,000 reward Friday for information that might help them determine what happened to the boys, last seen about 9:30 a.m. as they played outside their home in the remote, wooded Walking Shield area of Red Lake.

The FBI also brought in more high-tech equipment, including unmanned aerial vehicles that flew over the search area with video cameras rolling to supplement ground searchers, dog teams and members of the Marshall County Mounted Posse.

Also, an airplane with specialized heat-sensing equipment was to do flyovers Friday night, and divers from St. Louis County used radar and underwater cameras to examine a series of small lakes and ponds in the search area.

Despite all those efforts, "As of now, I have no reports of finding anything," FBI special agent Paul McCabe said late Friday.

He said investigators continued to press a two-pronged investigation, trying to determine whether the boys wandered off or whether foul play was involved.

"We don't have any information that would lead us either way," he said. Nobody has reported seeing anything unusual, and searchers have found no clothing, no breaks in pond ice or other signs of what might have happened to the two youngsters.

'Sweetest little boy'

In her first public comments on the disappearance of her boys, Alicia White said that Tristan "loves water, and Avery, he just follows his brother." Smiling, she described Avery as "the sweetest little boy, just lovey-dovey."

She said that Tristan is adventurous and sometimes wandered off when the family lived in Redby, another town on the Red Lake Reservation.

"But we always found him," she said. "This is the first time we didn't find him."

She feels "lost," she said. "My babies are gone out there in the cold by themselves."

Tristan has a medical condition, she said, and he did not take his prescribed medication the morning he disappeared.

The boys' grandfather, Myron Jones, thanked volunteers, law enforcement officers and others who have been searching for the boys.

"I'm praying for the best," he said. "Hopefully, they're safe and will show up."

But he acknowledged a growing fear that the boys were taken.

"We probably would have found them by now" if they were still in the area, he said.

Lamont White, 8, the boys' older brother, stood with his mother. The boys also have twin 1-year-old sisters. Jeff Stately, Avery's father, and Lisa White, the boys' grandmother, also attended the late afternoon news conference.

"We're holding it together for each other," Alicia White said.

She also thanked the volunteers and other searchers. "It tells us we're not in this by ourselves," she said.

Time a concern

McCabe said that dog teams worked the woods surrounding the boys' neighborhood from 9 p.m. Thursday until about 2:30 a.m. Friday and likely would return to the woods late Friday night.

Temperatures were expected to fall into the upper teens Friday night.

"Time is always a concern whenever you have missing children," McCabe said, especially under such conditions. But searchers' focus continues to be "that the children are alive," he said.

Red Lake police and other officials continued to maintain a roadblock on Walking Shield Road where it joins Hwy. 89 near the main entrance to the reservation. Authorities allowed only registered searchers and neighborhood residents through, and were checking car interiors and trunks. A Red Lake ambulance stood by throughout the day.

The searching Friday was done primarily by professionals, including five dog teams from the Minnesota Search Dog Network and several members of Team Adam, part of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

"They are retired law enforcement professionals, and many are search experts," McCabe said. "One flew in from Alaska. He is the former head of the Alaska state police search team. They also have access to databases."

Also on the scene were 30 members of the Civil Air Patrol, who joined in the ground search. Civilian volunteers included about 45 members of the missing boys' extended family.

"The response of volunteers and the Red Lake Nation as a whole has been overwhelming," McCabe said.

Crying for the babies

The continuing uncertainty over what happened to the boys gnaws at the people of Red Lake.

"People are crying," said Judy Roy, a former tribal secretary. "They're reporting they can't sleep, thinking about those babies.

"As a grandmother myself, I'm crying. Everyone feels like it's their children or grandchildren, and it goes right to the heart."

About 100 trained searchers and law enforcement officers continued to look for the two brothers missing from the Red Lake Indian Reservation, but authorities grew more concerned after temperatures dipped below freezing.

RED LAKE, MINN. -- The search expanded today for two young brothers who went missing Wednesday on the Red Lake Indian Reservation in northern Minnesota.

Additional ground crews and dog teams have joined the effort, which has included personnel from Beltrami, Cass, Itasca, Marshall and St. Louis counties, along with federal and tribal authorities. Searching has done on the ground, by divers and from the air.

More than 100 searchers, a combination of professionals and volunteers, continued to scour the remote Walking Shield area of the reservation, where Tristan A. White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, were last seen about 9:30 a.m. Wednesday as they played outside their home.

A procession of vehicles went into and out of the search area.

Searchers were dealing with cooler conditions, as temperatures dropped into the 20s, compared with the 40s the day before.

"The weather had been mild, but last night with those kinds of temps that does concern us, if there were children in the woods going into a third night," FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said.

On Friday, the FBI announced a $20,000 reward for information that might help them determine what happened to the boys.

The agency also brought in more high-tech equipment, including unmanned aerial vehicles with video cameras and an airplane with specialized heat-sensing equipment.

Authorities are taking a two-pronged approach to the investigation, trying to determine whether the boys wandered off or whether foul play was involved.

FBI special agent Paul McCabe said dozens of tips have come into a hotline set up by the FBI on Friday.

He said several originated from the Twin Cities area.

"We're aggressively pursuing all angles," he said.

FBI Sifts Claims For Phillips Reward (BUFFNEWS)

By T.J. PIGNATARO, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, November 25, 2006

One couple has also sued State Police union to collect $225,000 for capture of fugitive

FBI officials in Washington are reviewing "several claims" made by individuals who say their help led to Ralph "Bucky" Phillips' capture Sept. 8 in Akeley, Pa.

Determining the merit of claims for the FBI's portion of the Phillips' reward - $100,000 - is a "multitiered, multifaceted process," said local FBI spokesman Paul Moskal.

"This is the public's money, so the FBI wants to make sure . . . these claims are meritorious and not frivolous," Moskal said. "Several people have come forward to make claims for the reward money. They all have different roles, some seem to be more meritorious than others."

Those claimants include Jack and Gloria Young of Warren, Pa., who filed a federal lawsuit against the New York State Police Benevolent Association seeking its $225,000 reward, Moskal confirmed. He did not elaborate on the merits of the Youngs' claim.

Moskal did say, however, that there doesn't appear to be any one claim that directly led to Phillips' capture.

"We haven't encountered a single piece from a single source we'd deem as critical to his apprehension," he said.

Phillips - wanted in connection with the shootings of three state troopers, including one who died - was added to the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted List" Sept. 7. He was captured the next day. His addition to the list made those providing law enforcement with useful information leading to his arrest eligible for a $100,000 reward from the FBI.

Attorneys for the Youngs suggested late last week that they may also pursue action against the FBI, although the federal agency was not named in the lawsuit against the State Police PBA.

The Youngs' lawyers say if not for a phone call placed by their clients reporting a suspicious person on their property late Sept. 7, Phillips would not have been captured the next day.

Troopers PBA President Daniel M. De Federicis said last week that State Police are investigating a few claims for their reward money - including from the Youngs. He suggested the PBA would be looking to the FBI for guidance on its reward disbursements.

Moskal said that FBI officials will share their findings with the PBA to ensure that information received by each agency is consistent.

FBI Unveils Corruption Tip Line (DESERET)

Deseret Morning News, November 23, 2006

On the day that the indictments of three Davis County School District employees were announced, federal agents also unveiled a special toll-free tip line where the public can report suspected corruption by public officials.

"Currently, there are more than 2,000 public corruption investigations pending" nationwide, FBI Special Agent in Charge Tim Fuhrman said.

The FBI's Public Corruption Tip Line, 1-866-50-BRIBE (2-7423), will be made available for residents in Utah, Idaho and Montana who believe public employees or public officials may be involved in corruption. Tips can also be reported via the FBI Salt Lake City Field Office Web site (go to www.fbi.gov and click on the link to the Salt Lake City Field Office).

Davis Parents, Administrators, Seek More Info On Theft Allegations (SLT)

By Nicole Stricker And Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, November 25, 2006

Why did it take so long to detect a problem, and what needs to happen to prevent such infractions in the future? Davis County parents and administrators face numerous unanswered questions about Wednesday's allegations that a Layton couple stole $4.3 million over five years from Davis County schools that receive federal funding for disadvantaged students - and possibly much more.

"If the allegations are true, it is just sad to me," said Cheryl Werven, a Davis School Board member from Clearfield who represents some of the affected schools. "So much of it was on the front page [Thursday] and I just thought 'Happy Thanksgiving.' " Because the board learned Wednesday of the indictment charging Susan G. Ross, 62, and her husband John Ross, 64, with 47 counts of theft, fraud, copyright infringement and other crimes, members haven't yet met to evaluate what they might be able to do to provide more safeguards against fraud. Those discussions, however, are "absolutely" forthcoming, board member William P. Moore of Bountiful said.

Parents seek assurances that the district will act swiftly.

"Holy cow, that's a lot of money. I'm just floored," said Vonnie Dayton, president-elect of PTA South Clearfield Elementary, a school that receives Title 1 funds for schools that serve disadvantaged students. "How could they do that, especially to schools and our children?" The Davis district first detected something was amiss with its Title 1 programs in spring 2005 after implementing a new review system. Authorities were contacted immediately, said Timothy Fuhrman, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office, which investigated the matter along with the U.S. Attorney's Office, the U.S. Department of Education Office of Inspector General, the IRS and the Farmington Police Department.

The delay in recognizing a problem may be a result of misplaced trust in employees who came up with explanations for discrepancies, Fuhrman said.

U.S. Attorney for Utah Brett Tolman said that trust and a sophisticated scheme helped the defendants cover their tracks over the years. "With that combination, you have the ability to hide" what you're doing, he said.

Susan Ross, who was employed by the district beginning in the 1970s, was director of federal programs before she retired in spring 2005. John Ross is the former Title I specialist for the Utah State Office of Education and worked as a grant specialist for the Davis district from March 2000 to February 2005.

The indictment accuses the pair of selling photocopies of books to schools that receive federal Title 1 funding at vastly inflated prices through an intermediary company, which kept a small percentage of the profit and paid the rest to a company allegedly owned by Susan and John Ross. The $4.3 million represents money allegedly taken from 2000 to 2005, but authorities allege the scam may have begun as early as 1985.

"I feel bad this situation has gone on for so long and just been awful," said Davis School Board Vice President Tamara Lowe of West Point. "It's just a sad, sad situation where money should have been going to student materials and activities rather than someone's pockets." A representative of the largest union representing Davis teachers declined to comment on Friday.

"I didn't know anything about it. I really don't have anything to say," said Susan Firmage, Davis Education Association president. "I don't have any reaction to it at all." nstricker@sltrib.com pmanson@sltrib.com

Sensing You're Too Drunk To Drive (NYT)

There aren't many social problems that can be solved with a "technical fix," but drunken driving may be one of the most amenable. Technologies that are already in limited use can lock the ignitions of cars whose drivers have high alcohol levels in their breath, thus preventing them from turning their vehicles into lethal unguided weapons.

These existing technologies and more futuristic devices still under development are the cornerstones of a new phase in the campaign that was announced this week by Mothers Against Drunk Driving. The initial goal, which is backed by associations of state highway officials and car manufacturers, is to have all states do what New Mexico has already done: require that all convicted drunken drivers, even first-time offenders, have devices installed in their cars that measure alcohol in the breath and immobilize the car if levels exceed set limits.

Currently, 45 states, the District of Columbia and most Canadian provinces have laws that require or allow some offenders — mostly those convicted more than once — to install alcohol interlocks on their cars if they wish to drive. Some 100,000 interlocks are in service in the United States.

Restaurant groups are complaining that wider use of the devices would eliminate wine at dinner, beer at ballgames, and other forms of "responsible drinking." But it is hardly responsible for a driver to drink so heavily that the interlock kicks in. Driving is a privilege, not a right. If those convicted of drunken driving want the privilege, they ought to take extra steps to protect the rest of us.

For the future, safety advocates hope to develop passive devices that unobtrusively test all drivers for alcohol, without requiring every soccer mom to blow into a tube every time she gets into a car. Even better would be devices that flash warnings and slow cars at any sign of erratic driving, whether the cause be drink, distraction, fatigue, recklessness or sheer incompetence.

CIVIL LAW:

Case Tests Federal Supremacy Over Banks (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

The federal government and the banking industry will square off next week in the Supreme Court against all 50 states and the District of Columbia in a mortgage-lending case that could have broad implications for business regulation.

The case, Watters v. Wachovia Bank, focuses on the lending industry. But the broader question it addresses is whether federal regulators can essentially tell state regulators to go away. It's a debate over what is called "preemption." How the court resolves the dispute could affect many other industries.

For more than two decades, states have regulated the mortgage-lending practices of state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks. The parent national banks are regulated by a federal agency, the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. In 2001, the OCC ruled that state regulation was improper, saying that under federal law those lenders should be overseen by the federal government.

Some states regulate lending matters not covered by OCC rules. For example, Maryland is among the states that set limits on mortgage prepayment penalties.

In 2003, Charlotte-based Wachovia Bank decided that it wanted to be regulated solely by the OCC. It told the states where it runs mortgage lending companies that those firms would no longer register with state officials or abide by local rules.

Many national banks have criticized the patchwork of local regulation intended to stop predatory lending. Other banks have also announced their intention to seek regulation by the OCC alone. They say the proliferation of state and local regulations makes it almost impossible to standardize business practices to maximize efficiency, driving up the cost of mortgage loans and making the banks wary of entering communities with strict lending rules.

Linda A. Watters, Michigan's insurance and financial services commissioner, protested Wachovia's decision. Michigan and the other states say they provide consumers with better protection against predatory home mortgage practices than does the OCC. They say the banks prefer OCC regulation because it is friendlier to them and because the federal agency focuses on whether the banks are protecting investors and depositors instead of borrowers.

Wachovia sued Michigan, asserting that the National Banking Act of 1864 gives federal regulators supremacy over state laws. Wachovia won on the District and Circuit Court levels. Other banks similarly prevailed against state regulators in lower and appellate courts. Michigan appealed.

The Supreme Court took the unusual step of agreeing to hear the case, although the lower courts had agreed to grant control to the OCC. The high court seldom hears cases in which lower-court judges have been unanimous in their rulings. Now both sides wonder what the justices' decision to take the case may mean: Will they approve the preemption practice or overturn it?

The first clues are likely to emerge Wednesday, when oral arguments in the case are scheduled. Both sides have mustered support for their viewpoints.

The brief on behalf of all the major banking trade groups, including the American Bankers Association and the Mortgage Bankers Association, was co-written by John D. Hawke Jr., who was comptroller of the currency when the 2001 rules were drafted, and Theodore B. Olson, U.S. solicitor general from 2001 to 2004.

"We hope it's a signal to the court that the banking industry is unified in where we think this case should come out," said Gregory F. Taylor, associate general counsel for the American Bankers Association.

Other businesses say the issue affects them, too. "The power of Congress (either directly or through administrative agencies) to preempt state and local law is vitally important to business and to the national economy," the U.S. Chamber of Commerce wrote in its brief. "Accordingly, the Chamber and its members have a substantial interest in ensuring that this Court properly resolves the issues raised in this case."

Another brief in Wachovia's support, co-written by libertarian law professor Richard A. Epstein, asserts that tighter rules on mortgage lending can make loans more expensive and less available, as lenders leave markets or adjust rates to reflect higher costs.

The preemption issue has attracted the attention of many prominent jurists and legal scholars. At an American Enterprise Institute conference in April attended by former special prosecutor Kenneth W. Starr and appellate court judges Douglas H. Ginsburg and Stephen F. Williams, Epstein and other scholars proposed that other industries could also eek federal preemption from state and local laws.

Many states set their own rules on such issues as auto emissions and safety, workplace standards and product safety.

Michigan's side also has many supporters. Michelle Aronowitz, deputy solicitor general in the office of New York State Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer, wrote the brief that was co-sponsored by the 49 other states, the District and Puerto Rico. It is rare for so many states to support a particular legal position, but they were eager to do so, said Dan Schweitzer, Supreme Court counsel of the National Association of Attorneys General.

"One of the roles of state AGs is protecting their consumers, and what the OCC has been trying to do is prevent state AGs from doing that with respect to a very important [group] -- state-chartered mortgage lenders that happen to be owned by banks," Schweitzer said.

The OCC "has a long history of siding with the industry," said John Ryan, executive vice president of the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, which supports Michigan. Sharing that view are a dozen consumer advocacy groups, which wrote in their brief that the banks are seeking to shelter themselves under the OCC, which they say "has shown little interest in ensuring fairness to consumers." Lenders say the OCC handles consumer complaints quietly, without prosecution, often solving the problems more quickly.

The case comes to a head in a changed political landscape. Last year, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit ruled in Wachovia's favor. Judge Boyce F. Martin Jr. wrote for the unanimous panel that federal law gave the OCC power to regulate banks, but he noted that "Congress has not spoken precisely to the issue."

The Democratic victories in the midterm elections, however, may bring the issue to the fore in Congress. Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who is expected to become chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, which oversees banks, has sponsored legislation that would limit the OCC's reach over state consumer protections.

FBI Will Investigate Polk County Shooting (CFNEWS13)

Central Florida News 13, November 25, 2006

The FBI will investigate whether authorities used excessive force when they shot a fugitive 68 times after he fatally shot a Polk County sheriff's deputy.The Justice Department made the request to the FBI on Friday, after the Florida Civil Rights Association filed a complaint alleging authorities showed disregard for human life when they shot Angilo Freeland after an all-night manhunt. A total of more than 100 shots were fired at Freeland, with 68 finding their target.

David Allred, deputy chief of the Justice Department's criminal section, said in a letter to the civil rights group that action will be taken if events occurred that violated federal law.

The FBI would be the sixth agency to investigate the shooting.

Police say Angilo Freeland shot and killed Deputy Vernon Matthew Williams, a 39-year-old father of three, and his K-9 partner, Diogi, during a routine traffic stop in September. He also shot Deputy Doug Speirs in the leg and tried to shoot two other officers.

FBI To Investigate Manhunt Shooting (AP)

ORLANDO -- The FBI will investigate whether authorities used excessive force when they shot a fugitive 68 times after he fatally shot a Polk County sheriff's deputy, a spokesman for the bureau said.

The Justice Department made the request to the FBI after the Florida Civil Rights Association filed a complaint alleging authorities showed disregard for human life when they shot Angilo Freeland after an all-night manhunt.

“In cases where the DOJ refers a case to the FBI, we will conduct the appropriate investigation,” FBI spokesman Richard Kolko wrote in an e-mail. “The results will then be provided back to DOJ for their review and further action if warranted.”

A spokeswoman in the FBI’s Tampa office, which would handle the investigation, did not immediately return a phone call for comment Friday.

David Allred, deputy chief of the Justice Department’s criminal section, said in a letter to the civil rights group that action will be taken if events occurred that violated federal law.

Allred said the letter was a standard response to civil-rights complaints.

“We are determined to see an objective review of this matter,” J. Willie David III, president of the civil-rights group, said. “Shooting anyone 110 times is more than a little extreme. We live in America, and that kind of atrocity cannot be condoned here.” cm-bd

The FBI would be the sixth agency to investigate the shooting, which is already being reviewed by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the Polk State Attorney's Office.

Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said Thursday he was "completely comfortable" with the scrutiny.

"Freeland had every opportunity to turn himself in and would have been taken into custody without a single bullet fired, even after he ambushed my deputy . . . He's the one who chose to end that situation, not us," Judd said.

Police say Freeland shot and killed Deputy Vernon Matthew Williams, a 39-year-old father of three, and his K-9 partner, Diogi, during a routine traffic stop Sept. 28. He also

Justice Dept. Probes Shooting Of Suspected Cop Killer (WESH)

WESH-TV, NBC 2, Orlando, FL, November 25, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. -- The U.S. Department of Justice is investigating the shooting death of a man accused of killing a local deputy.

Polk County Deputy Matt Williams was shot to death on Sept. 28, and officers from around Central Florida spent 22 hours looking for his killer, causing schools and neighborhoods to be locked down.

When officers found the suspected shooter hiding in the woods the next morning, he was hit with nearly 70 bullets, WESH 2 News reported.

The sheriff said they stopped shooting when they ran out of bullets.

The Justice Department will investigate whether the Polk County Sheriff's Office SWAT team used excessive force when it fired 110 rounds at Angilo Freeland, hitting him 68 times.

The probe comes at the request of the Orlando-based Florida Civil Rights Association.

"There could have been a possibility that this person could have surrendered without any unnecessary force," said the group's president J. Willie David.

After the shooting, Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said the force was necessary to make sure the suspected drug dealer accused of shooting and killing Williams and his police dog Diogi wouldn't harm anyone else.

"We weren't going to take any chance," Judd said.

They said Freeland was armed with Williams' gun when they found him hiding in the woods.

"Ladies and gentlemen, God will be the judge and the jury this time," Judd said.

After the shooting, Freeland's mother also called for an investigation.

"All we want is for all the questions surrounding why this happened to be answered," Joyce Freeland said.

The FCRA said it in no way condones the killing of the deputy, but the organization wants the FBI to determine whether the SWAT team's use of force was possibly criminal overkill.

"Out of the 10 SWAT team members out there, only nine fired. We got one here that made a decision not to fire. One of the things hopefully the Justice Department and FBI can get that answered (is) why he didn't fire," David said.

A Justice Department spokesman said if a violation of criminal civil rights statutes occurred, appropriate action will be taken.

A spokeswoman for the sheriff's office said they've done their own investigation and turned it over to the state attorney's office. She said they have no comment about the pending federal probe.

Feds Want FBI To Study Shooting By Polk Deputies (ORS)

By Rebecca Mahoney, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, November 25, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice is asking federal investigators to determine whether Polk County deputy sheriffs violated Angilo Freeland's civil rights when they shot him 68 times after Freeland gunned down a deputy and wounded another.

The request came in response to a complaint filed by the Florida Civil Rights Association, an Orlando-based organization that alleges the deputies used excessive force and showed disregard for human life when they fired 110 rounds at Freeland during a Lakeland-area standoff in September.

In a letter sent to J. Willie David III, president of the civil-rights group, the Justice Department agreed to forward the case to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and pledged a thorough review of the incident.

"You can be assured that if the evidence indicates a prosecutable violation of federal criminal rights statutes occurred, appropriate action will be taken," wrote David Allred, deputy chief of the Justice Department's criminal section.

It is not clear whether the FBI has the authority to decline to investigate. Reached at his Maryland home Thursday afternoon, Allred could not immediately recall the Freeland case and said the letter was part of the Justice Department's standard response to civil-rights complaints.

"I probably write 20 of those letters a day," he said.

The FBI would be the sixth agency to investigate the shooting. Among others, the case also is being reviewed by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the State Attorney's Office in Polk, standard procedure in police-involved shootings in Polk County.

But the possibility that the nation's highest law-enforcement agency may get involved didn't faze Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd, who said Thursday that he was "completely comfortable" with the scrutiny and that his deputies had nothing to apologize for.

"Freeland had every opportunity to turn himself in and would have been taken into custody without a single bullet fired, even after he ambushed my deputy. . . . He's the one who chose to end that situation, not us," Judd said. "There are those that want to be critical, but they weren't there that morning. They weren't facing the armed killer that my deputies faced that day."

Police say Freeland shot and killed Deputy Vernon Matthew Williams, a 39-year-old father of three, and his K-9 partner, Diogi, during a routine traffic stop Sept. 28. He also shot Deputy Doug Speirs in the leg and tried to shoot two Lakeland police officers, Judd said.

Freeland was shot and killed 22 hours later during a massive manhunt after he waved a gun and refused to surrender to nine SWAT team members.

David, who tipped off the media to the development Thursday, called the Justice Department's request a "victory for transparency."

"We are determined to see an objective review of this matter," David said. "Shooting anyone 110 times is more than a little extreme. We live in America, and that kind of atrocity cannot be condoned here."

But Judd criticized David for releasing the document on Thanksgiving, saying it was a slap in the face to the families of the slain and wounded deputies.

"On a day when my Deputy Williams should be celebrating Thanksgiving with his family, they send letters out like this," he said. "It's a real low blow."

Probe Sought In Police Shooting Of Woman (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 25, 2006

An Atlanta civil rights activist is calling for a federal investigation into the fatal shooting by Atlanta police of a 92-year-old woman during a drug raid at the woman's home.

Police contend they wanted to search Kathryn Johnston's house because an undercover drug purchase had been made there earlier on Tuesday, the day of the shooting. Johnston wounded three officers, emptying a six-shot revolver before being shot to death, police said.

The Rev. Markell Hutchins, the civil rights activist, said he will deliver a letter to the Justice Department on Monday urging the agency to investigate "what we believe are at worst, gross violations of this woman's life, and at best, poor judgment on the part of the police officers."

Hutchins said he talked Friday morning with police Chief Richard Pennington, who was out of town when the shootout occurred.

"His officers should have known at a minimum who was living in that residence before they went in there with guns blazing," Markell said.

Johnston was a frail woman who lived behind burglar bars at a home owned by her niece.

Police contend they obtained a no-knock search warrant for the Neal Street house after buying drugs Tuesday afternoon from a man inside the home.

The no-knock warrant is frequently used in suspected drug cases because police believe their surprise entry into a home prevents drug dealers from flushing or destroying the evidence. In this case, the warrant did not name a person, referring only to a "John Doe, aka Sam," the standard reference when a person's name is not known, police said.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution has been unable to independently confirm the police account about the need for the no-knock warrant because it has not been able to view the sworn statement that police provided to a judge to obtain the warrant.

State Court Administrator Stefani Searcy refused again Friday to release the documents, even though they are public records subject to immediate disclosure under Georgia law. Searcy has cited "office policy" as her reason for withholding the information.

Assistant Chief Alan Dreher has maintained police seized drugs from Johnston's home, but he has not said what the drugs were or where they were found.

Police said they knocked on Johnston's door about 7 p.m. before pulling off the burglar bars and knocking down the front door.

Dreher said Johnston should have recognized the men as officers even though they were not wearing uniforms. He said all three wore bulletproof vests that had the word "police" across the front and back. He said they shouted they were police as they burst through the door.

Johnston met the narcotics investigators with gunfire, police said. Medical examiners said she was shot twice in the chest and in extremities.

The three officers are recovering from their wounds and are on leave with pay until the investigation is complete. The police department said its internal affairs unit would investigate the shooting. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation also is reviewing the incident.

Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard also has vowed to investigate. He said a preliminary review of the Johnston shooting indicated that the officers "had a legal right" to search the home.

Hutchins wants more.

"Clearly, the police had a right to exercise a search warrant. I intend to ask the Justice Department to determine, did they have sufficient evidence for a no-knock warrant. What evidence did they have? That's what the community needs to know."

On Friday on Johnston's block, which is just off Joseph P. Lowery Boulevard, residents still buzzed about what had happened. Police have described their suspect as 6 feet tall and 250 to 260 pounds.

Nobody seemed to know a man by that description from the neighborhood. Some expressed doubts about the police account of what happened. "I think that's just something they made up," said Curtis Mitchell, Johnston's longtime neighbor.

Four days after the shooting, yellow police tape still surrounds Johnston's home, where a memorial of flowers and stuffed animals rests at the edge of her lawn.

Johnston's home is attracting visitors -- those who want to see the location of what has become a national story in hopes of making the senseless somehow make sense.

"Is this the house?" Willie Stone, 74, asked from his car. He said he hadn't been in the neighborhood in 50 years. The last time was to visit a woman he was dating.

"I was just coming to see it," said Stone, who lives in the city's Collier Heights neighborhood. "I've got my doubts about what happened."

Tabitha Crowder, who lives nearby, also came over to catch a glimpse. "We just walked past just to see," Crowder said. "It's so sad and hurtful."

U.S. Inquiry Is Sought In Killing Of Woman, 92 (AP)

ATLANTA — A civil rights activist representing the family of an elderly woman killed in a gunfight with police is calling for a federal investigation into her death.

The Rev. Markel Hutchins will go to Washington on Monday to deliver a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting that the Justice Department and FBI review the shootout, Hutchins said in a news release Thursday.

Kathryn Johnston, who police said was 92, was killed Tuesday evening by narcotics agents. Authorities said the agents got a search warrant for her home after buying drugs from a man there that afternoon.

Police said the plainclothes agents identified themselves, but when they knocked down Johnston's door, she opened fire and injured three of the officers.

All are expected to recover.

"This horrific incident has all the signs of an egregious violation of Ms. Johnston's civil and human rights at worst and police officers using poor judgment and unnecessary force at best," Hutchins said.

Johnston's neighbors and relatives have called the raid a case of mistaken identity. Her niece said there were no drugs in the home.

Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard said his office has begun its own investigation but said a preliminary review of the case shows the officers had a legal right to search the home.

State Has Yet To Test Slavery Statute (LAT)

By Garrett Therolf, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

No human trafficking cases have been tried since the law went into effect nearly a year ago. It's too difficult to prove the crime, police say.

When Westminster police raided the apartment, they were convinced they were freeing the eight women inside from modern-day slavery.

Police said the women had agreed to come to the United States from villages in Malaysia and Singapore on vague promises of a better life, but instead found themselves forced into prostitution.

Their pimps seized their passports and kept the women locked in a series of bleak apartments, with video cameras monitoring their movements and furniture barricading the doors. On the rare occasions the women were allowed outside, police said, it was with an escort.

Cases like this one prompted California last year to become the first state to enact a federally drafted law cracking down on human trafficking. Despite some well-publicized cases, authorities said existing law did not provide the legal tools to fight the crime, instead forcing them to use other charges, which often carry little or no jail time.

When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed the bill into law amid much fanfare and with the hope that it would become a national model, he said it would help put an end to "a horrific crime that our society cannot abide."

But in the 11 months since the law went into effect, not a single human trafficking case has been prosecuted, according to the law's sponsor, Assemblywoman Sally Lieber (D-Mountain View). Police complain the law makes it too difficult to prove that human trafficking has taken place.

The problem is that seldom is the evidence black and white. Were the workers being kept against their will, or were they enduring their hardships willingly as a step up the economic pecking order?

Another problem is persuading people to tell their stories of involuntary servitude. Authorities said victims often fear police because of bad experiences in their homelands and because their captors have told them their families would suffer retaliation if they talked.

"We certainly can see that the fear [on the part] of immigrants particularly has been even deeper than we expected," said San Francisco Dist. Atty. Kamala D. Harris, a co-sponsor of the law. "We can't get around the fact that the new law is being underused, but there is great promise."

On the other hand, Sally Thomas, a Los Angeles County deputy district attorney who helped draft the law, doubts it will be used extensively. "We often find it's more appropriate to bring kidnapping, false imprisonment or extortion in these cases," she said. "The statute is a very narrow statute…. Our expectations should not be extremely high."

Lawmakers believed the law was particularly important in California's immigrant communities, the sites of several well-publicized cases over the last decade. The U.S. Justice Department estimates that 17,500 people are enslaved in the nation's fields, factories and brothels, with a disproportionately large share in California, although the department acknowledges the figure may not be completely reliable.

This year, an Irvine couple were convicted in federal court of keeping a young Egyptian girl as their domestic slave. In 1995, authorities freed 71 Thai workers held behind razor wire in an El Monte sweatshop. The problems there had been reported to police two years earlier by Win Chuai Ngan, a worker who had escaped, but authorities found his story hard to believe.

A Justice Department report said the criminal rings that bring these workers to the United States have a more lucrative business than drug traffickers because of the low cost of slave labor and the small risk of getting caught.

When the state law passed — providing penalties of three to five years in prison and four to eight years if the victim is a minor — detectives dramatically stepped up their investigations, helped by federal grants aimed at fighting the trafficking rings.

The LAPD received more than $450,000, and an Orange County task force received $200,000, some of which it used to hire a liaison to teach local government and nonprofit agencies how to spot signs of trafficking.

The money also went to pay for investigations involving sophisticated surveillance equipment and informants and to pay detectives.

Westminster Police Lt. Derek Marsh leads the city's detective squad in Orange County's Little Saigon, a community believed to be a landing strip for human traffickers. In February, detectives were told by informants that a massage parlor advertising young Asian masseuses on Vietnamese and Chinese websites was a front for a brothel that enslaved prostitutes.

The detectives followed leads to Monterey Park and Rosemead, and learned that it was a sophisticated operation that moved almost monthly to avoid detection.

The women spoke no English and never saw anyone but pimps and johns, Marsh said. They often didn't use condoms.

By the time police raided the San Gabriel Valley operation in August, the eight women had worked in the two cities for as long as three years. They were paid $130 per john, and they split the money with their pimps, police said.

Five men were arrested as alleged brothel operators. A sixth suspect was believed to be recruiting additional women in Malaysia, police said.

Police said only one woman would speak to them. Marsh said she told a chilling story of forced labor and abuse.

"This is the best, most convincing case we have found," he said.

The Los Angeles district attorney's office felt otherwise.

"They really weren't being held against their will," prosecutor Marcia Daniel said. "Only one woman was willing to be truthful, and she made it abundantly clear that she did the work willingly. I don't think anybody enjoys it, but there's so much money involved."

Prosecutors charged the five men with pimping and pandering. They are awaiting trial. The women were not charged, and they are being held as potential witnesses and for review of their immigration status.

The Los Angeles district attorney has come close to prosecuting only one other trafficking case, involving a woman accused of forcing a homeless teenage girl into prostitution. The district attorney initially filed human trafficking and pimping and pandering charges but later dropped the trafficking charge.

Even the bill's author is surprised about the unexpected roadblock.

"We went through a lot of difficulty to get this bill passed, so it's obviously difficult to hear that the law is not being used more," said Lieber, who hopes to find ways to improve the law, the first felony added to the California penal code since 1999.

An important part of the trafficking law, its supporters said, can help persuade victims to cooperate. If there is a conviction, it allows victims to sue their captors for back wages, receive housing and medical assistance, obtain legal residency and receive job training and small-business loans.

Federal authorities are struggling with their law as well. The federal statute was passed in 2000, but there have been few convictions. Federal authorities say local authorities have more people to root out these cases and encouraged passage of the state law.

The Justice Department has expressed disappointment with its own progress, reporting in September that only 122 laborers and prostitutes qualified for victim benefits, 14 fewer than in the previous year.

Those benefits can provide a happy ending to workers' hardships.

Two examples are Win Chuai Ngan and his wife, Sokanya Sutthiprapha, who were among those freed from the El Monte sweatshop. With loans and training from the nonprofit Thai Community Development Center, they opened two Thai restaurants and a spa.

In the meantime, the women in the Westminster police case will be deported once the pimping and pandering trial is over.

Marsh predicted that some of their families will reject them, and that they will go back to working as prostitutes, perhaps for the same organization.

Officials: New Calif. Law Toothless Against Human Trafficking (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

A law passed nearly a year ago to help curb human trafficking in the state still has never been used to prosecute those suspected of enslaving immigrants, proponents of the bill said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said he hoped the bill would be a national model in countering modern day slavery when he signed it into law last year. The bill, he said, would end "a horrific crime that our society cannot abide."

But authorities say the law makes it too difficult to prove immigrant workers were being held against their will, one of the criteria for classifying victims of human trafficking. Investigators also said victims often are reluctant to testify against their captors for fear of retaliation against family abroad, making it difficult to build a case.

"We certainly can see that the fear (on the part) of immigrants particularly has been even deeper than we expected," said San Francisco District Attorney Kamala D. Harris, a co-sponsor of the law.

Some 17,500 immigrants are enslaved in U.S. brothels, farms and factories - with a large share in California, according to rough estimates by the U.S. Justice Department.

Harris maintains the state law will be a valuable tool in cutting down on human trafficking in the future. It provides penalties of three to five years in prison for traffickers - four to eight if the victim is a minor. And an increase in California investigations after the law passed has led to tens of thousands in federal grants for local authorities.

Los Angeles County deputy district attorney Sally Thomas, however, is less confident the new law will be used often.

"We often find it's more appropriate to bring kidnapping, false imprisonment or extortion in these cases," said Thomas, who also helped draft the law.

Local detectives who in August uncovered a brothel staffed by Asian immigrants in Orange County's Little Saigon - an area believed to be a center of human trafficking - hit a wall when they tried to present a case to the Los Angeles district attorney's office, Police Lt. Derek Marsh said.

Prosecutors were unwilling to try the case under the state law despite suspicions that one suspect was recruiting women from Malaysia and a prostitute's statements about forced labor and abuse, Marsh said.

"This is the best, most convincing case we have found," he said.

Prosecutor Marcia Daniel said, however, there was no evidence the women had been enslaved.

"I don't think anybody enjoys it, but there's so much money involved," Daniel said.

Five men were charged with pimping and pandering, but not human trafficking.

Assemblywoman Sally Lieber, a Democrat from Mountain View and author of the bill, said she was disappointed it has not been used.

"We went through a lot of difficulty to get this bill passed, so it's obviously difficult to hear that the law is not being used more," she said.

A federal law against human trafficking passed six years ago also has reaped few convictions. Federal officials hoped local authorities would be better equipped to investigate trafficking and encouraged passage of the state law.

Massachusetts Governor Sues To Compel Vote On Same-Sex Marriage Amendment (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

BOSTON, Nov. 24 — Gov. Mitt Romney filed a lawsuit Friday asking the state's highest court to order the legislature to vote on a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage or to place it on the 2008 ballot if lawmakers do not take up the provision.

The legislature voted 109 to 87 on Nov. 9 to recess a constitutional convention before the measure was taken up, which appeared to kill it. The convention was recessed until Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session.

More than 170,000 people have signed a petition asking the legislature to amend the state's Constitution to prohibit same-sex marriage. Massachusetts is the only state that permits it.

Mr. Romney, a Republican who did not seek re-election but is considering running for president, announced plans to file the lawsuit at a rally of same-sex marriage opponents on Sunday. The next day he sent a letter to the 109 lawmakers who had voted to recess, saying they were "frustrating the democratic process and subverting the plain meaning of the Constitution" by refusing to vote.

The lawsuit, filed by Mr. Romney, acting as a private citizen, and 10 other opponents of same-sex marriage, said the legislature had a "legal duty to act" on citizen petitions but had relied on procedural devices to "avoid a vote and evade its constitutional duties." The legislature recessed before voting on the measure two other times this session.

The suit named the Senate president, Robert E. Travaglini, saying he had "failed to carry out his ministerial duty to require final action" on the petition. A spokeswoman for Mr. Travaglini, a Democrat, could not be reached for comment.

The suit asks the Supreme Judicial Court to "step into the constitutional breach" and direct Secretary of State William F. Galvin, also named in the suit, to place the amendment on the 2008 ballot if the legislature does not act.

Fifty of 200 legislators must vote in favor of the constitutional amendment in this session and in the next one for it to appear as a referendum on the 2008 ballot. Both sides have said the amendment has enough support to advance to the next session.

In a statement, Kris Mineau, the president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which circulated petitions for the amendment, applauded the lawsuit. Mr. Mineau said that the recess was a "deliberate effort by those in the legislature to kill the marriage amendment" and that the legislature had failed to "afford the citizens a fair up or down vote."

Gary Buseck, legal director for Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, which won the lawsuit that led to the legalization of same-sex marriage before the same court, called the lawsuit frivolous.

"I can't see any way in which this lawsuit has any merit whatsoever," Mr. Buseck said. "The bottom line is, the legislature acted in accordance with its rules and the Constitution and did the right thing to protect the now-declared constitutional rights of same-sex couples to marry. There's no getting around that."

Lawrence M. Friedman, a specialist on Massachusetts constitutional law at the New England School of Law, said the court must decide if the State Constitution requires the legislature to vote. Professor Friedman signed a brief supporting same-sex marriage in 2003 but has not been involved in the issue since then.

"This case is not about same-sex marriage," he said. "This is a case, first, about what the legislature is required to do, and second, if there is anything the court can do about it.

"It's not at all clear to me how this is something the court can remedy. It doesn't seem likely to me the court will order the legislature to take a vote or subvert constitutional procedures and just put it on the ballot."

Mass. Gov. Romney Asks Court To Force Gay Marriage Question Onto 2008 Ballot (AP)

AP, November 24, 2006

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney asked Massachusetts' highest court Friday to force a proposed anti-gay marriage constitutional amendment onto the state's 2008 ballot if the Legislature fails to vote on it.

The Republican governor, a fierce opponent of gay marriage and a possible presidential contender, filed the request with the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court after lawmakers put off acting on the question until January. The high court ruled 4-3 in 2003 that the state could no longer deny marriage licenses to gay couples.

Romney has said the state Constitution requires legislators to vote on whether the measure should go on the ballot. If they don't vote when they return Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session, the court can order the secretary of state to put it on the 2008 ballot, Romney argues.

The postponement of legislative action was widely seen by supporters and opponents of gay marriage as a way to kill the measure.

Backers of the question, which would define marriage in Massachusetts as the union of a man and a woman, gathered more than 170,000 signatures of people.

Opponents of the question, including powerful House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi, feared they didn't have the 151 votes needed to kill the measure and instead called for a vote to recess the joint House-Senate session until Jan. 2. Lawmakers approved the recess vote by 109-87.

Since gay marriage became legal, more than 8,000 same-sex couples have tied the knot in Massachusetts, the only state to allow gay marriage. The ballot measure would ban future gay marriages in Massachusetts but leave existing ones intact.

Romney, who opted not to run for a second term as governor this year, is nearing a decision on whether to seek the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Bishops Stand Firm On Birth Control (WP)

By Tim Townsend

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

ST. LOUIS -- It has been so long since most U.S. Catholics have even debated the moral implications of contraception that statisticians no longer regularly ask them what they think of birth control.

Recent poll numbers are scarce, but those that exist suggest that about 90 percent of U.S. Roman Catholics ignore their church's teaching on contraception.

"When it comes to that particular tenet of faith, it's a lost cause in America," said Tom Smith, a senior research scientist with the National Organization for Research at the University of Chicago.

But Catholic Church teaching doesn't change based on statistics, even if that teaching is ignored for a couple of generations.

"The Catholic Church articulates what we believe to be true, and we don't stop believing what's true because it's statistically unpopular," Bishop Edward Braxton of Belleville, Ill., said recently at the fall meeting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Baltimore. "We are countercultural in that sense."

Somewhat lost in reports from the meeting was the approval of a new document from the U.S. church's anti-abortion committee aimed at young Catholics who are engaged or recently married. Called "Married Love and the Gift of Life," the document reaffirms the church's stance that artificial contraception is immoral, even between husband and wife.

The document passed with 95 percent of bishops voting in its favor and no debate on the floor. The bishops were as unified behind their teaching on contraception as their flock and the dominant culture are against it. The expression "countercultural" came up repeatedly in conversations with bishops.

There is no question that church teaching on contraception has remained the same for centuries or that U.S. Catholics have largely ignored it for the last 50 years. The real question about "Married Love and the Gift of Life" is: Why now?

Bishops in Baltimore answered that question by pointing to what they see as a trend: Young Catholics are increasingly seeking out the church's ancient teachings. In this sense, the bishops' repeated use of "countercultural" has additional meaning.

The idea that a new generation of Catholics will reject the perceived sexual freedoms gained by their parents and grandparents over the last half-century and align with a theology that teaches sex for procreation is truly, as they see it, revolutionary.

"The real radical idea is not 'don't use contraception,' " said Christopher West, a research fellow and faculty member of the Theology of the Body Institute in West Chester, Pa. "The real radical idea is connecting sex and God -- that sex is meant to express divine love."

The new document is the first about birth control from the collective body of U.S. bishops since 1968's "Human Life in Our Day."

Archbishop Joseph Naumann of Kansas City, Kan., a member of the bishops' anti-abortion committee, said that was too long. U.S bishops, he said, have failed to properly educate Catholics about the church's teaching on contraception. "We haven't been clear enough or effective enough as teachers," Naumann said.

Not everyone thinks U.S. Catholics will be persuaded by the bishops' renewed focus on contraception.

"It seems to me extremely unlikely it will make much difference to most people," said James P. Hanigan, a professor of moral theology at Duquesne University in Pittsburgh who has studied the church's teaching on birth control. "For most people, this issue's been resolved."

The church's ancient view on contraception (the roots of its opposition can be traced to the second century) was most famously reaffirmed by Pope Paul VI in his 1968 encyclical, "Humanae Vitae," or "of human life." Most other Christian churches accept contraception as a responsible method of family planning. The Catholic Church teaches that because contraception suppresses the possibility of procreation, and therefore violates the natural law, it is always wrong.

"Suppressing fertility by using contraception denies part of the inherent meaning of married sexuality and does harm the couple's unity," according to "Married Love and the Gift of Life." "The total giving of oneself, body and soul, to one's beloved is no time to say: 'I give you everything I am -- except.' "

The new document sets the church's teaching within the context Pope John Paul II's "Theology of the Body," a set of 129 short talks he gave from 1979 to 1984 that reflected on sexuality and divinity. West said the message of "Theology of the Body" is that eros, or erotic love, is meant to express agape, or divine love.

"When a married couple cuts off the eros from the agape," said West, they "render the sexual act sterile . . . they won't find the sexual happiness they went in search of. Instead they will find disillusionment, despair and societal chaos."

Carlyle Group Broaches Buyout Of Taiwanese Chip Maker ASE (WSJ)

By Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The Carlyle Group is in talks with the management of Advanced Semiconductor Engineering Inc. of Taiwan to make an offer for the publicly listed company in what would be a buyout valued at between $5 and $6 billion.

A deal of that size would mean Asia is joining the private-equity wave that has hit the U.S. and Europe. ASE, a chip-testing and packaging company, is listed both in Taiwan and on the New York Stock Exchange.

"A Carlyle-led consortium acknowledges that it has submitted an indication of interest to the Board of Directors regarding a potential acquisition." Carlyle, a firm that specializes in the buyout of public companies, said in a prepared statement.

The Carlyle announcement added that the investment firm had signed an agreement with Jason Chang, the chairman of ASE and its largest shareholder, with 18.4% of the outstanding shares, to buy out other shareholders at NT$39 (US$1.19) a share. That price represents a 24% premium above the 30-day average closing price of the stock.

The success of the deal depends on the willingness of shareholders to tender shares. This type of public-to-private offer with the support of management has been a feature of recent deals in the U.S., including those involving Kinder Morgan Inc. and HCA Inc.

Semiconductor companies have been a focus of private-equity firms. Carlyle was recently part of a consortium led by the Blackstone Group, along with Texas Pacific Group and Permira Funds which bought Freescale Semiconductor Inc. in a $17.6 billion deal. In the past, private-equity firms were reluctant to buy semiconductor operations but their appetite has grown as the stocks have become less volatile, making it possible to support heavy debt loads.

In recent months, Taiwan, along with Australia, has been among the most promising markets for international private-equity firms. Carlyle has been particularly active in the media sector in Taiwan, having recently bought Taiwan Broadband Communications and Eastern Multimedia Corp. Its presence in Taiwan indicates it has extensive relationships with local banks, which are expected to provide attractive terms on the debt for the potential buyout.

Carlyle's interest in the Taiwanese technology sector has been moving the market the past few days, with speculation that it is also looking at other firms.

Carlyle Set For $6.4bn ASE Deal (FT)

By Katrin Hille In Taipei

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

The Carlyle Group is poised to acquire Taiwan's Advanced Semiconductor Engineering, the world's largest chip packaging and testing company, in a $6.4bn buyout that would set a new landmark in private equity deals in the technology industry.

The acquisition, which is expected to close early next year, could help ASE win new orders from semiconductor companies recently acquired by private equity firms.

Carlyle and ASE said on Friday that the US private equity group had submitted an indication of interest to ASE regarding a potential acquisition at T$39 a share, and that Jason Chang, ASE's single largest shareholder and chairman, had already agreed to roll his 18.4 per cent stake into a Carlyle-controlled holding company that would own ASE.

At T$39, the offer price represents a 10 per cent premium to ASE's closing share price of T$35.50 on Friday, before news of Carlyle's interest emerged.

Carlyle said the deal could greatly enhance ASE's market position, because other semiconductor firms in the group's portfolio and even those owned by other private equity firms were likely to increase outsourcing volumes.

ASE, which is also listed on the New York Stock Exchange, performs packaging and testing services for other chipmakers who do not want to run the capacity for these relatively labour-intensive final steps in the semiconductor manufacturing chain.

Greg Zeluck, Carlyle's managing director of Asia buyouts, said ASE was likely to win new outsourcing orders from Freescale, Motorola's former chipmaking unit, which Carlyle is also acquiring.

Freescale is already one of ASE's five largest customers, but also works with Amkor, its smaller rival.

"There are more outsourcing opportunities from other semiconductor firms in the Carlyle portfolio," said Mr Zeluck. "I also think that there are additional opportunities from Philips even though we are not an investor there."

Netherlands-based Philips sold its semiconductor arm to a consortium led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts earlier this year.

"The private equity industry's growing presence in the semiconductor industry will push these companies more in the direction of assets-light," said Mr Zeluck.

Freddy Liu, ASE vice-president, said: "As consolidation is taking place upstream, consolidation is also due downstream in the semiconductor industry. This is a sign of confidence in ASE."

People close to the situation said an open tender offer would be submitted over the next two months. "With Mr Chang's agreement to take part, this is pretty much a done deal," said one person close to the talks.

Based on ASE's outstanding shares, the offer is worth US$5.5bn. Bankers said including debt, the deal would be valued at US$6.4bn.

Carlyle plans to delist ASE once the deal closes and retain Mr Chang and his brother as chairman and chief executive of the company.

ASE reported T$4.2bn net earnings for the third quarter on T$26.7bn in revenues. Behind US-based Amkor, the company's biggest rivals are Stats ChipPac of Singapore and Taiwan-based Siliconware.

Carlyle In Talks To Buy Chip Company (WP/BLOOM)

By Cathy Chan, Bloomberg News

DOJ_NMG_0098447

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

Carlyle Group of the District is in talks to buy Advanced Semiconductor Engineering, the world's largest computer chip packager, for $5.7 billion, as demand for computer and mobile-phone components increases.

Carlyle and Advanced Semiconductors Chairman Jason Chang, who holds 18.4 percent of the Taiwan company, offered to pay 9.9 percent more than the company's closing price yesterday in Taipei, Carlyle said in a written statement. Carlyle said talks with the group have not concluded and a formal offer may not be made.

Carlyle's proposed purchase would add to recent acquisitions the firm has made in the semiconductor business. In September, it was part of a group that agreed to buy Freescale Semiconductor for $17.6 billion, in the biggest technology buyout ever. Global chip sales could increase 9.4 percent this year, the Semiconductor Industry Association said.

"The outlook for the electronics industry is good, as the introduction of Microsoft's Vista should boost demand for PCs," said Michael On, who oversees the equivalent of $60 million as managing director at Beyond Asset Management in Taipei.

The spot price of benchmark 512-megabyte memory chips, used in personal computers and other devices, has risen 62 percent this year, according to Dramexchange.com in Taiwan.

Advanced Semiconductor, which was founded in 1984, packages chips in plastic or ceramic housings and adds connectors so they can be assembled as part of computers, game consoles, cellphones and other electronic instruments. The company employs more than 30,000 people.

Advanced Semiconductor confirmed the Carlyle offer and Chang's participation in the bid.

"We have received the indication of the offer from Carlyle, and our chairman has agreed with the offer," spokesman Freddie Liu said in a telephone interview yesterday. "We still need to seek approval from other shareholders."

Liu declined to comment on whether the company's vice chairman and president, Richard Chang, who helped found the company with his brother Jason, would also participate in the bid.

The company's shares rose 2.6 percent before the announcement, which came after the close of trading. The offer represents a 23.5 percent premium on the stock's 30-day average closing price, Carlyle said.

Goldman Sachs Group is advising Carlyle on the takeover bid. Carlyle has been investing in Taiwan since 1999, the company said.

Advanced Semiconductor could "take advantage of accelerating global outsourcing trends for semiconductor assembly and testing services," said Greg Zeluck, Carlyle's managing director. The firm could also tap the "global networks of Carlyle and its portfolio companies."

Buyout firms have announced offers totaling $57 billion in the Asia Pacific region this year, more than triple the amount for all of 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News.

Carlyle said in July that it raised $1.8 billion for its second Asia buyout fund, which will focus on investment in Asia outside of Japan. That would make $4.8 billion it has attracted for investment in the region in the past year, including its second Japan fund.

Smithfield Is Pushing Into The Beef And Turkey Industries (VP)

By Jeremiah Mcwilliams

Virginian-Pilot, November 25, 2006

"Y'all know Smithfield," drawls Southern food personality Paula Deen in a radio commercial. "They're the ham people."

True: Smithfield Foods Inc., which recently hired Deen to push its spiral-sliced hams and other signature products, is the world's largest hog-raiser and pork processor. And it plans to further fatten its pork portfolio. But the company, with sales of $11.4 billion in its fiscal year ended April 30, also is growing aggressively beyond its roots in hogs and ham.

A recent deal gave Smithfield a 49 percent stake in Butterball LLC, the nation's largest turkey producer. And a planned Oklahoma beef plant will make the Smithfield-based company the fourth-largest beef processor in the United States.

Smithfield, which appears to be testing antitrust limits with growth in its core pig and pork business, is trying to buy or build its way into bigger positions in nearly every type of meat except chicken, which it has avoided so far.

"This is the most active period in Smithfield's history," chief executive C. Larry Pope told analysts at a Boston conference in September. "In virtually every segment of our business today, something very significant is going on.... Smithfield is not just in the pork business."

Smithfield is betting that the vertically integrated model it honed in pork - controlling production from animal-raising to meat-packing - will translate well to beef.

Smithfield has just 6 percent of the U.S. beef-processing market. But the company is dwarfed by the top four players, which together control 83 percent, according to its estimates.

"We need to get bigger - we're still too small in beef," Pope said Monday as Smithfield donated turkeys to a Norfolk food bank. "Our customers, like Farm Fresh... want to deal with fewer and fewer suppliers."

For example, Tyson Foods Inc. is more than twice Smithfield's size. "We need to be of size to match," Pope said.

U.S. beef packers have struggled in recent years, largely because of high cattle prices and restrictions on exported U.S. beef in Asian nations such as Japan and South Korea, which blocked such imports after a case of mad cow disease was discovered in Washington state in December 2003. At Smithfield, for instance, beef yielded about 23 percent of its sales last year, but the division lost $2.8 million.

Several analysts believe that U.S. beef plants don't stay busy enough to make a profit.

Smithfield's new plant, announced Oct. 18, could further weaken the industry and hurt Smithfield's earnings per share, said JPMorgan analyst Pablo Zuanic.

Construction on the $200 million plant in Texas County, Okla., is scheduled to begin in January. A 50-50 joint venture with ContiGroup Companies Inc., the plant will be able to slaughter as many as 5,000 cattle daily.

Zuanic suggested last month that Smithfield might be using "gamemanship" - the threat of tougher competition in an already battered industry - to force private equity firm HM Capital Partners to sell Swift & Co., a major beef and pork processor and longtime Smithfield target.

Pope denied that.

Because the Japanese market reopened this summer and Korea is loosening restrictions, "those markets will be alive and well" in two years, Pope said. The Oklahoma plant could help Smithfield target the export markets.

"There's a real opportunity to grow on the beef side," said Bill Chappell, an equity analyst in Atlanta with SunTrust Robinson Humphrey. Although beef is a secondary project for Smithfield, "they want to make a go of it."

The new plant will draw from Smithfield's cattle-feeding joint venture with ContiGroup, which can feed 811,000 cattle at its 10 feed lots in Colorado, Kansas, Idaho, Texas and Oklahoma. It is the largest cattle-feeding operation in the country.

"We do have the cattle," Pope said at Smithfield's annual meeting in Richmond three months ago. "We could put together an integrated model that would be pretty compelling."

Smithfield's ability to trace cattle from feed lots to meat-packing lines - similar to its "traceability" in hog slaughtering, which the company touts as a safety benefit - could pay dividends, said Andrew Wolf, a managing director in Richmond with BB&T Capital Markets, which is seeking investment banking work from Smithfield Foods.

"They'll have control of the animal the whole time," Wolf said. So Smithfield will be able to get "a deserved premium on the export market."

The Butterball purchase, at least in name recognition, is one of Smithfield's most eye-catching moves.

Pope has said Butterball is "the national brand - it is almost synonymous with the word 'turkey.' "

This fall, Carolina Turkeys, of which Smithfield already owned 49 percent, shelled out $325 million for ConAgra Foods Inc.'s Butterball turkey operations. Renamed Butterball LLC, the Mount Olive, N.C.-based turkey producer is a joint venture with Maxwell Farms Inc.

Butterball gives the former Carolina Turkeys, and its owners, a stronger cache among consumers. Butterball's products command premium prices, Pope said. That matches a key Smithfield strategy - shifting the business into more profitable products such as pre-cooked sausages and bacon, and capitalizing on the higher prices consumers will pay for convenience.

In addition to the Butterball acquisition, Smithfield paid $246 million in cash for the rest of ConAgra's branded meats business, which included Armour and LunchMakers.

Convenience products such as precooked ribs can command prices eight or 10 times higher than unprocessed, fresh meat, Pope said in September.

It's "a gigantic move up the value chain," Pope said. "You can do the simple math on this, and the math is pretty darn explosive."

While it expands in beef and turkey, Smithfield is running into opposition as it tries to complete a strategic buy in its core business: the planned $810 million deal for Premium Standard Farms, a Kansas City-based hog raiser and processor.

The proposal, announced in September, sparked protests from farming groups and Midwest politicians who argued that the merger of the nation's top two hog-raisers would give Smithfield too much power over small hog farmers.

"It makes no anti trust sense to allow Smithfield to buy Premium Standard Farms," said Michael Stumo, an attorney for the Lincoln, Neb.-based Organization for Competitive Markets. "It is a 100 percent power grab."

The Department of Justice this month asked Smithfield and Premium Standard for more information on the merger - a move that will delay the deal until the companies comply. Such requests occurred in only 3.1 percent of transactions in fiscal 2005, according to a Department of Justice report.

"It indicates that you're much higher on the radar of the Justice Department than you'd like," said Thane Scott, co-chair of the antitrust practice group at Edwards Angell Palmer & Dodge in Boston. "If you get a second request, you're in the danger zone."

Smithfield expected the additional scrutiny and would clear anti trust hurdles, Pope said. "We not trying to dominate the industry. We're trying to secure our future."

Still, if the deal goes through, Smithfield will have "probably grown as big as it can in the U.S. pork business," said SunTrust analyst Chappell, who added that it can still expand its European pork business.

Pope, who was promoted to chief executive on Sept. 1, seems to relish adding new brands and looking for new opportunities. Smithfield makes no apology for being one of the most opportunistic companies in the meat industry.

"We are committed to global expansion," Pope said.

FTC Backs Merger Of Real Estate Companies (AP)

CB Richard Ellis needs only shareholder approval to complete Trammell Crow acquisition.

DALLAS — CB Richard Ellis Group Inc., the world's largest commercial real estate services company, has been cleared by federal regulators to acquire rival Trammell Crow Co. for nearly $1.8 billion.

Dallas-based Trammell Crow announced Friday that the final regulatory step was completed when the Federal Trade Commission approved early termination of a waiting period required under antitrust law. The deal is expected to close next month.

El Segundo, Calif.-based CB Richard Ellis agreed in October to buy Trammell Crow for about $1.79 billion, or $49.51 a share.

The deal will create a company with about $4.4 billion in annual revenue, more than 10 percent of the commercial real estate market, and let CB Richard Ellis tap Trammell Crow's list of corporate clients.

Trammell Crow shareholders must still approve the deal at a special meeting Dec. 18.

Analysts say U.S. office markets have rebounded from a slump earlier this decade, and foreign pension funds are pouring money into buildings, then hiring firms to manage their property.

The trends have helped raise the value of firms such as Trammell Crow, whose shares more than quadrupled since early 2003.

With nearly 50 offices in the United States, Trammell Crow employs about 6,200 people and posted 2005 earnings of $59 million on $896 million in sales.

CB Richard Ellis employs about 14,500 people and posted 2005 net income of $217 million on sales of $2.9 billion. Chairman Richard Blum owns 14 percent of the company through his Blum Capital Partners.

Trammell Crow's shares closed Friday at $49.27, up 4 cents and within 12 cents of their 52-week high. CB Richard Ellis' shares fell 20 cents to $32.61.

Microsoft Gives Europe Antitrust Documents (NYT)

By Paul Meller

The New York Times, November 24, 2006

BRUSSELS, Nov. 23 — Microsoft submitted a new batch of technical information about its Windows operating system to the European Commission on Thursday, meeting the latest deadline to provide information on whether it is complying with a 2004 antitrust ruling.

"This is an important milestone," Microsoft said in a statement. Final edits and technical review of the information already submitted in July have now been completed, it added, insisting that it had not broken the summer deadline.

The commission, which fined Microsoft $357 million in July for failing to comply with the antitrust order, disagrees. Last week, the European competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, expressed growing impatience with Microsoft when she imposed the latest deadline. She described the dossier submitted in July as incomplete and warned Microsoft that it faced daily fines of 3 million euros ($3.9 million) if it did not hand over all the technical information about Windows that the commission had requested.

Her department welcomed the company's submission. "Now the dossier from Microsoft is worth testing," her spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said in a telephone interview on Thursday. "Potential licensees of the technical information will be invited to Microsoft's headquarters in Redmond to look at it."

In the meantime, the commission and the trustee chosen by Microsoft to oversee the process of compliance with the 2004 ruling will examine the newly submitted information, Mr. Todd said.

In 2004, Microsoft was found guilty of abusing the dominant strength of Windows to muscle in on other separate software markets, including the market for server operating systems.

The 2004 ruling ordered Microsoft to disclose enough information about Windows to allow rival server software manufacturers, including Sun Microsystems and open-source companies like Red Hat, to design server operating systems that worked as well with computers that run Windows as Microsoft's own server operating system.

If the information provided by Microsoft does not satisfy the order, the company will face a fine of 3 million euros a day, backdated to July, Mr. Todd said.

Microsoft said Thursday that it had met the July deadline. "The trustee and Microsoft have now completed the technical review and edits to the more than 100 documents, totaling 8,500 pages, that we submitted in July of this year, in accordance with the deadline established by the commission," it said.

It described the submission of technical documentation in July, and the revision process since then, as "an unprecedented undertaking involving over 300 engineers and technical writers at Microsoft."

Even if the information submitted Thursday is satisfactory, Microsoft may still face fines for the period between the July deadline and Thursday. "We'll take a decision about this period of time in due course," Mr. Todd said.

Microsoft Meets EC Deadline For Disclosing Software Data (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

The information will be tested before it goes to rivals in the European antitrust action.

European Union regulators said Microsoft Corp. met a Thursday deadline for turning over information about its Windows operating software that should help other software companies.

The data will be tested to confirm that the company has finally complied with a 2004 antitrust ruling.

The European Commission, which fined Microsoft 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July for not providing "complete and accurate" data to allow server software to interface with Windows, said the technical manual could now be reviewed by "potential licensees" — companies that compete with Microsoft in software for work-group servers, such as Sun Microsystems Inc., Novell Inc. and IBM Corp.

"In parallel, the monitoring trustee will test the documentation in order to verify its accuracy," the EC said. "The commission will decide in due course whether or not Microsoft is in compliance with the obligation to provide complete and accurate technical documentation, taking into account comments from the potential licensees and advice from the trustee."

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said this was likely to take "months rather than weeks."

Regulators threatened new fines of 3 million euros a day last week if Microsoft did not patch up "the remaining omissions and deficiencies." They said the company should have handed over a good set of documents explaining how server protocols work by an original July 2004 deadline.

The software maker was ordered to provide the information after the EU found it guilty of abusing its monopoly by deliberately withholding technical data from rivals, who alleged that Microsoft ended cooperation when it started making its own server software.

Microsoft challenged the immediate sanctions, but a judge ordered it to comply in December 2004. It also said the commission's request was unclear and it had received a useful set of guidelines only when independent monitor Neil Barrett set out a work program earlier this year.

The company said Thursday's decision was an important milestone.

"The trustee and Microsoft have now completed the technical review and edits to the more than 100 documents, totaling 8,500 pages, that we submitted in July of this year, in accordance with the deadline established by the commission," Microsoft said in a statement. "We will continue to work closely with the commission and the trustee to ensure that we are in full compliance with every aspect of the commission's decision."

The EU fined Microsoft a record 497 million euros in March 2004 and told it to share interoperability information with rivals and put on sale a copy of Windows without Media Player software.

These conditions will apply to all future versions of Windows — including the upcoming Vista operating system.

Regulators also highlighted other possible antitrust problems with Vista's wide range of functions, fueled by comments from other information technology companies.

Google Reaches Copyright Deal With Belgians (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 25, 2006

Google, the world's most-used Internet search engine, reached a settlement with Belgian photographers and journalists yesterday in a copyright dispute over how Google's news service links to newspaper content.

The agreement was made with the Belgian copyright groups Sofam, representing about 3,700 photographers, and Scam, on behalf of journalists. In September, Google lost a copyright suit initially filed by Copiepresse, a group representing French- and German-language newspapers in Belgium. That case is being reheard, but the company has removed links to 17 papers from its Google News page.

Copyright disputes with Google compelled Microsoft to remove Web site links to Belgian newspapers last month and highlighted the global issue of whether traditional copyright protections apply to Internet search services.

"We reached an agreement with Sofam and Scam that will help us make extensive use of their content," Jessica Powell, a spokeswoman for Google, said in a phone interview yesterday. She declined to give details of the agreement or say whether it involved paying the groups for the content, and declined to say whether Google, based in Mountain View, Calif., was considering similar accords with the newspapers.

The company has a similar case with Agence France-Presse, which protested Google's linking to the news agency's articles and pictures in the United States and in France last year.

A Brussels court heard arguments yesterday from groups that remain in the lawsuit. Copiepresse sued in February, and a court ruling Sept. 5 forced Google to remove Google News links to the newspapers or face a fine of a million euros daily. Google complied on Sept. 18.

Google, which was not represented in court the first time in the Copiepresse case, asked the court for a new hearing. "Today was a reconsideration of the case," Ms. Powell said.

A ruling is expected by early January, the court said.

Tied Up In Cable (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

With mergers to rule on, multibillion-dollar bets on fiber-optic cable being laid and obscenity on broadcast television to babysit, you'd think the Federal Communications Commission would have better things to do than micromanage the market for cable boxes -- a market that mostly doesn't exist anyway. No such luck.

Like much of the trouble in telecom these days, this problem goes back to the supposedly de-regulatory 1996 Telecommunications Act. Tucked in there alongside its better-known goofs was Section 304: "Competitive Availability of Navigation Devices." This section required the FCC to open up the market for third-party "navigation devices" -- which basically meant cable boxes.

This idea encapsulates in a nutshell what was wrong with the 1996 Act. Rather than lifting regulations and letting market forces prevail, the Act is riddled with attempts to generate competition by government fiat. So it is with Section 304. Without really asking whether it made sense to require competition in cable boxes, our Solons simply decreed that the FCC should make it happen.

It hasn't happened, in part because Section 304 has never been enforced and in part because it's unclear just how big a market there is for consumer-purchased set-top boxes when the boxes can be leased from the cable company at regulated rates for a couple of dollars a month. The regulatory machine nonetheless marches on. And unless the FCC takes action on a number of waivers requested by the cable companies, the industry faces a $600 million annual bill to comply with a regulation with no real purpose. That's right: $600 million, which will of course be passed along in higher rates for consumers.

In order to facilitate competition, the FCC required the cable companies to come up with a way to provide their security codes to third-party devices, whether they are set-top boxes or cable-ready televisions. The method settled upon was a device called a cablecard. Users who didn't want the set-top box could instead get a cablecard from the cable provider and plug that into their TV, for example. This has been done, and there are some people out there using these cablecards, although most people don't bother.

The trouble with the FCC has come because the cable companies themselves don't use the cablecards in their own boxes -- the theory is that if everyone had to use the cards, the cable companies might somehow make the cards more attractive to consumers. So the FCC wants the cable companies to use cable boxes that need a cablecard, too -- never mind that the cost is high and the benefits to anyone are dubious.

The FCC could make this go away by granting a waiver from the rule, as the 1996 Act allows when the FCC determines it is in the public interest to do so. But so far there's been little sign that the FCC is inclined to do the industry any favors. The National Cable and Telecommunication Association -- a cable industry lobbying group -- put in a waiver request back in July. The FCC is supposed to rule on waivers within 90 days, but it didn't even put the application out for public comment until a week after we first called the FCC about the issue late last month.

The cable industry has had run-ins with FCC Chairman Kevin Martin over "a la carte" pricing and the expansion of obscenity rules to cable channels. This lends the cablecard shakedown a flavor of political payback -- especially coming from what is supposed to be a deregulatory, free-market-oriented FCC. Mr. Martin, who long bemoaned the absence of a Republican majority on the Commission, now has one, but there's still too little evidence of the Commission acting like it.

Concern about Mr. Martin's commitment to free markets had led Senators to hold up his renomination as Chairman for six months, turning what should have been a no-brainer into a last-minute confirmation earlier this month. The Commission, and Mr. Martin, could do the economy a favor by worrying less about political gamesmanship and more about getting on with the deregulation the telecom industry needs.

ENVIRONMENT:

Environment An Inconvenient Case For Supreme Court (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0098453

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Things are bound to heat up at the Supreme Court Wednesday, when justices weigh whether the Clean Air Act requires the Bush administration to do something about global warming.

In the late 1990s, the Clinton administration determined that greenhouse gasses -- such as auto emissions, which contribute to global climate change -- fell under the Environmental Protection Agency's jurisdiction. Challenged by then-Rep. Tom DeLay (R., Texas) at a 1998 congressional hearing, the EPA produced a legal opinion concluding that carbon dioxide could be regulated if the agency determined it contributed to "adverse effects on public health, welfare or the environment."

Environmental groups asked the EPA to act. But the agency, moving at its glacial pace, didn't respond until 2003, when a different regulatory climate prevailed in Washington. The Bush administration rejected the petition, along with the Clinton EPA's legal opinion. Carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gasses aren't "air pollutants" as defined by the Clean Air Act and, even if they were, Congress hadn't authorized the EPA to do anything about them, the administration concluded.

But even if greenhouse gases were pollutants and Congress had authorized the EPA to regulate them, the agency said it had no obligation to act. It cited "uncertainty" over the way global warming worked and the best way to remedy it, particularly in light of diplomatic disputes over the Kyoto Protocol and other international approaches to the problem.

That upset not only ecology groups, but also environmentally conscious states, which argued that federal law required EPA action, particularly since they couldn't individually regulate emissions to a degree that would affect global warming. Massachusetts took the lead, backed eventually by 17 other states and big cities, including Baltimore, New York and Washington. The Bush administration, along with such auto- and oil-producing states as Michigan, Alaska and Texas, defended the EPA position. The administration prevailed at the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The D.C. Circuit, however, coughed up a fractured opinion with plenty for the high court to consider. Judge A. Raymond Randolph ruled that it was up to the administration to decide whether or not to act on greenhouse gases. Judge David Sentelle found that the states lacked standing to sue over such a generalized phenomenon as global warming. And in dissent, Judge David Tatel wrote that the EPA had no legal grounds to refuse to begin the rule-making process.

The case has attracted interest well beyond environmental-law regulars. A Colorado ski resort filed a friend-of-court brief for Massachusetts, fearful that its prized snow could melt away without federal action. Clinton Secretary of State Madeleine Albright submitted an argument that diplomatic disputes over environmental issues shouldn't interfere with domestic rule making.

The Supreme Court is expected to decide by June, but the justices, like the EPA, aren't always successful in clearing the air.

States Will Tell Supreme Court Feds Must Act On Warming (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The polar icecaps are melting, summers growing hotter and hurricanes becoming more powerful, but the Bush administration has insisted it cannot regulate the gases that many believe are responsible.

On Wednesday, a coalition of 12 states, led by California and Massachusetts, will try to persuade the Supreme Court that the nation's environmental regulators have the legal authority and responsibility to control greenhouse gas emissions linked to global warming — which many scientists describe as the biggest environmental threat to the planet.

It is a rare day when state lawyers travel to Washington hoping to win new powers for the federal government. As David Bookbinder, a Sierra Club lawyer, noted, "How often do federal authorities insist they lack the authority to do something?"

The administration's approach to another global issue — terrorism — has been to assert broad powers to act at home and abroad. On the environmental front, the administration says, it is studying the problem and "seeking a cooperative international approach to addressing global climate change," Solicitor General Paul Clement wrote in his brief to the court.

Putting new limits on motor vehicles and power plants is out of the question, at least for now, he added, saying, "the Environmental Protection Agency lacks authority under the Clean Air Act … to regulate greenhouse gas emissions."

The case before the Supreme Court tests that conclusion. It begins with a simple question: Is carbon dioxide an "air pollutant" under the Clean Air Act? The answer may determine not only whether federal regulators must tackle global warming, but also whether California and other states may do so on their own.

Four years ago, California adopted stricter rules. The state Legislature declared its intent to "achieve the maximum feasible and cost-effective reduction of greenhouse gas emissions" from motor vehicles. These standards for new cars and trucks are to take effect in 2009.

The California way

Because of California's notorious smog problem, Congress permitted the Golden State to adopt stricter exhaust standards for cars and trucks under a special provision in the federal air pollution laws of the 1970s. Other states are allowed to follow California's lead, and 10 — from New England to the Pacific Northwest — have plans to do so.

"Global warming is a national and international crisis. And even if the federal government won't do anything, many states will," said California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, who filed one of several lawsuits challenging the Bush administration's decision not to act on greenhouse gases.

The legality of California's new vehicle emission standards remains in doubt. They must be approved by the EPA. But the agency has yet to do so, mostly because of its view that carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases are not air pollutants under the Clean Air Act.

The automakers have sued to block California's rules, citing the EPA's stand.

Humans and animals exhale carbon dioxide, and plants absorb it. It is also emitted from tailpipes and smokestacks when fossil fuels are burned. Once in the atmosphere, carbon dioxide absorbs the sun's radiation and traps heat in the atmosphere. This is known as the greenhouse effect.

As these greenhouse gases — including methane, nitrous oxide and fluorocarbons — have become more concentrated in the atmosphere, temperatures have increased slowly but steadily. Though some scientists and politicians once dismissed this link, most now acknowledge it.

Bush administration lawyers do not discount the importance of global warming, but they argue it is not covered by the Clean Air Act. That measure, they say, targets pollutants, such as ozone, that are dangerous to breathe — not ones that occur in nature and are essentially harmless to breathe, such as carbon dioxide.

Disagreeing, the states' lawyers point to the language of the law. It says an air pollutant is "any physical, chemical (or) biological … substance or matter which is emitted … into the ambient air."

In their brief to the court, they point out, "Motor vehicles emit the physical and chemical matter carbon dioxide, methane, nitrous oxide and hydro-fluorocarbons into the ambient air." Motor vehicles are the source of about 25% of the nation's greenhouse gas emissions.

It says 'shall'

Another provision appears to require regulation of such gases. It says the EPA "shall" regulate any pollutant from cars or trucks "which may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The law defines the public's welfare to include effects on "climate" and "weather."

The state lawyers argue that because it is now apparent that greenhouse gases are endangering the public welfare, the EPA must regulate them.

Administration and auto industry lawyers say the high court should dismiss the states' lawsuit. They argue that the nation's global warming policy is a political issue to be decided by Congress and the president, not a legal issue to be decided in court.

This argument may well appeal to Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who has said the court should adopt a more modest role and allow politicians to set policies.

But environmental activists and the state lawyers were pleasantly surprised in June when the Supreme Court voted to take up the case, Massachusetts vs. EPA, despite the objections of the Bush administration.

If the court rules squarely on the question of whether the Clean Air Act regulates greenhouse gases, the stakes will be high for environmentalists, California's regulators and the auto industry.

DOJ_NMG_0098455

"If we win, it will free California and other states from a legal threat," said Bookbinder, the Sierra Club lawyer. "But if the Supreme Court says the Clean Air Act does not cover climate change, it would be hard for California to say it has the authority to regulate greenhouse gases."

If the court rejects the Bush administration's stand, the automakers will be under pressure to produce vehicles that get better gas mileage.

The court could also issue a split decision.

It could rule that carbon dioxide is an air pollutant under the Clean Air Act, but that the EPA's administrator is free to decide whether to issue new emissions standards for it. In the past, the court has been very reluctant to require an agency to issue new regulations.

A split decision would not force the federal agency to regulate greenhouse gases, but it could clear the way for California and the states to do so on their own.

Besides Massachusetts and California, the states challenging the Bush administration's policy are Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

They were joined by the cities of New York, Washington and Baltimore, and several environmental groups.

Energy Firms Come To Terms With Climate Change (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Juliet Eilperin

While the political debate over global warming continues, top executives at many of the nation's largest energy companies have accepted the scientific consensus about climate change and see federal regulation to cut greenhouse gas emissions as inevitable.

The Democratic takeover of Congress makes it more likely that the federal government will attempt to regulate emissions. The companies have been hiring new lobbyists who they hope can help fashion a national approach that would avert a patchwork of state plans now in the works. They are also working to change some company practices in anticipation of the regulation.

"We have to deal with greenhouse gases," John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil Co., said in a recent speech at the National Press Club. "From Shell's point of view, the debate is over. When 98 percent of scientists agree, who is Shell to say, 'Let's debate the science'?"

Hofmeister and other top energy company leaders, such as Duke Energy Corp.'s chief executive, James E. Rogers, back a proposal that would cap greenhouse gas emissions and allow firms to trade their quotas.

Paul M. Anderson, Duke Energy's chairman and a member of the president's Council of Advisors on Science and Technology, favors a tax on emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent greenhouse gas. His firm is the nation's third-largest burner of coal.

Exxon Mobil Corp., the highest-profile corporate skeptic about global warming, said in September that it was considering ending its funding of a think tank that has sought to cast doubts on climate change. And on Nov. 2, the company announced that it will contribute more than $1.25 million to a European Union study on how to store carbon dioxide in natural gas fields in the Norwegian North Sea, Algeria and Germany.

These changes come as Democratic leaders prepare to take over key committees on Capitol Hill. Sen. Barbara Boxer (Calif.), who calls global warming "the greatest challenge of our generation," will take the place of Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) as chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. Inhofe refers to global warming as a "hoax."

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), the incoming Energy and Natural Resources Committee chairman, said he hopes to "do something on global warming." Even though the Bush administration's expected opposition might make the enactment of legislation unlikely in the next two years, many companies cannot put off decisions about what sort of power plants to build.

Duke Energy, for example, has not added significant power generation in two decades, and customer demand is rising 1 to 2 percent a year. The company has included a price for the carbon emitted in its cost estimates for a new coal-fired generating plant proposed for Indiana.

"If we had our druthers, we'd already have carbon legislation passed," said John L. Stowell, Duke Energy's vice president for environmental policy. "Our viewpoint is that it's going to happen. There's scientific evidence of climate change. We'd like to know what legislation will be put together so that, when we figure out how to increase our load, we know exactly what to expect."

One reason companies are turning to Congress is to avert the multiplicity of regulations being drafted by various state governments. The Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative, a group of seven Northeastern states, is moving ahead with a proposed system that would set a ceiling on greenhouse gas emissions, issue allowances to companies, and allow firms to trade those allowances to comply with regulations.

California is drawing up its program. Other states are also contemplating limits. Even the city of Boulder, Colo., has adopted its own plan -- a carbon tax based on electricity use.

"We cannot deal with 50 different policies," said Shell's Hofmeister. "We need a national approach to greenhouse gases."

Next week, the Supreme Court will hear arguments on whether the federal government is obligated to regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant; its decision could force the government to come up with guidelines.

Though many energy firms had already voiced support in recent months for federal regulations limiting greenhouse gas emissions, the coming changeover in Congress has intensified the discussions.

"There have been many more folks wanting to engage on the detailed architecture of climate-change legislation," said Jason S. Grumet, executive director of the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy. "The tenor, tone and the detail of discussions has changed in the last couple of months. Nobody's going to want to be the last company to come before the Congress and say, 'I've been opposing you for five years, but now can I have my piece?' "

Some businesses are making new hires based on the assumption that legislative activity on global warming will increase in the coming months. Truman Semans, director of markets and business strategy for the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, said at least half a dozen of the companies that belong to the center's Business Environmental Leadership Council have recently hired staff members focused on global warming.

Not every energy company is planning to curb greenhouse gas emissions in the near future. TXU Corp. is planning to spend $10 billion to build 11 new coal-fired power plants, which would more than double the company's carbon dioxide emissions, from 55 million tons to 133 million tons a year. That increase in emissions is more than the total carbon dioxide pollution emitted in all of Maryland or by 10 million Cadillac Escalade sport-utility vehicles.

In an e-mail to The Washington Post, TXU spokeswoman Kimberly Morgan said that the company supports "a comprehensive, voluntary, technology-based approach to global climate change based on carbon intensity" that is both "flexible and cost effective."

"We are at a point in time where other states and businesses are starting to take global warming seriously," said Colin Rowan, spokesman for the advocacy group Environmental Defense. "California is heading toward the future, and TXU and Texas are sprinting full speed back to the 1950s."

The company's approach may pay off in the short term, but it may not last. "Over the next two years I don't think environmental policy is going to change radically," said Carl Pope, executive director of the advocacy group Sierra Club. But he added, "I think the environmental agenda and conversation will change radically."

Corporate America wants to be part of that conversation. Duke Energy's Stowell said: "Industry is coming together and saying, 'Okay, if we're going to do this, let's do this in a way that won't wreck the economy.' "

Taming King Coal (NYT)

The front page of this newspaper's business section recently featured two articles about the world's most plentiful fuel, coal. Written from different parts of the globe, they framed the magnitude of the task confronting international negotiators and the newly empowered Democrats in Congress who want to put the brakes on emissions of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas.

One article pointed out that China will surpass the United States as the world's largest emitter of carbon dioxide by 2009, a decade ahead of previous predictions. A big reason is the explosion in the number of automobiles, but the main reason is

China's ravenous appetite for coal, the dirtiest of all the fuels used to produce electricity. Already, China uses more coal than the United States, the European Union and Japan combined. Every week to 10 days, another coal-fired power plant opens somewhere in China, with enough capacity to serve all the households in Dallas or San Diego.

What's frightening about this for those worried about the long-term consequences of warming is that nearly all of these plants are being built along traditional lines, burning pulverized coal to make electricity. And what's sad about it is that there's a much cleaner coal-burning technology available. Known as I.G.C.C. — for integrated gasification combined cycle — this cleaner technology coverts coal into a gas before it is burned.

These plants produce fewer of the pollutants that cause smog and acid rain than conventional power plants do. More important, from a global warming perspective, they also have the potential to capture and sequester greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide before they enter the atmosphere.

This new technology is not readily available in China, but it is available to utilities in the United States. Which brings us to the second article — an announcement by TXU, a giant Texas energy company, that it intends to build 11 new coal-fired power plants in Texas, plus another dozen or so coal-fired monsters elsewhere in the country. All told, this would be the nation's largest single coal-oriented construction campaign in years.

Is TXU availing itself of the cleaner technology? No. TXU will use the old pulverized coal model. The company says the older models are more reliable. But the real reason it likes the older models is that they are easier to build, cheaper to run and, ultimately, much more profitable. So, like the Chinese, TXU is locking itself (and the country) into at least 50 more years of the most carbon-intensive technology around.

Barbara Boxer, the California Democrat who will shortly assume command of the Senate environment committee, believes that we should impose a price on carbon emissions (as Europe has done) so that companies like TXU will begin to think about investing in cleaner technologies — technologies that China could then use in its power plants. The message from both Texas and China is that Ms. Boxer should get cracking.

Justice Department Files Motion For Alcoa (ELGC)

Elgin (TX) Courier, November 25, 2006

The Justice Department on the EPA's behalf, filed a motion in US District Court in Austin seeking to resolve issues related to a Consent Decree entered into by Alcoa, the U. S. Government and Citizens groups in 2003, concerning alleged violations in the operation of Alcoa's generating units, reported Jim Hodson, Public Affairs and Environmental Manager of Alcoa.

TXU is proposing to build a new, 630 megawatt (MW) power plant -- Sandow 5. A ruling is expected within a few weeks which if approved will add TXU to the Consent Decree and keep the project moving forward.

The court is being asked to approve a stipulated order that includes:

--A payment of $859,000 to resolve Alcoa's anticipated failure to begin operation of Sandow 5 by the April 25, 2007 deadline.

--Alcoa's Sandow Units 1-3 would be shut down by December 31, 2006, roughly 4 months earlier than the original consent decree.

--A commitment by Alcoa and TXU to begin operation of Sandow 5 with full emission controls by August 31, 2009.

--A commitment by Alcoa and TXU to strive for a Sandow 5 emission rate for nitrogen oxides 20 percent lower than the rate currently provided for in the consent decree.

--TXU would be added as a party to the Consent Decree

--And a commitment by TXU to install selective catalytic reduction system to substantially reduce nitrogen oxide emissions from Sandow Unit 4.

Alcoa and TXU have agreed to the motion as filed.

The proposed new unit will be a clean coal technology, circulating fluidized bed boiler. This power plant will help insure affordable, reliable power to the TXU system and will help keep Alcoa's Rockdale operations fully operational. The new unit will be located at Alcoa's Rockdale plant.

Sandow 5 will cost about $900 million and would be built over a 3 to 4 year timeframe. The total economic impact of the plant would exceed hundreds of millions over the life of the project through payrolls, property taxes and value of required local products and services. The proposed plant would employ more than 1,000 workers during construction, as well as permanent operating jobs, and will produce enough energy to serve about 200,000 Texas homes.

The motion filed by the government is the outcome of prolonged negotiations but is a workable compromise and Alcoa and TXU are hopeful that the court will approve it. The project has been well supported by the local community.

This project is good for the environment because of the reductions in emissions, said Hodson. It is good for the local economy and taxing authorities because of the additional new assets, construction expenditures, and permanent operating and maintenance jobs.

Hodson continued, it is good for Alcoa because it helps keep the location operating at full capacity, providing high paying employment for more than 1,100 employees, maintaining taxing revenues for local entities and supporting hundreds of suppliers, contractors and consultants. It is good for TXU because it helps to resolve the state's energy reliability issues, Hodson added.

Groups Upset By Claim In Clean Air Suit (AP)

WASHINGTON - A prominent member of the Supreme Court bar, the small circle of lawyers who regularly appear before the justices, infuriated environmental groups by presenting an argument the groups say is demonstrably incorrect.

The claim a month ago by Washington attorney Carter Phillips that the federal government had changed course in regulating emissions from coal-fired power plants is simply not true and a paper trail of the industry's own documents proves it, the groups say.

The case, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy Corp., could determine the fate of an Environmental Protection Agency initiative targeting some of the biggest utilities in the nation. Phillips, representing Duke, is managing partner at the Washington office of the law firm Sidley Austin and has argued more than 50 cases at the Supreme Court.

"These companies are bent on getting away with 20 years of illegal pollution by trying to deceive the Supreme Court," said Natural Resources Defense Council clean air director John Walke, who is a former EPA attorney.

Utility industry attorney Scott Segal jumped to Phillips' defense, saying that "for these environmental groups to go after one of the best lawyers in the country is a travesty. Phillips leads a legal dream team with a spotless record." Segal, a partner at the law firm Bracewell & Giuliani, was responding to a list of questions a reporter sent to Phillips' office at Sidley Austin. With the case pending before the Supreme Court, Phillips did not respond.

The government enforcement action against Duke is one of more than a dozen brought by the Clinton administration in 1999 and 2000.

It is aimed at forcing power companies to install the latest pollution-control equipment on aging coal-fired plants which were renovated so they could be operated longer hours.

On Nov. 1, Phillips told the justices: "Our basic argument is that all along" EPA interpreted the regulatory requirements "in a certain way. And then 19 years later, they reversed course" and suddenly sued the companies.

The environmental groups say internal industry documents clearly show that Duke understood long ago that EPA was interpreting the requirements in the same way it did in 1999 when the government went to court. Some of the documents are part of the record before the Supreme Court and all were brought to light in lawsuits against Duke and other utilities.

Among the documents, according to a Justice Department court filing, are 10 memos from an industry trade association spelling out the EPA's position for Duke starting in the late 1980s. It was the same regulatory approach EPA took a decade later when it sued the company. The Justice Department document was filed publicly in 2003, but at Duke's request it was put under seal, barred from public view.

The day after the Supreme Court argument, the Natural Resources Defense Council provided journalists with copies of industry documents the environmental groups say contradict the tack taken by Duke's lawyer before the high court.

One of them is a Duke company training guide on environmental compliance from 1991 that appears to characterize the EPA's approach in the same way the federal agency did nine years later when it sued Duke.

George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley reviewed some of the industry files and said, "I find the statements Phillips made hard to square with these documents."

Turley said the complexity of the case makes it easy to suggest uncertainty or confusion, and that "Phillips' comments in court are more likely to be treated as attorneys gilding the lily for their client" rather than attempting to mislead.

The dispute between the utilities and the environmental groups and Justice Department lawyers is whether emissions increases should be measured on an annual basis or under a two-part test.

The industry says EPA regulations always have required an hourly rate increase in emissions before measuring for annual increases. Such an approach would enable the companies to run their revamped coal-fired plants without having to install additional pollution controls, as long as the hourly emissions rate doesn't rise. Pollution would rise significantly, however, because of the longer hours of operation. In his arguments to the justices, Phillips pointed to two EPA officials who in the early 1980s appeared to interpret the rules in the way industry favors.

The EPA and environmental groups say the regulations call for calculating emissions increases annually, which would force the installation of costly pollution controls on plants because of their longer hours of operation. One document environmentalists point to is a 1988 memo by an attorney representing Duke in the Supreme Court case. The document specifies an annual test "instead of" an hourly test.

But Segal, representing the industry, says focusing on that language in the 42-page document "mischaracterizes the memo." The company documents "all assume that you've already cleared the first hurdle of an hourly rate increase, so it's not surprising that the documents sometimes refer to an annual test."

"That's ridiculous," responded Keri Powell, a staff attorney with the not-for-profit environmental law firm Earthjustice.

It was "depressing to listen to Duke's attorney present a sob story to the Supreme Court about how the power companies had no idea that EPA would interpret its rules the way it did in 1999, when the power companies' own documents from years before so clearly show otherwise," Powell said.

Duke spokesman Thomas Williams said the environmentalists' criticism is "an after-the-fact, made-for-litigation theory that was correctly rejected by the lower courts."

Jolley Found Guilty On Multiple Drug And Weapons (CASPT)

By Tom Morton, Star-Tribune staff writer

Casper (WY) Tribune, November 23, 2006

A Casper man who led police on a door-to-door search in a Sunrise subdivision in January was found guilty on multiple drug and weapons charges in federal court in Cheyenne on Wednesday.

Armour Lyle Jolley, 32, faces at least 135 years and not more than 180 years of federal imprisonment, according to the second of two indictments filed this year.

He also could be punished with a fine up to $9,250,000, according to the second indictment.

The eight-day, 12-member jury trial began on Nov. 13 before U.S. District Court Judge Clarence Brimmer.

On the first day of the trial, Jolley pleaded guilty to the indictment filed Jan. 24 with the single count of being a felon in possession of a firearm, Justice Department spokesman John Powell said.

The conviction on Wednesday was on all 14 counts of the second indictment filed on July 19:

-- One count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and to distribute, methamphetamine.

-- Three counts of distribution of methamphetamine.

-- One count of possession with intent to distribute methamphetamine.

-- Two counts of being a felon in possession of a firearm.

-- One count of being an unlawful user of a controlled substance in possession of a firearm.

-- Three counts of possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking offense.

-- Two counts of use of a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking offense.

-- One count of carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking offense.

The July 19 indictment outlines his drug and weapons violations starting in April 2005.

Two of those counts were related to a time between July and August 2005 when Jolley discharged a firearm at a person's residence to intimidate him into paying a drug debt; and another time when he drove a person to an area near the Casper Events Center and discharged a firearm to intimidate that person to pay a drug debt.

Powell said the court has ordered a presentence investigation for Jolley -- a process that could take up to 60 days -- and then it will set a sentencing date.

Neither prosecutor Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Phillips nor Jolley's defense attorney, Timothy Kingston, could be reached for comment.

In the Casper area, Jolley has had a long criminal history, including a felony when he pleaded in 2004 to a fourth charge of driving intoxicated.

On Jan. 6, 2006, Casper and Mills police officers attempted to arrest Jolley on a warrant after he failed to appear in court, according to court records.

He fled police and a massive manhunt ensued with armed members of the Special Response Team conducting a door-to-door search of a Sunrise subdivision. Police canine units and the Wyoming Medical Center's LifeFlight helicopter assisted in the search, which ended when police spotted Jolley riding in a passenger car.

Jolley was carrying a semi-automatic handgun in an ankle holster when he was arrested.

In August, Jolley attempted to escape the Platte County Jail, where he was being held on the federal charges, according to Platte County Attorney Eric Alden.

Jolley is the son of the late John Jolley, who unsuccessfully ran on the Democratic ballot against Republican Rep. Carolyn Paseneaux for House District 36 in 2000.

IMMIGRATION:

Civil Jury Fines Rancher In Illegal-alien Dispute (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

An Arizona rancher who has waged a five-year campaign to stop a flood of illegal aliens from crossing his property has been ordered by a civil jury to pay nearly $100,000 for a 2004 incident during which he confronted a family hunting on his land.

Roger Barnett, 62, who began rounding up illegal aliens after he said they destroyed his property, killed calves and broke into his home, was ordered to pay Ronald Morales, his father, his two young daughters and their friend on claims of negligence, false imprisonment and emotional distress.

The jury found in favor of all five plaintiffs, but split responsibility between Mr. Barnett, Mr. Morales and his father, Arturo Morales.

The Morales family had sought $210,000 damages in a lawsuit sponsored by two civil rights groups, the Border Action Network and the Southern Poverty Law Center, which accused Mr. Barnett of vigilantism and abusing the illegal aliens he detained. The jury settled on a damage award of $98,000.

"This is an historic moment," said Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network. "This victory is just the beginning. We can guarantee that every official who tried to sweep this case and issue under the rug and who still has the capacity of bringing criminal charges will hear from us."

Two other lawsuits brought against Mr. Barnett with the assistance of the Border Action Network were dismissed. A lawsuit filed by the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund is pending, naming Mr. Barnett, his wife and brother, and Cochise County Sheriff Larry Dever, in a conspiracy to violate the rights of illegal aliens.

During the Morales trial, Mr. Barnett denied threatening the party, testifying that he only took out his AR-15 rifle because the adults in the group were carrying rifles. He also denied accusations by Ronald Morales that he had insulted them with racial slurs and threatened to shoot them.

Mr. Barnett's brother, Donald, said in a statement: "In the Morales family, the father taught the son to trespass, and now the father's teaching the daughters how to trespass in blatant disregard for the law. I guess in this country, private property and a person's rights don't mean much any more."

Donald Barnett had been named in the lawsuit, but later was dropped as a defendant.

Mr. Barnett's Cross Rail Ranch near Douglas, Ariz., has become a major route for northbound illegal aliens. The ranch sits in what Cochise County law enforcement authorities have called "the avenue of choice" for illegal aliens.

"Thousands of aliens have crossed my property," Mr. Barnett told The Washington Times in a September 2002 interview at his ranch. "There are so many that I can tell you that at times it looks like a slow-motion invasion."

Mr. Barnett said some of his cattle have died from ingesting plastic bottles left behind by the aliens and that some of the ranch's trails were littered with trash nearly a foot deep.

A former Cochise County sheriff's deputy who later was successful in the towing and propane business, Mr. Barnett spent $30,000 on electronic sensors, hidden along established trails on his ranch. He searches the ranch for illegal aliens in a pickup truck, dressed in a green shirt and camouflage hat, with his handgun and rifle, high-powered binoculars and a walkie-talkie to communicate.

His actions have made him a target of alien and drug smugglers in Mexico. Law-enforcement authorities told him the smugglers had placed a bounty on his head.

"This is my land. I'm the victim here," Mr. Barnett said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Split On Ethics Enforcement (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Democrats are promising big changes in lobbying rules to combat congressional corruption. But they're divided over whether to create an outside investigative office to review ethics complaints or leave enforcement to members.

"This is an area where there is an opportunity to make the rhetoric of self-reform of Congress real by having the guts to set up an independent office," Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, a longtime Democrat who was re-elected as an independent, said in an interview this past week.

Opponents say such an office would encroach on Congress's responsibility to police itself and could create an unnecessary and expensive bureaucracy. Many senators have resisted changing oversight rules since most congressional scandals this year involved House members.

Fred Wertheimer, founder of Democracy 21, a nonpartisan group that advocates for ethics overhauls, says that without "effective ethics enforcement, you don't have effective ethics rules."

He says congressional ethics committees themselves have sometimes eroded hard-fought overhauls. In 1995, the House passed a rule limiting lobbyists' gifts to less than $50. Later, the ethics committee valued a seat in a skybox at a sporting event at $49.

After winning control of Congress in midterm elections shaped in part by scandals and corruption charges against Republicans, Democratic leaders are discussing new ethics rules. They include bans on gifts and meals from lobbyists and lobbying organizations, and more frequent reports by lobbyists disclosing for whom and what they are working. In disclosure reports, which lobbyists currently are required to file with Congress at least once a year, they also spell out how much they have been paid for their efforts.

Former members who become registered lobbyists would be prohibited from seeking help on legislation from their congressional colleagues for two years and denied access to the House and Senate floors. Today, lawmakers-turned-lobbyists can mingle with their former colleagues inside the chambers during debates and votes.

The proposed packages in both the House and Senate would curtail, if not ban, travel paid for by lobbyists and organizations that lobby. House leaders say they would prohibit lawmakers from using corporate planes for official travel. Both chambers are expected to require members to identify hometown projects they insert into spending bills.

House and Senate leaders are mulling creating an office to monitor lobbyists' disclosure reports, or enhancing the powers of existing offices to take on that job.

But so far, neither the House nor the Senate proposal would allow independent scrutiny of the actions of lawmakers themselves. The job of investigating and disciplining them would remain in the Senate and House ethics committees.

Those committees have proved vulnerable to partisan political influences. The House ethics committee was nearly shut down for several years, in part due to an ethics-complaint truce between the two parties in the late 1990s. Later, House Republican leaders clamped down after the committee issued rebukes against former Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

Mr. Lieberman co-sponsored a measure earlier this year with Maine Republican Sen. Susan Collins establishing an independent Office of Public Integrity that would vet Senate ethics complaints and conduct investigations of those it deemed serious. Under the proposal, the ethics committee would oversee the integrity office and could end a probe with a majority vote. The committee also would decide whether to impose penalties on a member.

It was defeated in a bipartisan landslide, 70-30. Among those opposing the office was incoming Democratic Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

In the interview, Mr. Lieberman said he is going to "make another run at it" and hopes that the strong anticorruption message from voters in the midterm elections "may have changed some minds."

Two advocates for ethics overhaul in the House -- Connecticut Republican Rep. Christopher Shays and Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Marty Meehan -- are considering reviving the same proposal in the House if incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, of California, doesn't include it in her ethics-overhaul agenda.

Ms. Pelosi earlier this year proposed enhancing the powers of Congress's inspector general's office to handle disclosure reports by lobbyists. But it didn't extend that office's jurisdiction to ethics allegations against members of Congress. Aides say she is now considering backing the idea of a stronger independent office.

In addition to enforcement, there is the question of how to treat privately funded travel for lawmakers. Both chambers are expected to ban trips paid for by lobbyists and lobbying organizations.

The tougher question is how to deal with groups that have both lobbying and advocacy missions -- with each part organized independently and registered under separate sections of the tax code. Broadly speaking, advocacy work involves shaping policy on issues; lobbying is seeking lawmakers' votes on legislation affecting a particular business interest.

Among groups that handle both lobbying and advocacy are the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Sierra Club and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Opponents of a total ban, including major business trade groups, argue that trips are important for educating members of Congress about issues.

Critics say anything short of a total ban would give lobbyists a loophole to exploit. They note that Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist convicted of trying to bribe lawmakers, used what appeared to be charitable organizations to funnel his clients' money to finance a golf trip to Scotland. That became a focus in the Department of Justice investigation of his activities.

"If it's important for a member of the Ways and Means Committee to go outside of his district to look at tax policy in Hawaii, that's fine. It should be paid for with official funds. If not, they should pay for travel like the rest of us," said Meredith McGehee, policy director for the Campaign Legal Center, a nonpartisan watchdog.

House Democrats plan debates and votes on critical planks in their ethics package -- including rules banning lobbyist-financed meals and gifts -- as soon as they take control in January.

Hoyer Hit On Lobbyists' Contributions (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0098463

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

House Democrats put lobbying reform near the top of their agenda, but their incoming majority leader was one of the biggest recipients of special-interest money.

A new report states that Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, was the "most dependent" on special-interest funding and received the fifth-highest total in lobbying contributions among members of Congress.

According to public financing records, Mr. Hoyer has received $609,836 from lobbyists, $2.46 million from out-of-state donors and $5.67 million in political action committee contributions since 2000.

"Much of the reason he's at the top of the list is because he's in leadership," said Craig Holman, legislative director of Public Citizen, a government watchdog organization that produced the report. "It does not necessarily mean he'll be reluctant to support lobbying reform."

Mr. Hoyer's congressional office was closed for Thanksgiving and was unavailable to comment. But in an interview last week with the liberal Web site Talking Points Memo, Mr. Hoyer was asked if he would support the Democrats' lobbying-reform agenda.

"One of the first things we're going to do is adopt lobbying reform," Mr. Hoyer said. "We are going to adopt rules that make the system of legislation transparent so that we don't legislate in the dark of night, and the public and other members can see what is being done."

Mr. Hoyer also said he would support further restrictions on lobbying and legislation aimed at curbing so-called "earmarks," which are expenditures anonymously attached to larger spending bills.

Some liberal organizations have criticized Mr. Hoyer for his votes on lobbying-related measures. He previously has voted against bills that would place Internet political communications under the same campaign-finance restrictions as regular television and radio ads.

In addition, Mr. Hoyer voted against a measure that would require 527 political organizations, which are currently able to raise unlimited amounts of money, from falling under the same regulations.

"Steny Hoyer realizes that Democrats are in power because Americans are upset with issues of corruption in Congress," Mr. Holman said. "We fully expect Hoyer to be an ally."

Public Citizen says it has been actively working with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's office to advocate lobbying-reform legislation. Although Mr. Holman says his organization has received a large degree of cooperation from the California Democrat's office, his group is not being granted all of its requests, which include a total ban on lobbyist campaign contributions.

Mrs. Pelosi had nominated Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, for the House majority leader position. Mr. Murtha lost that race.

Many analysts say Mr. Murtha's defeat was a result in part of his own troubles on ethics issues stemming from his involvement as a unindicted co-conspirator in the FBI's Abscam bribery investigation in the 1970s and '80s.

Pelosi's Ascendancy In House Puts A Close Liberal Ally In The Spotlight (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22 — In a friendship stretching over 30 years and many plane trips to Washington from their neighboring California districts, Representatives Nancy Pelosi and George Miller have become so close that, as colleagues say, they finish each others' sentences.

So it was not surprising that, when Mrs. Pelosi faced the first test of her role as speaker-elect of the House of Representatives, Mr. Miller was in the background, pushing her to back Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania to replace her as Democratic leader over the more centrist candidate, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who had been her No. 2 for four years.

In the week since Mr. Hoyer won the position, Democratic leaders have played down any disharmony created by the leadership struggle. But Mr. Miller's role raised fears that after carefully nudging her party to the center, which many say helped the Democrats retake the majority, Mrs. Pelosi would let her liberal allies have too much influence.

In the concerns of some Democrats — and the I-told-you-so's of some Republicans — Mr. Miller represents Mrs. Pelosi's true liberal soul, and his pushing for Mr. Murtha a sign that the far left would dominate and destabilize the Democrats, after they have emerged from 12 years in the minority.

There is no doubt that Mr. Miller remains one of Mrs. Pelosi's most trusted advisers. But those who know them both say that he, and his influence, have been wrongly judged.

Now one of the 10 most senior members of Congress, Mr. Miller has proven himself both a liberal lion — an early advocate of an increase in the minimum wage and a champion of the environment — and savvy about working both sides of the aisle. An agitator for higher teacher standards, he was one of the chief negotiators with President Bush on the No Child Left Behind legislation. (Mr. Bush nicknamed Mr. Miller, a burly and now white-haired former high school football player, Big George.)

After Hurricane Katrina, he enlisted Republicans to reverse Mr. Bush's order that allowed federal contractors working to rebuild the Gulf Coast to pay workers less than the prevailing local wage.

"He is liberal, and that pragmatism is always difficult to achieve when you're passionate about something," said Representative Ellen O. Tauscher, Democrat of California and a leader of the party's more moderate wing in the House.

But, Ms. Tauscher said, Mr. Miller understands what she calls the "very difficult kabuki dance" facing Democrats.

Party members have gritted their teeth for 12 years, she said. And now, "on a napkin, on the back of an envelope, in their BlackBerry, they've got lists of what they want to do, and they think their priorities are everybody's priorities."

"But in the end, this is about securing a majority for more than two years," she said. "I don't expect him to be thrilled about it. But I think he's sanguine; he's pragmatic and realistic."

Mrs. Pelosi, 66, and Mr. Miller, 61, share similar pedigrees. Her father was a Baltimore mayor and congressman; his father served 25 years in the California legislature. When the elder Mr. Miller died in his 50s, his son ran for his seat and lost.

Five years later, after law school, Mr. Miller ran for Congress from a largely working-class district east of San Francisco and won. He arrived in 1975 as one of the Watergate babies, the idealistic Democrats elected on a reform platform.

Mrs. Pelosi, meanwhile, rose through California politics and became chairwoman of the state Democratic Party. She would later take the Congressional seat that had been held by Phillip Burton, who was Mr. Miller's mentor.

Mr. Burton advised Mr. Miller to pick a committee and stay on it; this, he said, was how Southern Democrats had amassed power. Mr. Miller listened, staying on the House Interior and Education committees, becoming chairman of Interior (now named House Resources) in 1991. (Mrs. Pelosi congratulated him with a gift of Mr. Burton's chair and a small model of a Burton statue that had been placed in San Francisco.) He has been the senior Democrat on the education committee since 2001 and is expected to become its chairman in January.

He is also known more informally as the dean of the town house on Capitol Hill that has served as a kind of fraternity house for a succession of Democrats. Mr. Miller lived there with his family before they moved back to California; his roommates now are Senators Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Charles E. Schumer of New York, the second- and third-ranking Democrats, and Representative Bill Delahunt of Massachusetts. In long-running Tuesday dinners with a group that included Mrs. Pelosi and other now-senior Democrats, it was Mr. Miller, other members say, who was the first to declare that Mrs. Pelosi would become the nation's first female speaker.

Mrs. Pelosi calls him "a valued friend and tremendously talented legislator."

As chairman of the Democrats' steering and policy committee, he helped shape the platform the Democrats ran on in the midterm elections — including raising the minimum wage, cutting interest rates on student loans and expanding stem cell research.

"He has guided Democrats' policy agenda that unified the caucus and spoke to the dreams and aspirations of the American people," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Some who know both lawmakers say that Mr. Miller's counsel continues to be important to her. "Not only can George give her good advice, but he can also tell her things she doesn't want to hear," Ms. Tauscher said. "Sometimes you can only take tough news from somebody that is very close to you."

But others say that if the relationship was once defined as one of complete trust, it is now more like trust, but verify.

Mr. Miller says his influence over Mrs. Pelosi has always been overstated, showing a misunderstanding of her talent and strength. He calls her "the toughest person you've met in politics."

He backed Mr. Murtha, he said, because he was impressed by his turnaround on the war in Iraq.

"To watch this man take his knowledge, his career, his experience in the military and to see him start to understand the damage that was being done to the soldiers and the institution, was really quite remarkable," Mr. Miller said.

"When he decided to go public, which is not generally his character," Mr. Miller said of Mr. Murtha, "he immediately changed the national debate. And then when you saw the role the debate on the war took during the campaign, I think there is a serious debt of gratitude. You were saying back to the voters, 'We heard you.' "

But the other message from voters, he said, is that they want Congress to work in a bipartisan manner, after years of Republican rule.

"There was a conscious decision by Tom DeLay and Dennis Hastert to turn the House into a winner-take-all," he said, where no legislation would be brought for a vote without most of the majority supporting it.

Having seen that, he said, he understands the role Mrs. Pelosi must assume.

"The speaker made a horrible miscalculation that he was the speaker of the Republican Party as opposed to the difference Nancy has drawn, that Tip O'Neill drew — that you are the leader of the Democrats, and speaker of the House," he said. "That simple understanding can allow a lot of things to happen that provide opportunities for the minority to participate."

The Struggle Within (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

Can the Democratic Party become fully competitive? Is American liberalism dead, the 2006 election a last twitch of life before rigor mortis sets in? The answer to both questions is yes. (More on this next week.)

For the Democratic Party to revive, major tenets of American liberalism, economic and sociocultural, will have to be discarded. The party can join Studebaker and the Glass Bottle Blowers union, it can trudge along as No. 2, or it can undergo a painful transformation — without guarantee of success.

To stay in the fight, Democratic leaders will have to acknowledge political realities affirmed by the electorate in 1994 and 2006. Many Democratic constituencies — organized labor, minority advocacy organizations, reproductive- and sexual-rights proponents — are reliving battles of a decade or more ago, not the more subtle disputes of today. Public sector unions, for example, at a time of wide distrust of government, are consistently pressing to enlarge the state. For these players, adapting to a re-emergent center will be costly.

Democrats won on Nov. 7 by carrying a 59 percent majority of independent, moderate voters angered by the Iraq war and Republican corruption. These voters demonstrated 12 years ago that they can easily turn against Democrats.

An example of the reality that Democrats refused to face the last time they had a shot at consolidating power materialized during the fight to pass Clinton's 1994 Omnibus Crime Bill, legislation that sought to burnish the party's justice credentials by increasing the number of felonies subject to the death penalty. Instead, amendments added to win support from the left — most visibly, $40 million for midnight basketball leagues — caught fire on conservative talk radio, spread to the establishment media, and soon became a liability.

When Democrats bend to the will of liberal interest groups, even in pursuit of laudable goals, the damage to the party's credibility can be devastating. President Clinton succumbed to such pressure, and Democrats in the House and Senate paid the price. Democrats now have a chance to regain public trust, but even a minor miscalculation can push the party off the tightrope. Its House majority is tenuous: 17 of the new Democrats represent districts that voted for Bush in 2004 by at least 54 percent, according to the political scientist Gary Jacobson.

The public will desert Democrats placing a disputed cultural or spending agenda above the broader public interest. This is especially true at a time of extreme uncertainty: lethal struggle in the Mideast, nuclear proliferation, mounting skepticism toward free trade, and a rising non-marital birthrate — now at 37 percent — that concerns moderate voters.

The potential for an incendiary controversy to engulf the Democratic left has sharply escalated with Web access to each committee and floor vote under new Congressional transparency rules, and the development of aggressively partisan outlets in the blogosphere. An army of conservative media is determined to recreate the political climate so advantageous to the G.O.P. in 1994. At the same time, very liberal senior House Democrats now have vastly enhanced power to add inflammatory provisions to bills moving through their committees (think Rangel and the draft).

Nancy Pelosi and her closest advisers in the House are more likely to support such radioactive amendments than to serve as guard dogs protecting a slender Democratic majority. The first test of Pelosi's ability to distinguish between broad-based and special interests will be when she decides whether to appoint Alcee Hastings, the once-impeached federal judge, to head the House Intelligence Committee.

Only two members of the House leadership are intuitively attuned to such problems: Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic caucus, and Steny Hoyer, the majority leader. But Emanuel has limited influence, and relations between Pelosi and Hoyer are distant at best.

Still, the vigilance of Hoyer and Emanuel will be crucial to a party whose renewal could easily be stillborn. Congressional leaders are not all-powerful, but they can set the stage for a successful presidential candidate, or lay waste to the center-left, dooming the nominee.

The Democratic Party can secure its 2006 gains, but to do so will require abandoning a decades-long willingness to indulge pressure groups on the left that no longer command broad popular allegiance.

Texas Universities Battle Each Other To Nab Bush Library (WSJ)

By Steve Levine

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

DALLAS -- The biggest college rivalry in Texas these days isn't only over football. It is the battle to score President Bush's presidential library.

Southern Methodist University, the University of Dallas and Baylor University are the three finalists to house Mr. Bush's presidential library. In efforts to snag the prize, they have bought up hundreds of acres of land, awarded honorary degrees to Bush family members, and even named a highway after the president. A decision by the George W. Bush Presidential Library Site Selection Committee is expected in December or January.

SMU -- which sits in an affluent enclave a few miles north of downtown Dallas -- is the betting favorite. It is Laura Bush's alma mater, she serves on its board of trustees, and the Bushes' church, United Methodist Church, is next to the college. But the University of Dallas and Baylor have fought back with lavish proposals that pay homage to themes of the Bush presidency.

"This is a high-stakes game, and everyone understands that," said Tommye Lou Davis, who is overseeing Baylor's library initiative.

There currently are 11 official presidential libraries. Though some are more popular than others, they hold the potential to bring hundreds of millions of dollars in local tourism and development. Little Rock, Ark., officials, for example, say the two-year-old Clinton Presidential Library has thus far attracted some $1 billion in fresh downtown construction and roughly 800,000 visitors.

Mr. Bush has appointed some of his closest intimates to vet and shape his library. The effort is led by Donald L. Evans, Mr. Bush's friend and former commerce secretary, and also includes Karl Rove, his top political adviser, brother Marvin Bush and White House counsel Harriet Miers, the former Supreme Court candidate.

Mr. Evans has kept much of the process secret and asked the competing universities to do the same, officials of the schools say. But in a letter sent in summer 2005 to all candidates, Mr. Evans and Marvin Bush said the library would seek to adopt the president's signature themes of "compassionate conservatism, the spread of freedom and democracy throughout the world, and defeating terrorism."

The library, along with a public policy center that Mr. Bush wants to include, will cost more than $200 million -- funds raised from private contributors. That is at least 20% more than the $165 million, 28-acre Clinton Library, which opened in 2004.

In 2001, Mr. Bush signed an executive order that can significantly restrict scholars' access to all presidents' papers, and some Democratic critics have made hay over the library effort. "Whoever designs his library, don't make the parking lot too big," wrote humorist Garrison Keillor in his latest book, "Homegrown Democrat."

Laura Bush has helped fuel SMU's front-runner status by saying that the couple will have a post-presidential home in Dallas, and telling the Houston Chronicle that the university is her sentimental favorite. SMU has granted an honorary doctorate to former President Bush.

SMU is among Texas' most prestigious colleges. It is also in the middle of a densely built neighborhood. Though SMU is tight-lipped about its library plans, it has been acquiring land that is widely believed to be for the library site. Dallas oil man Ray Hunt, a big Bush contributor, recently gave the school $35 million that allowed it to buy a shopping center that might be part of the presidential library site.

The school, whose officials have declined to comment on any specific plans, ran into a snag when one property owner refused to sell his four condos to the university. Gary Vodicka, an SMU graduate, has filed suit in Dallas federal court claiming that SMU's $450,000 offer for his units is inadequate. They sit on a 12.5-acre area near SMU that is presumed to be one of the sites proposed by the school to the Bush committee.

SMU's land issues have left an opening for the lesser-known University of Dallas, which is pushing its own, 300-acre site with a view of downtown Dallas. Plans are already drafted for a "Bush Presidential Library and School of Democracy" and a "Liberty Mall."

Situated in the suburb of Irving, on Dallas's western side, the Catholic school was able to recruit longtime Bush supporter Nancy Cain Marcus as a key advocate. In 2001, Mr. Bush gave Mrs. Marcus the plum appointment as an alternate representative to the United Nations. Last September, she accompanied the University of Dallas's president to Washington to present the school's proposal at the Mayflower Hotel.

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller is trying to find a compromise that will satisfy all her constituents. She advocates locating the library at the University of Dallas, but affiliating it with both Dallas-area schools. "The proposed SMU site is cramped, and the campus, though pretty, is already a traffic nightmare, even without a heavily visited presidential library in its midst," Ms. Miller says.

Though details of such a plan are still vague, the University of Dallas would seriously explore the Miller idea, says university President Frank Lazarus. Brad Cheves, SMU's vice president for development, says the school hasn't considered the plan.

Then there is Baylor. The Baptist institution is situated in the city of Waco, about two hours south of Dallas. A century ago it was more important financially than Dallas because of its cotton-industry and railroad connections. But the central Texas city of 120,000 people often seems to be answering for long-ago calamities.

In June, the city council condemned a series of lynchings in the city and the area in the 19th- and 20th-centuries. Waco's shuttered-up downtown has yet to recover from a 1953 tornado. And some outsiders still call the city "Wacko" because of the 1993 deaths of 76 people in a standoff just outside town between FBI agents and members of the Branch Davidian religious sect.

The local thinking is that Waco could shed those ugly images should Baylor win. "This is a community of historically low self-esteem....There is a sense that this is something Waco could win," says Carlos Sanchez, editor of the Waco Tribune-Herald, which has been beating the drum for the library.

Former Baylor President Robert Sloan started lobbying for the library even before Mr. Bush announced his presidential candidacy in 1998. The entire city establishment since has joined the cause. Baylor has presented honorary doctorates to Mr. Bush and his mother, Barbara Bush. In 1998, the school gave a high university decoration called the alumna honoris causa to Laura Bush. "At a cynical level, that can come off negatively," says Mr. Sloan. "But you want people to see the university."

Mr. Sloan, meanwhile, got Baylor graduate Drayton McLain Jr. -- owner of the Houston Astros baseball team and a close friend of Mr. Bush -- to chair the effort. The city and business community of Waco got behind it, too. Waco renamed a local strip of U.S. 84 Interstate the "George W. Bush Thoroughfare." And a local businessman, Clifton Robinson, offered up a low-interest $6 million loan toward a riverfront four-star hotel for visitors.

Even Bernard Rapoport, the city's leading Democratic Party activist, is excited at the prospect of the library. He says it could "raise the level of thinking of our community by bringing in notables and speakers." Mr. Rapoport, who has a 4,000-volume library at home, says a presidential library is something that transcends partisan lines. "What a library does is tell you that there's no excuse for being ordinary."

Gates Pushed For Bombing Of Sandinistas (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

His 1984 memo called for 'hard measures' against Nicaragua.

WASHINGTON — Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to lead the Pentagon, advocated a bombing campaign against Nicaragua in 1984 in order to "bring down" the leftist government, according to a declassified memo released by a nonprofit research group.

The memo from Gates to his then-boss, CIA Director William J. Casey, was among a selection of declassified documents from the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal posted Friday on the website of the National Security Archive, http://www.gwu.edu/nsarchiv/ .

In the memo, Gates, who was deputy director of the CIA, argued that the Soviet Union was turning Nicaragua into an armed camp and that the country could become a second Cuba. The rise of the communist-leaning Sandinista government threatened the stability of Central America, Gates asserted.

Gates' memo echoed the view of many foreign policy hard-liners at the time; however, the feared communist takeover of the region never materialized.

"It seems to me," Gates wrote, "that the only way that we can prevent disaster in Central America is to acknowledge openly what some have argued privately: that the existence of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Nicaragua closely allied with the Soviet Union and Cuba is unacceptable to the United States and that the United States will do everything in its power short of invasion to put that regime out."

Gates predicted that without U.S. funding, the Nicaraguan anti-communist forces known as Contras would collapse within one or two years. But he said that providing "new funding" for the Contras was not good enough. Instead, he advocated that the United States withdraw diplomatic recognition of the Sandinista government, provide overt assistance to a government in exile, impose economic sanctions or a quarantine, and use airstrikes to destroy Nicaragua's "military buildup."

"It sounds like Donald Rumsfeld," said National Security Archive Director Thomas S. Blanton. "It shows the same kind of arrogance and hubris that got us into Iraq."

In the memo, Gates noted he was advocating "hard measures" that "probably are politically unacceptable."

Indeed, Blanton said, Gates' advocacy of military strikes against Nicaragua was extreme.

"It sure wasn't a mainstream opinion; most Americans thought we shouldn't be doing anything in Nicaragua," Blanton said. "How possibly was our national security interest at stake?"

Reached late Friday, Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said he was not familiar with the memo. Stanzel said Gates would not be available for comment because it was standard practice for nominees to reject interview requests before Senate confirmation hearings.

Blanton said it would be wrong to look at a 22-year-old memo as evidence of Gates' current thinking. Gates seems to have changed after his nomination for CIA director was withdrawn in 1987, Blanton said. When Gates became CIA director in 1991, he was chastened and his earlier "arrogance" diminished.

"People change," Blanton said. "And very possibly the Robert Gates nominated for secretary of Defense is the Robert Gates who is the best CIA director we ever had, and not the Robert Gates who was a 'mini-me' Rumsfeld."

The memo offers some insights into how Gates viewed historical lessons, at least in 1984.

Gates wrote that the United States wrongly thought in the late 1950s that it could encourage Castro to form a pluralistic government. And he said that in Vietnam the United States took a series of half measures that "enabled the enemy to adjust to each new turn of the screw" by the war's end, he said, the country was able to tolerate severe bombing campaigns.

"Half measures, halfheartedly applied, will have the same result in Nicaragua," Gates wrote.

It was probably the election of Daniel Ortega to the Nicaraguan presidency in November 1984 that prompted Gates to write his memo of Dec. 14, 1984.

Ortega was elected again to the presidency this year, although he now presents himself as a moderate.

In the memo, Gates concluded that the Contra rebels alone would not be able to overthrow the Sandinista regime, even with U.S. money.

It was the Reagan administration's attempts to find ways to provide funding for the Nicaraguan rebels even after Congress forbade such support that led to the Iran-Contra scandal, a plan to use the proceeds of arms sales to Iran to fund the Contras.

The Iran-Contra affair erupted in the public spotlight 20 years ago. Gates' role in the scandal was investigated by Independent Counsel Lawrence E. Walsh and was the focus of confirmation hearings for Gates' 1987 nomination for CIA director.

Gates denied any wrongdoing in the scandal. Most of the debate over Gates' role centers on what he knew about the plan.

According to documents released by the National Security Archive and others, Gates seems to have known about Oliver North's attempts to raise money for the Contras, but opposed the idea and tried to keep the CIA out of it.

Critics have said Gates failed to make inquiries about the scandal that could have stopped the scheme from going forward.

Walsh concluded that Gates was "less than candid" but did not bring charges against him.

Gates' suggestions for Nicaragua policy were never adopted by the Reagan administration. And, on the whole, Gates' predictions in the 1984 memo didn't pan out.

Nicaragua did not become a communist dictatorship. The Sandinista regime did not lead to the fall of U.S.-backed governments in El Salvador, Honduras or Guatemala. Ortega and the Sandinistas were voted out of office in 1990. A year later the Soviet Union ceased to exist.

International Herald Tribune/AP, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON: In 1984, Robert Gates, then the No. 2 CIA official, advocated U.S. airstrikes against Nicaragua's pro-Cuban government to reverse what he described as an ineffective U.S. strategy to deal with communist advances in Central America, previously classified documents say.

Gates, President George W. Bush's nominee to be defense secretary, said the United States could no longer justify what he described as "halfhearted" attempts to contain Nicaragua's Sandinista government, according to documents released Friday by the National Security Archive, a private research group. .

In a memo to CIA Director William Casey dated Dec. 14, 1984, Gates said his proposed airstrikes would be designed "to destroy a considerable portion of Nicaragua's military buildup" and be focused on tanks and helicopters.

He also recommended that the United States prevent delivery to the Sandinistas of such weapons in the future. The administration, he said, should make clear that a U.S. invasion of the country was not contemplated.

Ironically, Gates' nomination to succeed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was announced just days after Ortega capped off a surprise political comeback by winning election as Nicaraguan president after three previous bids were rejected by the voters.

Ortega has recast himself as a moderate, assuring Nicaraguans that his Marxist-Leninist days are over.

Gates saw a calamitous situation in Central America in December 1984. Congress had ordered a halt to U.S. support for the Contra rebels, leaving Ortega free, as Gates saw it, to establish Nicaragua as a "permanent and well-armed" ally of the Soviet Union and Cuba.

He said the United States should acknowledge that the existence of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Nicaragua closely allied to Moscow and Havana "is unacceptable to the United States and that the United States will do everything its power short of invasion to put that regime out."

DOJ_NMG_0098470

In addition to airstrikes, he recommended withdrawal of U.S. recognition of the Nicaraguan government and recognition of a Nicaraguan government exile that would be entitled to U.S. military support.

Economic sanctions should be considered, "perhaps even including a quarantine," Gates wrote.

His proposals were never adopted but the administration attempted to circumvent the Contra aid ban by secretly funneling money to the rebels that had been obtained through arms sales to Iran. Democrat says they will question Gates during his Senate confirmation about his knowledge of the Iran-Contra scandal, which erupted two years after he sent his memo to Casey.

Gates' grim prediction in the memo of disaster in Central America did not come to pass. Congress renewed aid to the Contras in 1986. In February 1990, Nicaraguans dealt a blow to the Soviet Union and Cuba by voting Ortega out of office. And within two years, the Soviet Union had disappeared.

On Iran-Contra's 20th Anniversary, Private Group Releases Documents About Gates' Role (SDUT/AP)

By Pete Yost,

The San Diego Union-Tribune/AP, November 25, 2006

The Iran-Contra affair exploded 20 years ago Saturday, a scandal that crippled the last two years of Ronald Reagan's presidency and temporarily damaged the career prospects of Robert Gates, President Bush's nominee to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Gates advocated air strikes against Nicaragua in '84, documents say

On Nov. 25, 1986, Attorney General Edwin Meese announced the diversion of millions of dollars in proceeds from the Reagan administration's secret arms sales to Iran to Central America, where the money was used to help bankroll a war secretly run out of the White House. At the time, Congress had cut off military aid to the rebel force known as the Contras fighting the communist government of Nicaragua.

The National Security Archive, a private group, is posting on its Internet site some of the hundreds of thousands of government documents it has collected on the scandal, including some about Gates. His nomination to become CIA director was derailed in 1987, but Gates stayed on in government, survived the political bloodletting, was renominated by President George H.W. Bush four years later and confirmed by the Senate.

Now Senate Democrats are expected to gauge Gates' willingness to change the administration's war policies, but they probably won't stand in his way to becoming the next defense secretary.

Thirty-one Democrats voted against him in 1991, in part because some felt he had turned a blind eye to the diversion of funds to the Contras. Gates says he first heard information about the diversion nearly two months before it was disclosed to the public, and a CIA official said he first told Gates about it even earlier.

Iran-Contra Independent Counsel Lawrence Walsh investigated Gates but brought no criminal charges, concluding that Gates' statements to investigators “often seemed scripted and less than candid.”

One of the central figures in the Iran-Contra affair, retired Air Force Gen. Dick Secord, said Friday that critics “have beat this dead Iran-Contra horse far too much by trying to involve Gates, which is a laugh.”

Secord was recruited by CIA Director William Casey to run the secret resupply network to the rebels along with National Security Council aide Oliver North. He said Gates “was not a player and, since I was the chief of operations, I guess I would have known if he was a player.”

Vengeful Shi'ites Kill 25 (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, November 24, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Shi'ite militiamen yesterday doused six Sunni Arabs with kerosene and burned them alive as Iraqi soldiers stood by, amid attacks on mosques that left 19 other Sunnis dead.

The violence was seen as revenge for the slaughter of at least 215 Shi'ites in the Sadr City slum the day before.

DOJ_NMG_0098471

The mosque attacks took place after the Iraqi government, attempting to stop the nation's slide into civil war, imposed a sweeping curfew in the capital. Officials shut down the international airport and closed Iraq's main outlet to shipping lanes in the Persian Gulf.

Shi'ite militiamen of the Mahdi's Army, armed with machines guns and rocket-propelled grenades, swept through the Hurriyah neighborhood near an Iraqi army post. The militiamen burned four mosques and several homes, and attacked worshippers as they left services, police Capt. Jamil Hussein said.

Followers of radical anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr warned they would suspend their membership in parliament and the Cabinet if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki meets with President Bush in Jordan next week, a member of parliament said.

Legislator Qusai Abdul-Wahab, an al-Sadr follower, blamed U.S. forces for Thursday's bombings in Sadr City because they failed to provide security.

"We say occupation forces are fully responsible for these acts, and we call for the withdrawal of occupation forces or setting a timetable for their withdrawal," Mr. Abdul-Wahab said.

Mr. Bush, who was spending the Thanksgiving holiday at Camp David, said through a spokesman that he would stick to his plans for the summit.

Mahdi's Army gunmen loyal to Sheik al-Sadr had begun to take over the mixed neighborhood of Hurriyah during the summer and a majority of its Sunni residents had fled.

Three Sunni mosques elsewhere in Baghdad came under attack later in the day, and in Sadr City, a U.S. helicopter shot back at Shi'ite militiamen who opened fire on it from the ground, residents said. There were no immediate reports of casualties.

At least 87 persons were killed or found dead yesterday in sectarian violence across Iraq.

Capt. Hussein said at least 25 Sunnis were killed and 14 wounded in the mosque attacks in Hurriyah, despite a 24-hour curfew that the government imposed to try to prevent reprisal killings in the capital.

The Baghdad attacks appeared to have been a reaction to the deaths Thursday in Sadr City, when Sunnis unleashed bombs and mortars that killed at least 215 persons and wounded 257 in the deadliest single assault since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

The killings threatened to tip Iraq's widespread sectarian violence into full-scale civil war pitting majority Shi'ites against minority Sunnis.

In the northern city of Tal Afar, 23 persons were killed and 43 wounded when explosives hidden in a parked car and in a suicide belt worn by a pedestrian detonated simultaneously outside a car dealership, police Brig. Khalaf al-Jubouri said.

Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki were scheduled to meet Wednesday and Thursday in Amman.

The al-Sadr bloc in parliament and in the government is the backbone of Mr. al-Maliki's political support. Its withdrawal, if only temporarily, would be a severe blow to the prime minister's already shaky hold on power.

Sheik al-Sadr's followers hold six Cabinet seats and have 30 members in the 275-member parliament.

Sheik al-Sadr also challenged Sheik Harith al-Dhari, the Sunnis' most influential leader, who heads the Association of Muslim Scholars, to issue a fatwa, or religious edict, that condemned Sunni attacks on Shi'ites.

Leading about 5,000 worshippers in Friday prayers at a mosque in the Shi'ite holy city of Kufa, 100 miles south of Baghdad, the Shi'ite cleric said Sheik al-Dhari should ban Sunnis from joining al Qaeda in Iraq and organize the reconstruction of the Shi'ite Golden Dome mosque in Samarra, north of the capital.

Suspected al Qaeda bombers blew the shrine apart Feb. 22. Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army militia and associated death squads are thought to be responsible for killing hundreds of Sunnis since suspected al Qaeda in Iraq militants bombed the Golden Dome mosque. That attack set off a surge of retaliatory killings between Shi'ites and Sunnis that have raged all year.

In Sadr City yesterday, hundreds of men, women and children beat their chests, chanted and cried as they walked beside vehicles carrying the caskets of their loved ones to the holy Shi'ite city of Najaf. Despite Baghdad's curfew, Mr. al-Maliki, himself a Shi'ite, ordered police to guard the processions.

Once the processions reached the edge of Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, the cars and minivans left most of the mourners behind and began the 100-mile drive south to Najaf, a treacherous journey that passes through many checkpoints and areas controlled by Sunni militants in Iraq's so-called Triangle of Death.

As cleanup crews continued removing remains of the dead from wreckage of the car bombs, tents were erected where relatives could receive condolences.

Thursday's attack surpassed coordinated blasts on March 2, 2004, that struck Shi'ite Muslim shrines in Karbala and Baghdad, killing a total of at least 181 Iraqis and wounding 573. A bombing in the southern city of Hillah that targeted mostly Shi'ite police and national guard recruits, killed 125 and wounded more than 140 in February 2004.

GAO: DOD Business Practices Risky (UPI)

United Press International, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 (UPI) -- One of the most important tasks in the next session of U.S. Congress is to oversee the Pentagon's business operations, the Government Accountability Office said.

The GAO has identified 26 federal programs or activities that are at risk for waste, fraud and abuse because of lax oversight. Eight of them are in the Defense Department and six are programs for which the DOD bears some responsibility.

"Billions of dollars have been wasted annually because of the lack of adequate transparency and appropriate accountability across DOD's business areas," the GAO stated in a new report to Congress, outlining what it believes should be Congress' top priorities for oversight.

The high-risk areas include DOD's overall management approach to business transformation, business systems modernization, financial management, the personnel security clearance process, supply chain management, support infrastructure management, weapon systems acquisition, and contract management, according to the report.

The GAO lays out key tasks for Congress to help the Defense Department get a handle on the management of its $430 billion annual budget:

--"Require DOD to establish management accountability at an appropriate level of the organization with significant authority, experience, and tenure to provide sustained leadership needed to achieve successful and sustainable transformation," it said;

--"Require DOD to develop and implement a viable strategic plan with goals, objectives, key milestones, and measures to monitor and report on progress in transforming its key business operations;

--"Evaluate DOD's progress in complying with legislative requirements to improve its business systems modernization and financial management modernization efforts,(and) require DOD to develop and implement plans to address its high-risk areas."

Lost Documents Slow Veterans' Access To Benefits (LAT)

By Diane C. Lade, South Florida Sun Sentinel

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

Almost a million a year ask federal officials about retrieving papers they need to apply for valuable aid. Now forms are available online.

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA. — Harold Brewster certainly earned the right to veterans benefits. He was aboard the battleship New Mexico when a kamikaze pilot slammed into its bridge, killing its commanding officer and 29 crew members during World War II.

But when the former sailor now living in Boca Raton asked about the free plots that would be available to veterans in the new South Florida National Cemetery, he found out he needed documents that had been lost years before. Brewster's military papers and five medals were taken when his household belongings were stolen 10 years ago.

"I didn't know what we were going to do," said Brewster, 80.

Almost a million veterans a year ask federal officials about retrieving lost military documents, papers they need to apply for valuable veterans benefits like housing loans and low-cost healthcare.

The process now can be expedited by applying online. But some veterans and their families still find it cumbersome and confusing.

"Most people don't have the ability to do it on their own," said Floyd White, section manager with Broward County Elderly and Veterans Services.

At least one veteran a week comes into the office for help replacing lost papers, White said.

Brewster's family turned to the Mae Volen Senior Center in Boca Raton, where Brewster goes for activities and lunch.

Administrative assistant Grace Ginsberg pulled up the forms online and, within a few months, had the papers, as well as replacements for the medals.

Brewster wept as a Navy recruiter presented his decorations, in a display box put together by the center, during a ceremony two days before Veterans Day.

But some documents can be hard to retrieve, especially for veterans who served in World War II or the Korean War.

A huge fire swept through the National Personnel Records Center in St. Louis, Mo., in 1973, destroying as many as 18 million military files.

The majority of Army and Air Force veterans discharged before 1964 were affected; the center has reconstructed service histories for 6 million, sending them certificates to replace their military discharge papers.

Officially called a Report of Separation, or DD Form 214, a military discharge paper is required for most veterans benefits, including a veteran's home loan, healthcare at a U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs clinic or hospital, low-cost prescription drugs through the VA, and burial at a veterans cemetery.

According to the VA, the best way to request records is to fill out the Standard Form SF-180. It is available online at http://www.archives.gov/veterans . Veterans can file the form electronically or by mail.

The records center receives about 5,000 requests a day involving its 60 million records. But the center, part of the National Archives and Records Administration, tries to respond within 10 days, officials said.

Older veterans should apply for replacement documents as soon as they realize their originals are missing, veterans officials said.

Dems In Control? We're Still Staying In Canada (LAT)

By David Drucker

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

MY WIFE AND I AWOKE, as usual, to NPR. Before political correspondent Mara Liasson got to the end of her first sentence, I knew the news was disastrous. George W. Bush had been reelected.

"Honey," I said, "remember when we talked about moving to Canada?"

I'm sure a lot of other dyed-in-the-organic-wool liberals muttered something similar that dark morning in 2004, but unlike most of them, we meant it. Plan A: John Kerry wins, we build that dream ski house in Vermont. Plan B: Move to Vancouver, Canada.

So, Plan B it was. We'd had enough of Bush, the direction the United States was going, and this was the last straw. Never mind that we lived in Cambridge, Mass., arguably the most liberal city in the bluest of the blue states. We were packing our bulk granola into our diesel Beetle and heading out.

Eight months later, we were settling into a new home and jobs in British Columbia, when Canada had its own election. For those unfamiliar with the Canadian system of government, the prime minister is elected by parliament — not every four years but after losing a no-confidence vote. After a few of those there was a parliamentary election in January, which led to the election of a new prime minister, Stephen Harper, of Canada's Conservative Party.

Harper ran on cutting taxes and turning a federal child-care program into a monthly payment per child. The opposition's negative campaign ads sounded eerily familiar: He supported Bush's war in Iraq, was against signing the Kyoto environmental accord and wanted to "reexamine" gay marriage (which is legal in Canada). A shiver rippled down from our berets to our Birkenstocks.

Then, a few weeks ago, we awoke, as usual, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. Before CBC morning show host Tom Allen got to the end of his first sentence, I knew: Back in the United States, the Democratic Party had won control of the House and the Senate.

"Honey, did we make a big mistake?"

By "big mistake," I mean, not the kind in which you switch lines at Whole Foods and the line you'd been in suddenly starts to move. We're talking big mistake like selling all of your stock in Ben & Jerry's the day before Unilever buys the company.

But it turns out that Canadian conservatism can look awfully liberal. So far, Harper — derided as "Bush lite" — has, for instance, introduced a partial tax credit for monthly transit passes. The Conservatives have proposed a Clean Air Act for Canada, and although it's not ideal, it's still something. Harper said that these new laws would "institute a holistic approach that doesn't treat the related issues of pollutants and greenhouse gas emissions in isolation." When was the last time you heard any U.S. politician utter the word "holistic"?

Did I mention universal healthcare? Even Harper seems committed to keeping that.

We've come to the conclusion that the United States has drifted so far to the right that any self-respecting Canadian Conservative would be considered a raving liberal in Washington. Stephen Harper is no George W. Bush. We may not agree with him, but we don't feel ashamed every time he opens his mouth. We might yawn, though.

So we're staying in Canada. But good luck with that new Congress, eh?

Why The Economy Needs Consumers To Shop This Year (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse, Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The latest readings on the U.S. economy suggest a less-than-festive picture as this holiday shopping season begins: Unless consumers turn in a stellar performance at the mall, the recent sluggish growth could last through year's end.

While many economists and executives have begun to believe that the worst of the housing slump is over, the knock-on effects of the slowdown are becoming apparent. Together with a weak auto sector, sharp cutbacks in building activity are hitting everyone from manufacturers to retailers. Truckers are moving less merchandise, and stocks of unsold goods in warehouses are up.

Many retailers reported stronger-than-expected turnout on Black Friday, as shoppers swarmed stores and malls in search of deep discounts. But some economists and analysts worry that it is only deep discounts that are drawing shoppers out, not underlying strength. (See related article1)

All told, the latest data suggest consumers have been cautious, choosing not to spend all extra income and any savings from the gas pump. In October, retail sales excluding gasoline rose 0.4%, putting inflation-adjusted consumer spending on track to rise at about a 3% annualized rate in the current quarter -- a healthy pace, but not enough to generate a rebound in the economy as a whole.

"It'll take a miracle on 34th Street to get a solid rebound in economic activity," says Paul Kasriel, chief economist at Northern Trust Corp. in Chicago. Indeed, a spreading perception that growth in the U.S. is decelerating is weighing a bit on markets and contributing to a drop in the value of the dollar overseas.

Not all is gloom. Producers of capital goods such as machine tools and automation equipment are doing fairly well as businesses keep up their investments. The trade deficit might improve slightly as imports slow and healthy growth abroad stimulates exports. Moreover, deep discounts at Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other large chains could help keep a lid on inflation.

But how U.S. consumers -- whose purchases make up more than two-thirds of the economy -- respond to the mixed picture they face remains the big unanswered question.

On one hand, falling home prices have made many feel poorer. On the other, job and wage growth still look good. The unemployment rate fell to a five-year low of 4.4% in October, and the average wage was up 3.9% from a year earlier -- compared with average annual growth of 2.8% since the current expansion began in late 2001. Gasoline prices are still high, but are far below their August peaks. And the stock market is doing well.

Retailers of goods to affluent shoppers, who make up an outsized share of consumer spending, say they see reason for optimism. "We've had good strength in the financial markets this year, and that would bode well for bonuses on Wall Street," says Stephen Sadove, chief executive of Saks Inc. "We also feel good about tourism. Those along with other factors make us feel good about the holiday season for luxury."

Recent earnings reports from big discount retailers Wal-Mart and Target Corp. paint a murkier picture. Wal-Mart, which has been struggling with soft sales amid store redesigns, reported better-than-expected earnings for the quarter ended Oct. 31, but warned that holiday profit could disappoint if deep discounts fail to boost sales. Target offered a better outlook, saying it expects to gain market share over the holidays and beyond.

Meantime, economists' views of the prospects for growth have darkened. As of mid-November, 56 economists polled by The Wall Street Journal predicted, on average, that real gross domestic product -- an inflation-adjusted measure of all the goods and services the U.S. produces -- will rise at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the current quarter. That was down from their October estimate of 2.5%. Many cut their estimates further on Nov. 17, after the Commerce Department reported that new-home construction had plummeted to a six-year low.

As a result, the current quarter is looking not much different than the last, in which GDP, hurt by the housing slump, rose a meager 1.6% -- a number that economists expect to be revised upward a bit this coming week.

The housing outlook remains unclear. Beyond its immediate dampening of growth, the home-building slump ultimately could help the housing market recover. By cutting back on construction, home builders are helping to reduce a huge overhang of unsold homes. Meanwhile, buyers have been more active than many expected: Mortgage applications have been stable for several weeks, and the latest National Association of Home Builders survey showed an uptick in both home builders' actual sales and their expectations for future sales.

The signs of improvement in housing "could be judged as no more than the proverbial dead-cat bounce, but I believe it indicates more than that," says Robert Toll, chief executive of luxury-home builder Toll Brothers Inc. In the Wall Street Journal survey, nearly two in three economists said they thought the worst of the housing slump had passed.

But even if the housing market stabilizes, its effects on the broader economy will linger. Lower home values mean people can't take as much spending money out of their houses through cash-out refinancings and home-equity loans -- a source of funds that in some places, particularly in California, has amounted to more than a fifth of people's disposable income. And everyone from building suppliers to mortgage brokers must adjust to a slower pace of sales.

Retailers Home Depot Inc. and Lowe's Cos. both said recently they expect sales and profits to sag as lower home prices take a toll on customers. Economists at Moody's Economy.com estimate that housing-related sectors -- such as residential construction, furniture making and extermination -- will shed 300,000 jobs over the next year and a half.

James Metcalf, president and chief operating officer of Chicago-based wallboard producer USG Corp, says he has so far made only "surgical" layoffs, though he has slashed overtime and cut back production by about 10% since July. On the brighter side, he says, commercial construction remains robust and new computer systems have allowed him to adjust production much faster than in previous downturns, lessening the risk of the kind of oversupply that leads to big busts.

Still, companies have a lot of unsold inventory sitting on shelves and in warehouses, suggesting that they have plenty of adjusting to do. Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs in New York, calculates that in the third quarter, nonauto inventories rose by an inflation-adjusted, annualized figure of $59.3 billion -- the biggest jump since 2000. That means businesses don't need to order as much in the current quarter, a trend reflected in October's manufacturing survey from the Institute for Supply Management, which showed a significant drop in new orders.

Bill Zollars, CEO of trucking company YRC Worldwide Inc., based in Overland Park, Kan., says he has seen smaller and fewer shipments than usual among manufacturers and retailers in recent months -- a time when they are typically stocking up for the holidays. "The peak shipping season is not as robust this year as it has been in previous years," he says.

To be sure, not everyone is hurting. Producers of capital goods are benefiting from businesses' continuing efforts to boost productivity. James Gelly, chief financial officer at Rockwell Automation Inc., a Milwaukee maker of factory-automation equipment, says business is strong in areas such as the energy sector in the Rocky Mountain region.

"The underlying conditions aren't so bad," he says. "In fact, there's a nice uptrend."

Shoppers Flock To Stores, But Will It Be Enough? (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'Connell, Stephanie Kang, Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Crowds swarmed stores across the country early Friday, shopping for deeply discounted big-screen TVs, designer clothes and home accessories. But a stronger-than-expected turnout doesn't necessarily mean retailers will have merry results overall in the critical holiday shopping season, forecasters and retailers warn.

The big risk: power shoppers who showed up for Friday's numerous midnight store openings might have little interest in shopping when the discounts aren't as steep. While the specials appeared to bolster shopper enthusiasm, they could backfire for stores if shoppers use the door busters and other blitz promotions to cherry-pick discounted items. With the extended hours now offered by discounters, malls, outlets and department stores, shoppers can hop from store to store, buying just the dirt-cheap specials -- many below wholesale prices -- and leave the higher-margin products on the shelf.

"The positive is that they've been able to draw consumers into the store," said Donald Soares, principal in the retail practice of consultancy Capgemini. "The negative is the risk that consumers will only buy discounted items and ignore the rest of the store."

"When the dust settles, we'll say 'hey, gee, what a good Black Friday.'" But the big question is, "how much momentum is there?" said Michael P. Niemira, economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group.

No doubt, many retailers saw good response to their efforts to lure early shoppers into their stores. At 9 p.m. on Thanksgiving night, CompUSA opened its doors to crowds of shoppers who rushed the aisles for $400 LCD HDTV-ready televisions by Olevia and $50 Linksys routers that normally sell for $79.

The early opening allowed Corey Jackson, a 32-year-old computer programmer from North Dallas, to get a jump on holiday shopping and snare bargains at many stores. After snatching a hard drive and a Bluetooth headset, he planned to head back out in the morning, hitting Wal-Mart for toys for his 21-month-old son, then to Micro Center for more computer shopping, then on to Circuit City and Best Buy for $3.99 CDs and DVDs.

Overall, the number of shoppers who hit stores Friday was greater than anticipated by Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak RCT Corp., of Chicago, which collects data from 40,000 sensors in enclosed malls and strip centers. The research firm had been predicting a 2.5% increase in traffic Friday over the same day last year. But by late morning Friday, he said the increase in shopper traffic seemed likely to surpass that by at least a few tenths of a percentage point. "That's a pretty strong increase," he said.

"The question is how much money do they spend?" Mr. Martin added. To benefit stores, the increased traffic "has to ring out in the register" by generating solid sales of goods at profitable prices. "What we saw Friday was a grab for market share, with retailers just trying to get people in the store," he said.

By 11:30 p.m. Thanksgiving evening, cars were bumper-to-bumper trying to nab a parking space at Citadel Outlets in Commerce, Calif. For the first time this year, the center opened some of its stores at midnight on Black Friday. At Old Navy, shoppers waited for more than 30 minutes to get into the store, shuffling through a velvet-roped line. By 12:15 a.m. shoppers were snaking around the interior of stores like Vans, KB Toys, apparel retailer Kids Supercenter and others, waiting to get to the cash register.

Melissa Guttierrez, a 29-year-old who was standing in line to get into Calvin Klein at 11:45, said she would spend about $1,000 this year, less than what she spent last year.

Consumers' holiday spending is an important indicator of the strength of the $12 trillion U.S. economy. Retailers count on holiday sales for as much as 40% of their annual sales and half their annual profits.

While the day after Thanksgiving is no longer considered the biggest shopping day of the year -- that honor this year will likely fall to the last Saturday before Christmas -- the day does bring some of the biggest specials. Often known as Black Friday for its historical significance as the day when many retailers turned a profit -- or "went into the black" -- the day generally sets the tone for the rest of the season. But this year's markdowns on some items were surprisingly sharp, especially for electronics.

"It has been a cautious year for retail in general, and the stores wanted to end the year with a bang," said Scott Krugman, a spokesman for the National Retail Federation, which is forecasting an overall increase of 5% in retail sales during the holiday season this year, down slightly from last year's 6.1% gain.

"What you can say for sure is that if retailers run bargains, they can bring out the masses," says Britt Beemer, chairman of America's Research Group, a Charleston, S.C., research firm. In his surveys of shoppers, 42% said they would respond to an advertised deal, up from about 32% of the shoppers he interviewed last year.

At Macy's flagship store in Manhattan, shoppers were waiting in a line that stretched around the block by 5:30 a.m. -- half an hour before the store opened. Many shoppers were clutching $10-off coupons for Macy's merchandise that they had clipped from a newspaper circular the day before. "We have much more traffic than we have had in the last few years" on the day after Thanksgiving, said Terry Lundgren, chief executive of Macy's parent Federated Department Stores Inc.

Some Web retailers pulled out the stops to attract consumers to their Web sites. On Thursday, Amazon.com placed Microsoft's Xbox 360 game console on sale for $100, a steep discount to its normal $299 price. The 1,000 Xbox 360s Amazon was offering at the lower price sold out 29 seconds after going on sale at 11 a.m. Pacific Time, causing the performance of Amazon's site to temporarily slow down. "We saw dramatically more traffic than we anticipated," said Amazon spokesman Craig Berman. On Friday, high traffic disrupted Wal-Marts Web site for much of the day.

US Retailers Fire Starter Gun On Sales (FT)

By Jonathan Birchall

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

US shoppers on Friday launched their frantic traditional post-Thanksgiving Day assault on stores and malls across the country, amid predictions of a solid but not spectacular holiday season for the retail sector.

The annual Friday ritual of early-morning openings and “door-buster” limited availability offers is used by retailers to mark the start of the holiday shopping season.

However, most leading retailers now launch their Christmas marketing campaigns at the beginning of November.

This year the event again crept into the Thursday holiday itself – led in part by online retailers, who last year saw a spike in transactions from customers shopping from home on the holiday.

Underlining the trend, Amazon, the largest online retailer, staged a Thanksgiving afternoon promotion in which it sold 1,000 Xbox 360 systems for a third of their advertised price. Kmart’s 1,400 discount stores opened for the first time on Thanksgiving Day, while CompUSA, the computer retailer, opened its stores from 9pm to midnight. FAO Schwartz, the Manhattan toy store, also opened on Thursday.

Department stores, including JC Penney, Kohl’s, Saks and Macy’s also launched “pre-Thanksgiving” sales in the week before the holiday.

A number of malls owned by Simon Properties opened their doors at midnight on Thursday. But the early Friday morning remains the most bitterly contested retail battleground. The focus on the day after Thanksgiving continues a tradition that dates back to the days when department stores reopened their stores with Christmas decorations and settings on the day after the holidays.

Wal-Mart, the largest US retailer, and Best Buy and Circuit City, the largest electronics retailers opened their doors at 5am on Friday, with customers in some locations queuing all night for “door-buster” bargains, traditionally advertised in Thanksgiving Day papers.

In an effort to thwart websites that have managed in the past to publish details of its door-buster offers ahead of time, Wal-Mart this year announced 17 “secret” items on its website on Thanksgiving Day – including the latest Xbox game console that would be limited to just six per store.

The hooplah this year also included a stunt by David Blaine, the escapologist, in New York's Times Square sponsored by Target, Wal-Mart's main rival.

Overall, economists are predicting stronger consumer spending over the holidays than last year, despite an initial level of pessimism based around high fuel prices and interest rate concerns.

The National Retail Federation in September predicted a modest 5 per cent increase this year in sales in November and December to $457.4bn against a 6.1 per cent increase last year.

But Wayne Best, Visa USA's chief economist, said earlier this month that it expected growth of 7.5 per cent, as lower fuel prices and a buoyant stock market have improved consumer's confidence.

Holiday Shopping Season Starts Strong (CHIT)

By Sandra Jones

Chicago Tribune, November 25, 2006

Corey Hatters set up his lawn chair in front of Office Depot in Algonquin at 11:50 p.m. Thanksgiving Day and settled in for the night.

The 17-year-old student doesn't usually go for so-called doorbuster deals, but this year the bargain was too good to pass up. When the doors opened at 6 a.m., Hatters' position as first in line secured him one of only three $299.99 Toshiba laptop computers in the store, marked down from $649.99.

"I'd rather do other things with my time, but it was worthwhile," said Hatters. "Before I go to college, I need to get a laptop."

An estimated 60 million shoppers poured into the nation's shopping today—one of the busiest shopping days of the year—snapping up bargains on everything from large-screen plasma TVs to diamond jewelry to KitchenAid mixers.

Millions stayed home and went online as well, causing some problems for retailers on the crucial shopping day. Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s Web site was disrupted for several hours today because of high traffic volume. The huge retailer's problems came a day after Amazon.com suffered disruptions because of a Thanksgiving Day sale on Microsoft Corp.'s Xbox 360.

Indeed, the early returns on the official kick off to the holiday shopping season in the Chicago area came in strong.

At Spring Hill Mall in West Dundee, where more than half the stores opened at 1 a.m., many retailers reached 75 percent of their daily sales goal by 6 a.m., according to assistant general manager Neil Lopez.

Best Buy on Clark Street in Lakeview, where the first customer lined up at 7 p.m. on Thanksgiving Day, reported sales that were double the daily plan by 2 p.m., said Jon Kulikowski, general manager. An estimated 1,000 people lined up around the block for Best Buy's 5 a.m. opening. Most were shopping in large part for great deals on flat panel plasma TVs and laptop computers.

Stores opened earlier than ever, some as early as 1 a.m., and the pace of shopping remained strong throughout the day.

Perhaps it was simply the sunny, warm weather in Chicago or the more civilized plans many retailers put in place to handle doorbusting crowds, but the upbeat mood lead many observers to predict this holiday will be a rosy one for retailers.

"When you marry this weather with the business we had today, it doesn't get much better than this," said Marc Strich, general manager at Woodfield Mall in Schaumburg.

Traffic at Woodfield Mall rose an estimated 7 to 9 percent, according to Strich. In anticipation of the crowds the mall increased traffic controllers and started them at 8:30 a.m., three hours earlier than last year.

The National Retail Federation predicts a 5 percent gain in holiday sales this year, less than the 6 percent of a year ago but on par with the 4.8 percent average annual increase of the past decade.

Shoppers Line Up For Sales (DMN)

By Maria Halkias

The Dallas Morning News, November 25, 2006

Dallas-area shoppers flocked to snap up early-bird bargains Friday – the kickoff of retailers' critical holiday shopping season – saying that Thanksgiving weekend discounts are some of the best of the year.

"I come out every year on this day," said Jennifer Wilder of Dallas, as she carried bags from Ann Taylor, Macy's, Bath & Body Works, Limited and Zales to her car in the parking lot at NorthPark Center.

“I got a top for $9.99 that was $49.99 for me and brown cowboy boots for my grandbaby for $19.99 that were regular $69.99,” Ms. Wilder said. “It’s worth it. I saved $500 on diamond rings for me and my husband.”

The day after Thanksgiving represents the kickoff to the holiday shopping season and has been called Black Friday because it traditionally represented the day retailers went from posting losses, or being in the red, to being profitable, or in the black.

“Retailers who get shoppers to commit earlier end up doing better.”

Last year, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. ended up having a weak day on the Friday after Thanksgiving and that carried through to the rest of the season, he said.

This time Wal-Mart was more aggressive with its discounts and started earlier, he said. Wal-Mart discounted toys, electronics and small appliances weeks leading up to Black Friday.

Many retailers chose not to wait until Black Friday to bring in the crowds.

Late Thursday night, shoppers formed long lines at several stores, including Banana Republic, Polo Ralph Lauren, Tommy Hilfiger, at the Allen Premium Outlets.

About two-thirds of the center's 100 stores participated in the Midnight Madness sale.

“Nike had such a long line it decided to open at 11:35 Thursday night,” said Michele Rothstein, spokeswoman for the shopping center. “We had traffic backed up on I-75 (at the Stacy Road exit). “People voted by showing up. I think we’re onto something.

Sherrie G. McAvoy, U.S. retail sector leader of Deloitte & Touche LLP’s consumer business practice, visited both NorthPark and the Galleria in Dallas on Friday.

“I think the strength we’ve been seeing in luxury will continue this season,” she said. “I saw equal numbers of browsers and shoppers. Due to the area’s competitive environment the retailer has to work harder to convert the browser into the shopper.”

Dallas-Fort Worth shoppers are among the most discerning and demanding, according to results of Deloitte & Touche survey. Despite their high expectations of retailers, they seem to enjoy holiday shopping, Ms. McAvoy said.

Consumers in Dallas/Ft. Worth plan to spend above the national average on gifts - $728 DFW vs. $584 national - and more than any other area of the US.

Holiday Shoppers Turn Out For Bargains (AP)

By Anne D'Innocenzio

It was cold, it was dark and in some places it was foggy. None of that would stop millions of bargain-seekers from climbing into their cars for a pre-dawn raid on their local malls, electronics retailers and discounters for the official start to the holiday season.

""Great deals. I'm shopping for everybody today. We hit Target. We're going to Meijer. We hit Sears. We started shopping at 5 a.m.," Joanne Dosant, a 36-year-old legal assistant from Windsor, Ontario, said Friday as she loaded her SUV with two cartloads of items from a Target store in Madison Heights, Mich.

AUDIO: Gerald Storch, chief of Toys R Us, is upbeat. | But shopper Roy Scott has a problem.

The aggressive tactics used to lure shoppers out before sunrise on Black Friday apparently worked. Based on early reports, the expanded hours, increased discounting and free money as gift cards drove hordes of shoppers to stores to buy flat-screen TVs, computers and toys.

"Large crowds drive me nuts, but this was my Christmas present to myself," said Mark Demers, 23, of Bristol, Conn., who had camped out overnight in front of the Best Buy store in West Hartford, Conn. for the 5 a.m. opening after seeing a TV commercial late Thursday touting $500 off on the $1,500 price tag for a 42-inch LCD TV made by Westinghouse.

Clearly, Black Friday is "becoming the biggest sport," said Marshal Cohen, chief analyst at NPD Group Inc., observing that shoppers this year bought fewer, but pricier items than a year ago.

A growing number of stores such as KB Toys opened at midnight. Some, like CompUSA Inc. and BJ's Wholesale Club opened on Thanksgiving Day for the first time.

Overall, the biggest draws were consumer electronics, particularly flat-screen TVs, laptop computers and digital cameras. Toys fared well too. In addition to the hard-to-find Fisher-Price TMX Elmo, shoppers snapped up other items like anything Dora, robot toys, Fisher-Price's Kids Tough Digital Camera and Jakks-Pacific FlyWheel XPV, according to toy merchants.

But clothing, mirroring a trend in recent years, took a back seat, Cohen said: "Apparel will be the late bloomer making mall-based apparel stores a little nervous."

Wal-Mart Stores, which promised the most aggressive pricing strategy ever, set the tone by plying shoppers with one-time offers such as a $988 Viore 42-inch plasma TV set. The discounter declined to comment Friday about business; it's slated to announce estimated sales results for November on Saturday.

Sears Holdings' Sears Roebuck stores, which offered $10 reward cards to the first 200 people showing up for the 5 a.m. opening, drew increased traffic at many locations, spokeswoman Gail Lavielle said.

Toys "R" Us and KB Toys also reported increased traffic from a year ago.

Karen McDonald, a spokeswoman at Taubman Centers, which operates or owns 23 malls in 11 states, said a handful of malls surveyed on Friday reported traffic and sales gains over last year.

"The line was literally wrapped around the building. I haven't seen that in years," said Terry Lundgren, chairman and CEO of Federated Department Stores, who surveyed the crowds at the 6 a.m. opening of the flagship Macy's in New York as the chain began its first holiday season as a national brand. The hottest draws were discounted cashmere, $50 luggage sets and $100 one-carat diamond necklaces, Lundgren said.

The Best Buy store in West Paterson, N.J., had almost 2,000 people waiting for Friday's 5 a.m. opening — nearly 24 hours after they started lining up.

"They had turkey sandwiches," said Chuck O'Donnell, a district service manager for Best Buy, which sold out of all the early morning specials advertised in its circular, including the 42-inch Westinghouse TVs and $80 digital cameras.

In fact, many of those who arrived at stores early Friday came away disappointed. They were plenty of customers like Brian Clark, 27, who left empty-handed from the West Hartford Best Buy after the televisions and computers he'd eyed as Christmas gifts were snatched by even earlier shoppers.

Alarmed by a recent shooting of a customer waiting outside a Connecticut Wal-Mart for the highly sought Sony's PlayStation 3 game console, Clark had tucked his Glock pistol in a holster under his jacket and put extra ammunition in his pocket before heading out early Friday.

"You never know these days," he said, quickly adding that he has a state permit for a concealed weapon.

Gary Miller, a 45-year-old computer programmer in Cincinnati, was at Wal-Mart at 5 a.m. to hunt for a 20-inch LCD television he had seen advertised online.

"My wife sent me out for this one," he said, pointing to the set in his shopping cart. "But then I saw this one (a 20-inch conventional TV) for $85 and said, 'What the heck, I'll get that one, too.'"

At the Glendale Galleria in suburban Los Angeles, The Gap had been set to open at 5 a.m. but unlocked the doors 15 minutes early to accommodate a long line of shoppers, said Fran Vartanian, district manager of the chain. Sales were brisk, with all prices reduced by 30% until noon — a first-time promotion for the store. Sweatshirts with hoods were big sellers at about $35 after the discount.

While Black Friday officially starts holiday shopping, generally it's no longer the busiest day of the season. That honor now falls to the last Saturday before Christmas. Stores say Black Friday sets the tone for the weeks ahead, however: What consumers see that day influences where they will shop for the rest of the season.

This year, analysts expect robust holiday sales gains for the retail industry, though the growth is expected to be slower than a year ago. The National Retail Federation projects a 5% gain in total holiday sales for the November-December period, less than the 6.1% in the year-ago period.

Meanwhile, the International Council of Shopping Centers estimates sales at stores open at least a year will rise 3% in the November-December period, less than last year's 3.6%.

Eager Shoppers Ring It Up On "Red-Eye Thursday" (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

At midnight yesterday, 30-something gal pals Tracey Oskey and Jodi Weier kicked off their Black Friday shopping spree in classic Washington style: stuck in traffic.

"Oh my God, this is insane," Oskey said as she stared down the stretch of red tail lights on Route 7 in Loudoun County headed toward Leesburg Corner Premium Outlets.

The 5 a.m. early bird special is so last year. For the first time, retailers across the country threw open their doors at 12 a.m. to throngs of shoppers, turning the day after Thanksgiving into a nearly 24-hour shopping smorgasbord.

"I don't even call it Black Friday anymore. I'm calling it red-eye Thursday," said Marshal Cohen, chief industry analyst at consulting firm NPD Group, who hit several midnight openings and early bird specials. "I feel like I'm in college pulling an all-nighter."

Black Friday is the symbolic start of the holiday shopping season, when retailers showcase door-busting discounts on everything from plasma TV sets to Barbies as they jockey for customers and, perhaps more importantly, buzz. A successful day can give a retailer momentum that will last until Christmas. Midnight openings are the latest craze, luring shoppers before they have barely digested their turkey.

"Sales are important, but they're secondary. It's about getting the people" said Ellen Davis, a spokeswoman for the National Retail Federation, a trade group. "Retailers hope that the people who came into their stores today will be back throughout the holiday."

Black Friday earned its nickname because it marks the day when retailers traditionally went from losing money to making a profit, or being in the black. The research firm ShopperTrak predicts that yesterday's foot traffic will be the second-heaviest of the year, following the Saturday before Christmas. By Sunday, retailers expect to have seen 137 million people, up about 2 million from last year, according to the NRF.

Oskey's husband was out of town on a business trip for the phone installation company they run together, Telforward. So her parents came to her home in Tysons Corner at noon on Thursday for turkey and stuffing. They were out the door by 5:30.

Oskey threw some clothes into a backpack and headed west to Loudoun County, where she had booked a shop-and-stay package that Lansdowne Resort, near the outlets, was marketing for the midnight opening. Weier met her at the hotel, and by 9 p.m. they settled in with a bottle of merlot from the minibar and "Grey's Anatomy" on the television.

By 10:45, they were visibly dragging.

"I said that I can make it," Oskey announced in a determined voice as she mapped out her plan of attack in the hotel lobby.

A second wind arrived in the form of hot tea, coffee and a booklet of coupons -- part of the hotel package. Oskey made one last stop at her room to dump off her belongings before heading to the outlets. She pocketed her credit card and driver's license and walked out the door, unencumbered by a purse.

A hotel shuttle took the girlfriends and a handful of other shoppers who had booked the package trip to the outlets, circumventing parking lots that were full shortly after midnight. The bumper-to-bumper traffic was forgotten at the first rack of clothes at the first store Oskey entered.

"C'mon now, $9.99? This rocks!" she said as she sorted through a rack of men's fleece jackets at Haggar. "Are you only allowed one per customer?"

It was 12:30 a.m., and the line at the lone cash register was already seven people deep -- one of the shortest lines of the night.

The Leesburg outlets were among 25 shopping centers around the country run by Chelsea Property Group to open at midnight. After a successful test at seven locations last year, the company expanded the midnight opening to almost all of its properties.

"It created a lot of excitement to get people to come to us first," said Michele Rothstein, a Chelsea Property spokeswoman. "We're all out there trying to capture the attention and the spending of customers."

Eight malls owned by Greensboro, N.C.-based Tanger Factory Outlet Centers opened at midnight, as did a dozen run by Baltimore-based Prime Retail Inc., including one in Hagerstown.

Retailers said they would not begin tallying the number of shoppers until today but that anecdotal reports indicated strong traffic. Wal-Mart's Web site crashed yesterday because of high volume. Jim Martin, vice president of ShopperTrak, said he expected yesterday's traffic to be comparable to last year's. Early openings might not draw more shoppers but spread them throughout the day, he said.

Some retailers even opened on Thanksgiving Day. CompUSA was open from 9 p.m. to midnight. Kmart checked out shoppers from 7 a.m. to 9 p.m., following a long-standing tradition. Gail Lavielle, a Kmart spokeswoman, said that customers "like having different alternatives and being able to shop all weekend."

But locked doors and dark windows weren't enough to stop some people from showing up to cash in on yesterday's blockbuster promotions. About a dozen shoppers arrived at Fair Oaks Mall in Fairfax at 11 p.m. on Thursday, reported parent company Taubman Centers, to claim spots in line at Elite Boardshop and Sears -- which opened at 5 a.m. and offered a plasma TV for $1,199.99.

Showing up at 4:30 a.m. meant you were downright late. That's when Jae Shim, 41, of Olney arrived at Best Buy in Germantown, where a long line had beat him. He and a friend waited two hours to get inside and another two hours to pay for a DVD player, video games and some movies.

"What we wanted we didn't even get," said Shim, who wanted to snag a Hewlett-Packard laptop for $380. "We could barely get in the store. It was crazy. They said, 'We're out of this; we're out of that.' "

Meanwhile, Oskey was blowing through her Christmas list of about two dozen people long before other retailers flicked on their lights. But even she had her limits. She quickly dashed out of Pottery Barn after seeing that the line wrapped around half the store.

"There's nothing in here I want that bad," she said.

By 3 a.m., she was back in bed. Her list was all checked off, and the only thing left to do in the morning was get a massage and mani-pedi at the hotel spa.

Getting Head Start On Black Friday (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

Tracy Rigual and her daughter, Rachel, have marked the start of the holiday shopping season with pre-dawn shopping trips for a decade. So when Leesburg Corner Premium Outlets started Black Friday at midnight, so did they.

Armed with coffee and a stroller for packages, the Riguals joined millions of Americans who yesterday hit stores throughout the country.

Retailers look at Black Friday, named after the day retailers traditionally start to see a profit each year, as a bellwether for how the rest of the Christmas season is going to go and a factor in consumer confidence.

So merchants loaded up on discounts this year to entice shoppers.

At Leesburg Corner, some stores offered up to 30 percent off for the first few hours after midnight. Wal-Mart and Target, the expected top draws on Black Friday, have been heavily discounting this season with deals on electronics. Wal-Mart was concerned it would repeat last year's mistake of not discounting enough.

"Retailers went all out this year with exciting promotions and big sales to bring in shoppers," said National Retail Federation President and Chief Executive Officer Tracy Mullin. "Many stores offered substantial savings on big-ticket items for consumers, and it seems that, for many shoppers, the deals were simply too good to pass up."

Roads into Leesburg Corner were packed and the parking lots were full shortly after midnight. Stores with big promotions, such as Ralph Lauren, Coach and Old Navy, and stores selling coffee had lines for hours.

Shoppers were camped out at Best Buy and Circuit City department stores in Northern Virginia by 10 on Thanksgiving night. Both chains opened at 5 a.m. yesterday.

Sears Holdings and Macy's East reported "good" foot traffic at their stores.

DOJ_NMG_0098483

Toys 'R' Us Inc. Chief Executive Officer Gerald Storch told Bloomberg News that the chain's stores had lines longer than they've seen in years. The toy chain had Black Friday deals such as 60 percent off select board games.

Trade groups estimate that between 100 million and 137 million Americans — more than one-third of the U.S. population participated — in Black Friday shopping.

Consumers appear to be behind on their shopping this year, possibly prompting more people to shop on Black Friday. According to the International Council of Shopping Centers, a New York trade group, about 24 percent had started their shopping by Oct. 31. Last year, 29 percent had started by then.

Mark Rein, director of strategic consulting for Maritz Research Retail Group, said Macy's and Coach appeared to be the big winners at the Mall of America in Bloomington, Minn., the country's largest shopping center. Both had major Black Friday promotions.

Department stores, which lost some of their luster with young shoppers during the past few years, are poised for a comeback this holiday.

"Macy's was very busy right at 6 this morning," he said. "Last year, Macy's was a ghost town here."

Other big winners at the Mall of America were the stores that heavily promoted and discounted: Wet Seal, Victoria's Secret, Coach and Bath & Body Works.

"In general, it's busier than last year, without a doubt," he said. "People are walking around with three to four bags — big bags — way more than last year."

Some shoppers chose to stay in their pajamas and shop on the Web. For the first time, many retailers had their Black Friday deals available online — some as early as Thanksgiving Day.

"It's definitely one of the first times we've noticed that retailers and Web sites are making more of a connection," said Kathy Grannis, a National Retail Federation spokeswoman.

But some of the deals may have been too good. Frustrated shoppers were turned off by long lines and slow Web sites.

Wal-Mart's Web site was jammed with traffic and shut down for parts of the day yesterday.

Baltimore residents Mike Hoffman, Lara Wolf and Erin Marsh looked defeated by 1 a.m. yesterday and ready to leave Leesburg Corner without any shopping bags.

"The lines are too long. It's not worth it," Mr. Hoffman said. "I'd rather pay full price than sit in these lines."

Others at Leesburg just wanted to see the madness of a shopping center opening at midnight.

"I guess I'm here just to say I've shopped at midnight," Leesburg, Va., resident Souzanne Al-Azm said a few minutes before midnight.

"This is our cardio," said Terri Hackenburg of Bethesda, before shopping with her sister, Stephanie. "We're burning off the turkey."

Some shoppers did well. The Riguals left Leesburg Corner at 4 a.m., with about 90 percent of their shopping list done.

"I think because we got there so early, we didn't fight traffic getting in, and one of us stood in line while the other one shopped around," Tracy Rigual said. "It was fun."

Attention, Holiday Shoppers: We Have Fisticuffs In Aisle 2 (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

Perhaps it should be renamed Black-and-Blue Friday.

For decades, the day after Thanksgiving has been called simply Black Friday, because it is the unofficial start of the holiday shopping season, when retailers supposedly move into the black, or start turning a profit.

But bargain hunters competing for scarce quantities of “doorbuster” discounts have given this day an increasingly sharp-elbowed, close-fisted and purse-swinging edge.

Shortly after midnight yesterday, an estimated 15,000 shoppers pushed and shoved their way into the Fashion Place mall in Murray, Utah. Police soon joined them, responding to reports of nine skirmishes.

DOJ_NMG_0098484

Once inside, shoppers ransacked stores, overturning piles of clothes as they looked for bargains. A retailer's dream — too many customers! — quickly turned into a nightmare, forcing store clerks to shut their doors, and only let people in after others left. The mall even briefly closed its outside doors to avoid a fire hazard.

"It's like a mosh pit," said Lexie Dewegel, 19. "You get pushed everywhere."

At the Finish Line shoe store, one employee enlisted his mother, who happened to be shopping in the mall, to guard the entrance.

"We were not prepared for this," said Amber Friedrichsen, the store's manager.

Customers behaved badly across the country yesterday, but the mayhem can be traced in part to an escalating battle among retailers to be the first to open their doors and offer the steepest must-have deals.

Many merchants angered shoppers by trumpeting huge discounts — like $70 portable DVD players and $600 flat-screen televisions — only to announce they were sold out moments after they opened.

The fact that so many people were sleep-deprived probably didn't help.

It was the earliest Black Friday on record. Trying to one-up its rivals, CompUSA started its annual Black Friday sales at 9 p.m. on Thursday, just as many Americans sat down for Thanksgiving dessert.

A dozen malls, from Utah to Maine, opened at midnight. And Wal-Mart, Best Buy and J. C. Penney began ringing up sales at 5 a.m. (A 6 a.m. opening at Target seemed so 2005.)

A final tally from yesterday's sales will not be available until tomorrow, at the earliest. But retail executives, who were constantly checking sales figures on their BlackBerrys yesterday, said the numbers suggested that the holiday season was off to a strong, if uncivil, start.

"I have not seen a crowd this size in years," said Terry J. Lundgren, the chief executive of Federated Department Stores, after surveying the lines outside Macy's Herald Square at 5:30 a.m.

Gerald L. Storch, the chief executive of Toys "R" Us, said reports from store managers around the country were the same: long lines at the checkout counter. "Sales results look really good," he said.

Merchants had been wringing their hands throughout the fall over higher gas prices and a weak housing market, worrying that they would make consumers wallet-shy in the crucial November-December period.

But with prices at the pump falling, the industry is now predicting an above-average holiday season.

The National Retail Federation, a trade group, has forecast a 5 percent sales increase, to $457.4 billion, over last year. That figure is well above the industry's performance from 2000 to 2002, when retail sales growth topped out at 3.4 percent. But it falls short of the last two seasons, when they rang up gains of more than 6 percent.

To lure customers, merchants dangled all sorts of discounts. Macy's, Sears, J. C. Penney and Kohl's all placed the same bet: that a $10 coupon on the front of their circulars would draw crowds. Gap offered 30 percent off everything if customers spent more than $50, and Kmart reduced the price of some apparel by 50 percent.

But once they were in the store, many customers heard a deflating message.

"Sold out, sold out, sold out," announced the manager at a Staples on Fifth Avenue in Manhattan yesterday at 7 a.m. "When?" asked the incredulous customer. "An hour ago," replied the manager — in other words, the minute the store opened.

In Lewis Center, Ohio, near Columbus, Cindy Milsap, 43, and her daughter, Ashley, 20, woke up before dawn to drive to the nearby Wal-Mart Supercenter, which advertised a 52-inch high-definition television for $474. "We don't really need a new TV, Ms. Milsap said. "But at that price? C'mon."

But the bargain eluded them. The "limited quantity" in the ad, she said, was three TVs — all sold by the time the pair arrived.

Those customers left in peace.

But at the Wal-Mart outside Columbus, customers dashing toward 5 a.m. deals pinned employees against stacks of merchandise.

"Oh, my god, stop pushing me, oh, my god," screamed Linda Tuttle, a 47-year-old employee at the store.

Grace Smith, a 22-year-old customer in the store, was stunned by the scene. "I heard it would be crazy but I never thought I'd see anything like this," she said.

Black Friday was once the province of a few hard-core bargain hunters, who camped outside stores waiting for deals. Stores barely advertised the event.

But over the last decade, retailers have begun treating the day after Thanksgiving as the biggest retail event of the year, wagering that the discounts offered that day influence perceptions about a store's prices throughout the holiday season.

Several years ago, the phrase "Black and Blue Friday" started creeping into the lexicon, as consumers became increasingly aggressive, and Black Friday has become even more of a contact sport since.

Electronics once again were the hottest items. At Best Buy, Game Spot and Toys "R" Us, customers pleaded for PlayStation 3 ($600) and Nintendo Wii ($250), two video game consoles introduced last week. But more often than not, stores had sold out, leaving consumers to turn to the season's remaining must-haves: portable DVD players, cashmere sweaters and satchel handbags.

And Elmo. Again.

At 6 a.m. yesterday morning in Times Square, a line of shoppers several hundred deep burst through the doors of Toys "R" Us and promptly formed a second, equally long line to buy the $40 T.M.X. Elmo (Tickle Me Elmo Version No. 10).

The familiar Elmo-induced panic ensued — pushing, shouting, grabbing — until the dolls sold out and a frustrated crowd fanned out across the store in search of a substitute. "Complete madness," said a 16-year-old, Ray Robinson, who snatched one of the last Elmos.

Mr. Storch of Toys "R" Us said demand for the furry red doll had exceeded the chain's wildest projections and tested Mattel's manufacturing capacity. "We'll get more," he said.

In cities like Chicago, Washington and St. Louis, yesterday was the beginning of the first holiday shopping season without storied local chains like Marshall Fields, Hecht's and Famous-Barr, which have all become Macy's. Consumers still showed up for the early-morning discounts, albeit grudgingly.

"I had sworn to myself that I wouldn't cross the doorstep and come in here," said one Chicago resident, Marilynne Felderman, 61, a longtime Marshall Field's shopper, standing inside the chain's elegant State Street store, now a Macy's. "But here I am" — encouraged, no doubt, by deals like a five-piece luggage set for $49.99.

To take advantage of yesterday's discounts, shoppers hatched elaborate strategies, drawn up on maps and in spiral-bound notebooks.

Stefanie Brooker, 41, slept over at the home of her friend, Michelle Wolfe, 43, so the pair could draw up a battle plan for hitting Best Buy, Kohl's, Linens 'N Things and Toys "R" Us near Columbus. Yesterday morning, the two operated under strict instructions: "Once we get started," Ms. Brooker said, "no one's allowed to eat, drink or go to the bathroom until we are done."

Clicking With Cyber Monday (WSJ)

By Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Black Friday has come and gone. Now the online-shopping frenzy can begin in earnest.

The Monday after Thanksgiving -- dubbed Cyber Monday by the National Retail Federation -- is one of the year's busiest online-shopping days. This year, it kicks off a period of fierce competition among online merchants and traditional retailers' Web sites that promises shoppers more, and sometimes novel, ways to trim their holiday bills.

The number of online shoppers is expected to rise to nearly 115 million this holiday season, up 6% from a year ago, according to New York market-research firm Jupiter Research, and retailers are trying to capture their attention with a steady stream of deals.

With so many players one-upping each other with discounts and promotions, consumers can expect to find a broader range of prices online on any one item -- from digital cameras to luxury cashmere sweaters -- than they could by visiting dozens of stores.

Among the deals this year: online-only sales, rotating daily offers, and heavy doses of exclusive coupons and shipping upgrades targeted to repeat purchasers and email subscribers. Online-payment services, like PayPal and Google Checkout, are offering new incentives for using their services. Search engines that search for products across a broad range of retailer Web sites are brandishing new tools to help shoppers become more savvy.

These promotions come at a critical time of the year. Consumer spending in November and December last year was nearly 20% of the annual total, according to the Commerce Department. As high-speed Internet access proliferates and the number of online merchants continues to grow, Jupiter Research forecasts U.S. online holiday sales will reach $32 billion this year, up 18% from 2005. Americans will spend an average of $791.10 each on holiday merchandise this year, according to Shop.org, a division of the National Retail Federation.

Yet shopping online can cause additional costs and headaches. While more retailers offer free shipping, many do so only above certain thresholds, meaning it still may be wise to head to the store and avoid the temptation to unnecessarily boost your online order. Technical glitches and slow page-loading, while becoming less common, can still stall the process, particularly during peak traffic times. Online shoppers also open themselves up to the possibility of "phishing" attacks -- when scam artists pose as legitimate businesses -- and other forms of fraud.

Leading this year's online land grab are brick-and-mortar retailers, including Circuit City Stores Inc. and Gap Inc. They are turning heavily to Web-exclusive deals (up to 30% off winter accessories at Gap.com) to get customers to use their sites not only to research products but purchase them, too. To drive more traffic to its newly redesigned home page, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Monday will begin running online-only specials on items like flat-screen high-definition televisions, which it will be offering for less than $800, and digital cameras, which will be priced under $50.

To keep up with the discounting, established online retailers and smaller players are getting more creative, rapidly refreshing the deals and discounts they offer on their sites.

Seattle's Amazon.com Inc., which captured 14% of visits to the top 100 retail Web sites in October, according to research firm Hitwise, plans a new promotion every week for the next several weeks. In a further twist, customers get to vote on which promotion is offered, with four choices every week. Options currently include deals on items ranging from DVD players to diamond earrings.

Other retailers are offering a different deal every day. Petco Animal Supplies Inc. will start posting Web-only deals on Petco.com, including 25% off personalized dog collars, starting on Dec. 1. A different deal will be offered daily in each of six pet categories. Home Depot Inc. will soon switch on a "Hammer Drop" feature with a different deeply discounted item posted on its site every day, such as $70 off a set of tools originally priced at $649.

Traditional shopping search engines, which once displayed little more than a hodgepodge of deals combed from the Web, are getting more useful.

Yahoo Inc.'s Yahoo Shopping service now allows shoppers to sort merchandise by free shipping and other deal types. And a new breed of search engine, such as Become Inc.'s Become.com, TheFind Inc.'s TheFind.com and Mpire Inc.'s Mpire.com, offer such features as Zip code-based tax and shipping calculators and graphs that chart historical price information on the item you are searching for, to help predict whether it's likely to rise or fall.

Consumers also can find new deals through online-payment services. EBay Inc.'s payment unit PayPal is doling out rebates to members who use the service during the holiday season on certain Web sites. It also is partnering with selected merchants to give free shipping to those who use the service through Dec. 15. Google Inc.'s Google Checkout, a new service that stores credit-card and billing information to speed purchase time, is joining with some of its merchants, like Timberland, Ace Hardware and Sports Authority, to offer discounts.

Shoppers who lack the time to tune in to their favorite sites regularly now have more ways to ensure that the deals come directly to them. Home Depot, FAO Schwartz Inc. and Discovery Communications Inc.'s Discovery Channel Store are experimenting more aggressively with email marketing, offering exclusive deals like free-shipping and percentage-off coupons to those who provide their email addresses.

Jackie Andrews, a deputy court clerk from Hampton, Va., has spotted a bunch of online steals by subscribing to the email lists of retailers like Circuit City. Last year, after the electronics retailer told her about online holiday deals on MP3 players, she purchased one for her husband for less than $40. As a result, Ms. Andrews, 48 years old, plans to do more than half of her holiday shopping online this year, particularly because she can avoid lines at stores.

Some retailers are partnering with alternative-payment options, which often charge merchants lower fees than credit cards and are more widely accepted this year. EToys Direct Inc., an online toy merchant, reserves special promotions on eToys.com for customers who use Bill Me Later, a deferred-payment option accepted at some 425 online retailers. In the past few weeks, Bill Me Later, a unit of I4 Commerce Inc., launched a shopping engine that allows consumers to search for a particular product across merchants that accept the payment service.

But experts still warn that credit cards, which protect users from fraudulent charges, are the safest way to shop, particularly during the holiday season, when the risk of being scammed rises.

Stocks Weaken As Dollar's Fall Chills Investors (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

As shoppers hit stores in the post-Thanksgiving tradition, the stock market was rattled by a decline in the U.S. dollar, spurred in part by uncertainty about the economy's health.

Now, investors are looking ahead to economic data due out in the coming week for answers.

Capping a slow holiday-shortened week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average on Friday closed down 46.78 points, or 0.4%, at 12280.17, but still up 15% this year. The blue-chip average lost 62.39 points, or 0.5%, for the week, ending two consecutive weeks of gains.

The Dow industrials were down as much as 60 points in early trading following news of the dollar weakness against the euro. In late trading Friday in New York, the euro reached $1.3097, its highest level against the dollar in 20 months. Against the yen, the dollar fell to 115.81 yen from 116.74. The U.S. currency is now off 9.6% against the euro so far this year and down 1.8% against the yen.

Contributing to Friday's downturn were jitters about Friday's retail sales, said Charles Lieberman, chief investment officer at Advisors Capital Management in Paramus, N.J., though early data were limited. A fuller picture is due from retailers next week.

Among retail-company stocks, Best Buy fell 1.4% Friday and Target lost 1.2%. Home-improvement retailers also declined, with Lowe's down 1.1% and Home Depot off 1%.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 5.14 points, or 0.4%, to 1400.95, nearly flat for the week and up 12% this year. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite fell 5.72 points, or 0.2%, to 2460.26, up 0.6% for the week and 12% for the year-to-date.

Stocks could continue to suffer for a time if retailers disappoint, said Romeo Dator, co-manager of All American Equity Fund at U.S. Global Investors in San Antonio, but he expects strong holiday sales overall. "We have pretty lofty expectations on consumer spending for Christmas," he said.

Slightly more than 514.7 million shares changed hands at the New York Stock Exchange in a shortened day on Friday, about a quarter its usual volume. (Overall, 853.4 million shares of NYSE-listed stocks traded.) Analysts warned that such low activity can create volatility, making it difficult to gauge the market's true direction. "I wouldn't want to take and interpolate today's action too much," said Mr. Dator. Citing a prolonged rally that has left the Dow up 15% on the year, he said, "In overbought conditions, any pullback is welcome."

Though a weaker dollar can raise fears of inflation and higher interest rates, Treasury-bond prices rose, and yields, which move in the opposite direction, fell.

Commodities prices rose, as they often do when the dollar falls. In electronic trading, gold futures climbed $9.60 to $638.60 an ounce and crude-oil futures rose 66 cents to $59.90 a barrel. Regular pit trading for both commodities was closed Friday.

The outlook for economy could become much clearer next week. Reports are due on sales of new and existing homes, consumer confidence, manufacturing activity, durable-goods demand and personal spending and income.

"Next week's numbers will go along way in determining whether or not the rally will continue into the final month of the year," Robert Pavlik, chief investment officer at Oaktree Asset Management, wrote in a note to clients.

But the month's biggest economic report -- the Labor Department's reading of November unemployment and nonfarm payrolls growth -- won't be released until the following week, meaning some investors might stay cautious a little while longer.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell. On the NYSE, 1,673 stocks rose and 1,416 declined.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note was up 3/32, or 93.8 cents per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.55%. The 30-year bond rose 7/32 to yield 4.63%.

The dollar weakened. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.3097 from $1.2938 late Thursday, and the dollar fell to 115.81 yen from 116.74.

Dollar Falls Sharply Against Euro As Economies Appear To Diverge (WSJ)

By Joanna Slater, Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The dollar fell sharply, breaking out of a recent tight trading range and hitting a 20-month low against the euro, spurred by concerns that the U.S. economy is slowing just as Europe's is revving up.

Late Friday in New York, it took $1.3097 to buy one euro, compared with $1.2942 a day earlier in global trading. The dollar's weakness also weighed on stocks, which fell in New York Stock Exchange trading in an abbreviated Thanksgiving holiday session.

Over the past week, data released in the U.S. and Europe have solidified perceptions that the two regions may be headed in opposite economic directions.

This coming week will be pivotal as trading levels return to normal and traders grapple with a raft of new data -- including U.S. durable-goods orders and consumer-spending figures -- looking to see if more evidence surfaces that the U.S. economy is slowing.

Signs that the U.S. and European economies are diverging will be good news for the rising euro, say observers. "It could be the start of something big," says Ken Wattret, chief euro zone economist at BNP Paribas in London. The euro's high against the dollar is $1.36, which it hit in December 2004.

Interest-rate expectations in the U.S. and Europe helped propel the latest currency swing. Some financial-market participants believe that the U.S. Federal Reserve could cut interest rates early next year, while the European Central Bank is widely expected to raise its key interest rate by another quarter point, to 3.5%, at its Dec. 7 meeting. Now markets are eager to see whether comments by ECB President Jean-Claude Trichet indicate that a further rate increase is possible in early 2007.

The dollar's recent drop took place amid widespread feeling among investors that the currency was due to weaken. Market watchers who are pessimistic on the dollar's prospects say the size of the U.S. current-account deficit is unsustainable and central bankers elsewhere in the world are debating whether to hold less of their reserves in dollars.

The U.S. Federal Reserve's pause in interest-rate hikes also has undermined support for the dollar, since higher interest rates make dollar-denominated assets, like bonds, more attractive to foreign investors.

Still, the dollar's newfound weakness is unlikely to raise alarms in Washington. The past week's sharp move has not triggered notable selling of other U.S. assets, a move that would be evidence of a more damaging loss of confidence in the dollar. Treasury bond prices rose slightly Friday and their yields, which move in the opposite direction of prices, declined. That suggests the dollar's drop is mostly a response to expectations that softer U.S. growth relative to Europe will lead to lower U.S. interest rates relative to Europe's.

In fact, the administration has privately welcomed the dollar's slow decline as one way of beginning to address the huge U.S. trade deficit. A weaker dollar generally makes U.S. goods more competitive against foreign products.

Currency analysts say the speed and size of the dollar's recent fall wasn't precipitated by a particular piece of economic news. "The magnitude of the move was triggered more by momentum than by a specific economic event," said Matthew Strauss, senior currency strategist at RBC Capital Markets in Toronto.

The dollar's slide against the euro is also affecting its relationship with Asian currencies, although not to the same degree. Japan's yen has appreciated against the dollar in recent days, for example.

If the dollar's weakness persists, investors should watch for Asian central banks intervening in the foreign-exchange market to prevent their currencies from appreciating too much, says Marc Chandler, global head of currency strategy at Brown Brothers Harriman.

U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has largely maintained a hands-off attitude toward the dollar, in keeping with the administration's belief that exchange rates are best set by competitive markets and not by verbal or real government intervention.

"I'd expect to see the dollar temper somewhat against ... the other reserve currencies in the world, and I think Treasury would be glad to see that happen because it would be in line with economic fundamentals," said Grant D. Aldonas, who early on in the administration spearheaded its China economic policy as undersecretary of commerce for international trade.

That said, in the case of China the U.S. has explicitly called for a stronger yuan -- and therefore a weaker dollar. Treasury officials believe that a stronger Chinese currency will do little to narrow the trade gap, but they hope that pressing China to allow the yuan to rise will quiet Beijing bashers in Congress who argue that the artificial weakness of the yuan hurts U.S. companies and workers.

Nonetheless, the recent slide in the dollar doesn't appear to have much to do with U.S. pressure on China or with expectations that Mr. Paulson's trip to Beijing next month will spark a sudden Chinese revaluation, according to Mr. Aldonas.

Dollar Falls Sharply Against Euro And Pound (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters, Carter Dougherty

The dollar dropped sharply yesterday against a range of major currencies, with the euro breaking through $1.30 for the first time in a year and a half. The fall highlighted concerns about softness in the American economy as economies abroad continue to expand.

The currency sell-off came as investors weighed a number of issues that complicate the prospects of the United States in the coming months, including a huge trade imbalance with China and a slowing domestic housing market. On top of that, economic growth in some European countries is gaining momentum, threatening to siphon investment away from the dollar.

The dollar's losses came in a thin trading day in which the British pound rose to its strongest value against the dollar in two years. The euro traded at $1.3079 yesterday afternoon, up from $1.2941 on Thursday. The pound was trading at $1.9317, up from $1.9156.

Stocks closed lower on Wall Street yesterday after a shortened holiday trading session that was soured by news of the dollar's woes.

"To dismiss this as a technical correction is to overlook the structural reasons why the U.S. dollar is having a very hard time these days," said Hans Redeker, global head of currency strategy at BNP Paribas in London.

Economists say the United States is in a vulnerable position compared with its global competitors. While the most recent data show that the trade imbalance tightened in September, the decline was largely a result of falling oil prices. The deficit between what Americans import and export was a negative $586.2 billion for the first nine months of the year, and it remains on track to break last year's record of a negative $716.7 billion. The biggest chunk by far represents imports from China.

The trade gap will be one of the major issues that Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. and other top Bush administration officials discuss next month when they travel to China. Mr. Paulson, along with a delegation that will include Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, is expected to press Chinese officials on a number of economic issues, from cracking down on piracy to allowing the Chinese yuan to trade more freely in currency markets.

Analysts said that the dollar's drop yesterday, which was accelerated by orders from traders to sell automatically once it fell past $1.30 against the euro, reflected a growing anxiety over Chinese economic policy. China's central bank holds a large amount of American currency, and speculation has intensified recently that it could begin selling off dollars to avoid being burned if the dollar collapses.

Also lurking behind the dollar's depreciation is the rising probability, in the view of some economists and currency investors, that a slowing American economy will force the Federal Reserve to begin cutting borrowing costs next year.

Against the backdrop of a European Central Bank that seems determined to tighten rates further next year, the appeal of dollar-denominated assets is falling as the prospect of higher returns in Europe rises.

"There can be no doubt that the E.C.B. has more shots in its gun," said Erik Nielsen, chief Europe economist at Goldman Sachs in London. "If the Fed starts cutting next year, then the gap begins to widen."

Already, the European Central Bank has signaled that it will raise rates by a quarter percentage point, to 3.5 percent, on Dec. 7, and bank watchers have been voicing rising expectations of more rate increases after that.

This week, data on German business confidence, French economic growth in the third quarter and a historically reliable gauge of business sentiment in Belgium all pointed toward stronger growth. All these factors are more likely than not to push the European bank to raise interest rates in a bid to head off inflation, a course of action that would damp the appeal of the dollar in relation to the euro, currency specialists said.

"This drop in the dollar has been justified for some time," said Chris Turner, head of foreign exchange strategy at ING Baring in London. "The American economy could do more than simply land softly, and Europe is pretty strong right now."

But there was no single event yesterday to touch off such a sharp drop in the value of the dollar. Rather, economists said, it was a culmination of recent signs of weakness in the American economy that investors found troubling. Some experts said that could suggest that the dollar's losses would deepen.

Julian Jessop, chief international economist for Capital Economics in London, said in a research note yesterday that the sudden drop in the dollar was "an indication of a much more fundamental lack of support for the currency." He said this suggests that "the falls will be all the larger once the markets do start to anticipate persistently sluggish growth."

Markets Rocked By Sharp Slide In Dollar (FT)

By Neil Dennis, Chris Giles, Ralph Atkins

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

A sharpening slide in the US dollar unnerved global markets on Friday as investors sought to protect themselves from the possibility of sustained dollar weakness.

As US markets were closing on Friday , the euro stood at a 19-month high of $1.309, up 1.2 per cent, while sterling gained 0.9 per cent to a 1½-year peak of $1.9333. The yen climbed 0.5 per cent to ¥115.66.

European and Asian stock markets suffered the fallout from the dollar's decline with exporters to the US the worst performing stocks in all regions. But on commodity markets, dollar-denominated prices tracked higher as gold, copper and oil became cheaper in other currencies.

The euro's strength could put the European Central Bank under fresh political pressure not to raise interest rates again after the expected quarter percentage point rise to 3.5 per cent on December 7.

The dollar has now fallen this year by more than 10 per cent against the euro and 12 per cent against sterling. Some economists suggest the greenback has further to slide given a weak economic outlook in the US, and the prospect of interest rate cuts there next year.

Steve Saywell, currencies analyst at Citigroup, said: "While the economic data remain soft, the dollar will continue to fall."

The gaping US trade deficit, the near certainty of a December rise in eurozone interest rates, rising expectations of a cut in US rates in the spring and wariness about borrowing in yen to finance investments in the US all continued to weigh on the dollar, analysts said.

These concerns were heightened by comments from Wu Xiaoling, deputy governor of the People's Bank of China, indicating her unease at the rapid build-up of $1,000bn of reserves in China. She said Asian foreign exchange reserves were at risk from the dollar's fall, although she stopped short of indicating that China was about to stop adding to its pile of reserves.

"The dollar is coming under real pressure and this looks like the beginning of a sustained move," said Ian Stannard, strategist at BNP Paribas.

Equities markets in Europe and Asia fell sharply. Tokyo's Nikkei 225 fell 1.1 per cent to 15,734.6, while the FTSE Eurofirst 300 shed 0.8 per cent to 1,451.05.

DOJ_NMG_0098491

Commodities tracked higher, with gold climbing 1.2 per cent to $638.50 a troy ounce, while copper added 2.5 per cent to $7,155 a tonne. Nymex crude gained 1.1 per cent to $59.90.

Housing Falling Behind On Payments (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

While economists debate whether the U.S. housing slump is almost over or just getting started, one corner of the market is showing rapid deterioration: Many recent subprime borrowers are falling behind on their payments.

The latest snapshot of the housing market will come Tuesday, when the National Association of Realtors is due to report on October sales of previously occupied homes. Thomas Lawler, a housing economist in Vienna, Va., believes the Realtors will report a decline in median prices of as much as 5% from a year before. On Wednesday, the government will issue its monthly report on new-home sales.

So far, the economy has weathered the housing downturn with few problems. Rising incomes and stock prices, low interest rates and falling energy costs have helped consumers cope with the psychological blow of declining home prices in many parts of the country. The more bullish analysts believe house prices will start rising again before the end of 2007.

Even if the housing downturn is brief, though, the pain will linger for people who borrowed too heavily to buy homes near the top of the market. David Liu, an analyst at UBS AG in New York, released a report this past week on a worrisome trend in subprime mortgages, those for people with blemished credit histories. As of Oct. 31, borrowers were 60 days or more behind in payments on nearly 4% of the subprime home loans packaged into mortgage securities this year. That's about twice the delinquency rate on new subprime loans recorded a year earlier.

The weak housing market makes life tougher for subprime borrowers. If they run into financial trouble, it's no longer so easy to sell their homes for enough money to repay the loan, meaning more face foreclosure. Mr. Liu also blames looser credit policies by lenders trying to make up for shrinking profit margins by offering more loans to riskier borrowers. Some of the worst performances are coming on the types of mortgages that don't require borrowers to document their income and assets -- known colloquially as "liars' loans."

Delinquent subprime loans are particularly common in cities like Detroit, which has been hit by huge job losses. But they're also above the national average in such metro areas as Boston, Sacramento and San Diego, where home prices have been falling after huge leaps in the first half of this decade, Mr. Liu found. "California is no longer a safe haven" for mortgage lenders and investors, he says.

Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com, says losses on foreclosures and regulatory pressure will make lenders more cautious. That's unlikely to cause a recession, he says, but it will help restrain housing demand in the next couple of years.

Missed Mortgage Payments Rise 20% In Third Quarter (NYT)

By Christine Haughney

In the third quarter of this year, the number of city residents who had missed more than three months of mortgage payments jumped by 20 percent compared with the same quarter a year ago. Still, New Yorkers often have more time to try to hold onto their homes than homeowners in the rest of the country.

Data collected by PropertyShark .com, a real estate data company based in Brooklyn, shows that 1,468 city homeowners missed mortgage payments from July to September, compared with 1,220 in the comparable period last year. That puts them in what is commonly known as preforeclosure, when banks typically warn people that they are at risk of foreclosure so the homeowner will take steps to catch up on the payments. But while more homeowners are in the danger zone, more have also been able to avoid foreclosure. In New York City, lenders foreclosed on 425 homes in the third quarter of 2006, compared with 545 in the year-ago period. (The city has 3,018,000 homeowners.)

John McIlwain, a senior fellow for housing at the Urban Land Institute, a nonprofit planning and research group in Washington, said of the jump in preforeclosures, “It’s a warning sign, but it’s not yet a serious problem in terms of the market.”

The neighborhoods with the highest number of preforeclosures are in Brooklyn and Queens. The Canarsie and Flatbush neighborhoods of Brooklyn had the largest number last quarter, with 37. Elsewhere in Brooklyn, Bedford-Stuyvesant had 32 preforeclosures and East New York had 31. Jamaica, Queens, had 31 preforeclosures. The same neighborhoods had the most preforeclosures the year before.

State laws give New Yorkers an advantage over homeowners elsewhere. According to PropertyShark's chief executive, Ryan Slack, New York courts typically consider the buyer of the property to be the owner, while California treats the bank that holds that mortgage as the owner.

Banks in California can foreclose on a property and take it back in roughly seven months, but banks in New York have to go through a legal battle that can take more than two years.

That means that New Yorkers have more time to find ways to hold onto their homes.

"There are a lot of things you can do between the time you stop paying your mortgage and the time they can take it away from you," Mr. Slack said.

Homeowners in Manhattan are less likely than those in other boroughs to lose their homes because they have often put up more money and because they can use the rising values of their homes as bargaining chips with lenders, Mr. McIlwain said.

Because Manhattan homeowners have amassed considerable resources to break into the condominium or co-op market in the first place, they can usually make their mortgage payments even if they lose their jobs or suffer an illness, he said. With divorce, those are the leading causes of foreclosure, he said.

"There's just a lot more flexibility there," Mr. McIlwain said. "People — instead of going to delinquency or foreclosure — can sell their property and avoid the mark on their credit. There's also an ability to take out an equity loan."

In many cases, banks warn homeowners that they are falling behind, in hopes of giving them time to catch up on their payments.

Last year, Guillermina Edwards, a 50-year-old bookkeeper, missed mortgage payments on the Flatbush home he has owned for 20 years when he had to pay for airline tickets and a funeral after a relative died abroad.

In December 2005, he was placed in preforeclosure, but as soon as he caught up with his payments, he said, the bank left him alone.

"They're just harassing you," he says. "I didn't refinance or anything. You just pay back the months that you owe."

Pension Plan In Ontario Is Buying Ports In U.S. And Canada (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

TORONTO, Nov. 24 (AP) — The Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan agreed to buy two marine container terminals in the New York area and two in British Columbia from Orient Overseas (International) for $2.4 billion.

The Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan, one of Canada's largest institutional investors, said the deal with Orient Overseas, based in Hong Kong, is still subject to Canadian and United States regulatory approvals.

The terminals involved are the New York Container Terminal on Staten Island and Global Terminal and Container Systems at Bayonne, N.J. The deal also includes TSI Terminal Systems' Deltaport and Vanterm facilities on Canada's Pacific coast.

Once the deal is completed, the terminals will nearly double the value of the plan's infrastructure and timber portfolio to $6.5 billion — about 8 percent of the plan's total assets.

"This acquisition represents solid, robust assets, has little vulnerability to market or economic vagaries and features a very attractive growth profile that we will support and will serve us well into the future," James Leech, senior vice president of Teachers' Private Capital, the pension plan's private investment arm, said in a statement.

Combined annual sales of the operations total approximately $500 million. The terminals include equipment to either load shipping containers onto ships from trucks or trains or unload them from ships for transport by land to their destinations.

Orient Overseas is part of a transport and logistics group that has offices in 58 countries.

The transaction is expected to be completed by the end of the first quarter of 2007, after receiving the necessary regulatory and shareholder approvals.

The Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan has $84 billion in assets under management and administers the pensions of Ontario's 163,000 elementary and secondary school teachers and 101,000 retired teachers.

Kremlin Critic's Death Unnerves Putin Opponents (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The death of a prominent Kremlin critic by radioactive poisoning in London, coming weeks after the killing of a well-known independent journalist in Moscow and the harassment of opposition politicians, is fueling fears that opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin could face even more pressure before a transfer of presidential power in 2008.

Mr. Putin denied the Kremlin played a role in the death of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko, which Mr. Putin called tragic. But at the same time, he accused his critics of a "political provocation."

In a letter released after his death Thursday evening, Mr. Litvinenko, who fled to Britain in 2000 to escape criminal charges in Russia, blamed a "barbaric and ruthless" President Putin for poisoning him in what Mr. Litvinenko said was an effort to silence critics. (Read his statement.)

"The risks are growing," said Vladimir Ryzhkov, an independent deputy in the lower house of Russia's Parliament who is frequently critical of the Kremlin. "For the first time in my political career I'm beginning to feel scared."

Mr. Litvinenko's death comes amid a deepening chill in relations with the West -- which has been uneasy with the Kremlin's steady tightening of control over Russian society -- and irritated by Moscow's foreign-policy moves. Moscow has frustrated Washington, for example, with its reluctance to take harsher moves to pressure Iran to give up its nuclear ambitions. Friday, Russia's Defense Ministry announced it was beginning deliveries of antiaircraft missiles to Iran, even as the U.S. and Europe have sought to isolate the government in Tehran.

At a news conference in Finland after a tense summit Friday with European leaders, Mr. Putin said, "A death of a man is always a tragedy, and I give my condolences to Mr. Litvinenko's loved ones." He added, "It's extremely regrettable that such a tragic event as death is being used for political provocation."

In Moscow, some senior Russian legislators called Mr. Litvinenko's death a publicity stunt organized to discredit the Kremlin. They suggested the perpetrator was Boris Berezovsky, a deposed Russian tycoon, now living in London, who has said he would like to overthrow Mr. Putin's government.

Mr. Litvinenko, 43 years old, told police he believed he had been poisoned Nov. 1 while investigating the October slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another critic of Mr. Putin's government.

Doctors in London were hampered in treating Mr. Litvinenko because they were unable to identify the poison used against him. After his death, health authorities said Mr. Litvinenko's body had been exposed to large amounts of radiation from a rare substance called polonium 210. The substance is harmless outside the body but highly toxic if ingested. Investigators from Britain's antiterrorist police found traces at Mr. Litvinenko's home and a sushi restaurant and hotel in central London he had visited shortly before he fell ill. (Read the Health Protection Agency's statement.1)

Polonium 210 had been used in the Soviet space program, and today has a few commercial uses, such as removing static electricity and measuring other forms of radiation. "It's hard to obtain," said Derek Lohmann, a research chemist. "You generally require a nuclear reactor to produce it."

U.K. Home Secretary John Reid held a meeting of the government's emergency committee Friday to discuss Mr. Litvinenko's death, and U.K. diplomats asked Russia's ambassador to provide all assistance necessary to the police probe. Mr. Putin pledged to cooperate fully.

Irina Khakamada, a Russian opposition leader, said the political environment in Moscow has become edgy particularly since the Politkovskaya murder. She said some question whether Mr. Putin is fully in control of his Kremlin entourage as they angle for power before the end of his presidential term in 2008. While some factions may try to gain power themselves, others are trying to curry favor or encourage him to defy the Russian constitution and stay on for a third term.

Mr. Litvinenko, a former colonel in Russia's security service, was a longtime irritant to Mr. Putin. He publicly accused his superiors of ordering him to kill Mr. Berezovsky in 1998. Later, Mr. Litvinenko spent nine months in jail from 1999 on charges of abuse of office.

He was later acquitted, but, facing a retrial, he sought asylum in Britain. There he wrote a book accusing Mr. Putin of coming to power by organizing a series of apartment bombings in 1999 that prompted Russia's invasion of Chechnya.

Sergei Dorenko, a Moscow-based journalist and friend of Mr. Litvinenko, said Mr. Litvinenko told him that the Kremlin in 2003 had offered him safety from prosecution if he were to return home, but that he would be killed if he stayed in London.

London Riddle: A Russian Spy, A Lethal Dose (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 24 — Radiation poisoning killed Alexander V. Litvinenko, the former Russian K.G.B. officer and foe of the Kremlin, authorities here said Friday, further complicating a case that has taken on all the mystery and menace of a political thriller.

From his deathbed, Mr. Litvinenko's family said, he had accused President Vladimir V. Putin of being behind his poisoning. Outside the hospital where he died late Thursday, alarm spread across London after the police found traces of radiation in three places the former spy had been: a sushi bar, a hotel and his North London home.

Scientists were astounded at the use of the rare and hard-to-produce substance, polonium 210, which is dangerous when breathed, injected or ingested. All the while, diplomats scurried to prevent the case from becoming an international incident.

The cause of his death was so unusual, so baffling and so chilling that a senior British official called it "unprecedented." The government called a high-level meeting restricted to the most senior ministers — codenamed Cobra — and the Russian ambassador was summoned to the Foreign Office. Rebutting the accusations of foul play, Russian officials hinted at a devious conspiracy to discredit President Putin.

The former agent's family, citing what they called a statement dictated by the dying Mr. Litvinenko, accused President Putin of a "barbaric and ruthless" murder — a charge the Russian leader promptly rejected. Mr. Litvinenko's father, Walter, also accused Russian authorities of responsibility, and said his 43-year-old son, who had been inquiring into the killing of a journalist in Moscow last month, was "killed by a little, tiny nuclear bomb."

But the British police said they were treating the case as an "unexplained death" — displaying some caution about calling it a murder inquiry.

Photographs of the dying Mr. Litvinenko showed him hairless and gaunt, wearing a green gown and lying in a hospital bed. Friends who visited him before his death said he had looked ghostly, far removed from the fit figure he presented just weeks ago. Developments in the case over the past week have tantalized Britons, confronting them with the notion that their land might have been used as a theater for sinister machinations more familiar in a James Bond movie.

Mr. Litvinenko's slow and inexorable death was among the most bizarre since Georgi Markov, a Bulgarian dissident, was murdered in London with a jab from a poison-tipped umbrella in 1978.

It is not the first time that modern-day Russia has been suspected in a prominent poisoning in a foreign land. Doctors said that the Ukrainian president, Viktor A. Yushchenko — who campaigned in 2004 to move Ukraine away from Russian influence and forge closer ties with the European Union — was poisoned with dioxin when he was running for office, leaving his face badly disfigured. Russia, as well as an array of Mr. Yushchenko's political adversaries, was suspected in the poisoning, but the matter was never resolved.

Word of a possible radiation attack, using what officials identified as polonium 210, a highly radioactive isotope, raised fears of contamination, though many Londoners seemed to take word of the official alert with a degree of stoicism, or even indifference, on a damp Friday evening.

"Spy Radiation: Major Alert," said a banner headline in The Evening Standard. Still, inured to such scares by acts of terrorism in their city, including the bombings in July 2005 by Islamic militants, many seemed to shrug off the news.

The police searched several locations that Mr. Litvinenko had visited in early November — the Itsu sushi bar on Piccadilly, his home in the white-collar Muswell Hill neighborhood of north London and the Mayfair Millennium Hotel near the American Embassy in Grosvenor Square — and said they had found radioactive traces at each of them. Television showed plainclothes officers carrying away a metal box and several tote bags of evidence from the Itsu restaurant.

At the Mayfair Millennium Hotel, where the lobby and bar were chock-full, the health and safety manager, Brian Kelly, seemed to play down the alarm. "If we had a radiation problem here, do you think my restaurant and bar would be so full of people?" he said.

The authorities said they were also trying to find nurses and other medical staff who had treated Mr. Litvinenko since he began to complain of an unspecified illness on Nov. 1, in case they had been contaminated.

Roger Cox, the director of the Health Protection Agency's center for radiation, chemicals and environmental hazards, said a large quantity of alpha radiation had been found in Mr. Litvinenko's urine. Referring to the effects of polonium 210, he said: "If that enters the body by ingestion, then it will rapidly track through the body and go to most major organs," causing "tissue damage characteristic of radiation."

It was not immediately known why it had taken so long for the source of Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning to become clear. Medical authorities denied earlier reports that Mr. Litvinenko had been poisoned by thallium, a toxic metal.

At a news conference on Friday, Dr. Pat Troop, the Health Protection Agency's chief executive, described Mr. Litvinenko's death as "an unprecedented event in the U.K., in that someone has apparently been poisoned by a type of radiation."

A British counterterrorism official said polonium 210 was a byproduct of the nuclear industry and is used in the production of antistatic materials. But in the form believed to have been used in the suspected poisoning, it would have required high-grade technical skills and a sophisticated scientific process to produce, probably within a nuclear lab.

The official, who spoke in return for anonymity because the case had not yet been resolved, declined to comment on efforts to locate possible sources of the substance. The investigation would be difficult for the police because, for instance, at the Itsu sushi bar "thousands of people will have passed through since he was there," the official said.

Mr. Litvinenko was a former operative in the K.G.B. who became a colonel in its successor organization, known by its Russian initials as the F.S.B. In the late 1990s, Mr. Litvinenko said publicly that he had been ordered to assassinate Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon, but had refused to do so. He fled to Britain and secured British citizenship earlier this year. In 2003, he wrote a book accusing the Russian secret service of orchestrating apartment house bombings in Russia in 1999 that led to the second Chechen war.

Since his illness became known last week, his friends have depicted his poisoning as an officially sanctioned reprisal for his criticism of the Kremlin and his efforts to investigate the fatal shooting of Anna Politkovskaya, a prominent Russian journalist.

Before news broke of the radiation poisoning, Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Mr. Litvinenko, read what was described as the former spy's deathbed statement, addressed largely to President Putin.

"You may succeed in silencing me, but that silence comes at a price," the statement read. "You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed."

"You have shown yourself to have no respect for life, liberty or any civilized value," the statement said. "May God forgive you for what you have done, not only to me but to beloved Russia and its people."

Mr. Litvinenko's death threatened to strain relations between Britain and Russia, but Britain sought to avert a major crisis. A Foreign Office official, who spoke in return for customary anonymity, said the Russian ambassador here, Yury V. Fedotov, was called to the Foreign Office on Friday and told that "police were pursuing their investigations and the situation was now more serious."

British officials wanted Russia to help the inquiry with any information it might have about the case, the official said.

Mr. Putin found himself on the defensive when he appeared in Helsinki, Finland, after a meeting with leaders of the European Union, as he had been when he traveled in Europe following the death of Ms. Politkovskaya.

He called Mr. Litvinenko's death a tragedy, but suggested that there was "no indication that it was a violent death," citing what he said was a British medical report. He called for an investigation and pledged the assistance of Russian authorities.

"I hope that the British authorities will not contribute to the fanning up of political scandals having no real grounds," he said in remarks televised in Russia.

Mr. Putin also brushed aside the significance of Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning, suggesting his death was being used for political purposes.

"Those who did it are not the Lord, and Mr. Litvinenko is not Lazarus," he went on. "It is regretful that even such a tragic event as the death of a human being is being used for political provocation."

Andrei Lugovoi, a former K.G.B. colleague who met Mr. Litvinenko in London, denied in a radio interview on Friday that he or a colleague, Dmitry Kovtun, had any part in poisoning him. Speaking on Ekho Moskvy, an independent Russian radio station, Mr. Lugovoi said that he and Mr. Kovtun had met Mr. Litvinenko at a hotel in London on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill, and had discussed business for 20 to 30 minutes.

"He did not order anything," he said. "We did not pour anything for him."

Mr. Lugovoi, now in Moscow, went on to stress that he did not believe Mr. Litvinenko suspected either man while he was ill, and that he had spoken with him on Nov. 7 and Nov. 13. "We had normal, regular conversations," he said. "Nobody accused anybody."

The British police said the investigation was being headed by the counterterrorism command, led by Peter Clarke, an officer normally associated with inquiries into Islamic terrorism.

In a statement on Friday, Mr. Clarke said no arrests had been made, but promised a thorough inquiry. He spoke after the government announced that it had held a meeting of its closed-door Cobra group of top ministers. The code stands for the somewhat more prosaic "Cabinet Office Briefing Room A" in Whitehall, where such gatherings are held.

While Mr. Litvinenko's friends have accused President Putin, the Russian leader's own supporters have hinted at a conspiracy of a different nature.

In Helsinki, where the poisoning overshadowed efforts to resolve disagreements on European-Russian relations, Mr. Putin's aide in charge of European affairs, Sergei V. Yastrzhembsky, said: "What is alarming is the eye-striking, excessive number of deliberate coincidences of high-profiling deaths of people who positioned themselves as opponents to the existing Russian government with international events in which the Russian president takes part."

He added that Russia faced "a well-orchestrated campaign or a plan to consistently discredit Russia and its leader," according to the Interfax news agency.

Radioactive Poison Killed Ex-Spy (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Peter Finn

LONDON, Nov. 24 -- Former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko was fatally poisoned by a radioactive substance, traces of which were found in his urine, at his home and at a London restaurant and hotel he visited the day he became ill, according to the British health department. It called the case "unprecedented" in Britain.

Authorities closed the restaurant and sealed off part of the hotel Friday as part of an emergency effort to trace the substance, polonium 210, and ensure that it does not harm other people. Litvinenko would have eaten, inhaled or received it through a wound, according to Pat Troop, chief executive of Britain's Health Protection Agency.

Coming after the mysterious poisoning of another prominent opponent of the Kremlin, Ukrainian politician Viktor Yushchenko, the death provoked accusations that Russia continues to use Cold War-style tactics to eliminate critics abroad. London was the scene of the 1978 assassination of a Bulgarian dissident who was killed by a jab from a umbrella tip bearing the toxin ricin.

Litvinenko blamed the Kremlin shortly before he died, according to friends and family members. "As I lie here I can distinctly hear the beating of wings of the angel of death," Litvinenko, 43, said in a dictated statement, according to friend Alex Goldfarb, who met reporters while accompanied by Litvinenko's tearful father.

"You may succeed in silencing one man but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life," the statement said. "May God forgive you for what you have done, not only to me but to beloved Russia and its people."

Kremlin and Russian security service officials have denied any involvement in the poisoning of Litvinenko, who fled to Britain in 2000 after publicly accusing the security service of involvement in the bombings of two apartment buildings in Russia in 1999 in which 300 people died. Litvinenko had been investigating the murder last month of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another critic of the Putin government.

Litvinenko's death complicated a summit in Helsinki between Putin and European Union leaders. Speaking there, the Russian president called Litvinenko's death a tragedy, expressing his condolences and pledging his country's cooperation in the investigation.

Addressing allegations that he had ordered the assassination to silence a troublesome critic, Putin said, "I hope the British authorities won't fuel groundless political scandals." He added, "It is a great pity that even such tragic things as human death are used for political provocations."

Putin questioned why Litvinenko's deathbed note had not been made public before he died. Putin also said there was no official finding that Litvinenko had been murdered. "As I know, the medical certificate of British doctors does not indicate that he died a violent death," Putin said. "It does not say that. Hence there is no reason for such talk at all."

Troop, the British health chief, said no autopsy had been conducted. She did not say why, but the BBC reported that "the delay is believed to be over concerns about the health implications for those present at the examination."

Roger Cox, another health agency official, told reporters that radiation emitted by the polonium had been detected in Litvinenko's urine.

John Henry, a toxicologist who was asked by Litvinenko's family to look into the case and who examined Litvinenko before his death, said the type of polonium involved is "only found in government-controlled institutions." In an interview, Henry called polonium 210 an "extraordinary poison" that is lethal in doses so small, "you can lose it on the point of a pin."

Henry, who took part in the investigation of the 2004 poisoning of Ukraine's Yushchenko, then opposition leader and now the president, said that polonium 210 "kills cell by cell" and that once it is administered, there's "absolutely nothing" that can be done to save the exposed person.

Peter Clarke, head of Scotland Yard's anti-terrorism branch, which is leading the investigation, said police are studying closed-circuit television surveillance footage of the places in central London that Litvinenko visited Nov. 1, the day he became ill.

In Friday interviews with Russian news media, a Russian man who met with Litvinenko that day said he had been questioned by British officials in Moscow and denied involvement in the case.

Andrei Lugovoy, a former Russian security agent, said Litvinenko called him and invited him to a meeting to discuss business contacts. He said that he and two other men, including one named Dmitry Kovtun, met with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel on Grosvenor Square near the U.S. Embassy.

He said Litvinenko did not eat or drink anything during their 20- to 30-minute meeting. "I'm surprised by how hysterically some are trying to tie me to this," Lugovoy said.

Police said Friday night that part of that hotel as well as the Itsu sushi restaurant that Litvinenko visited had been closed while the investigation continued.

From London to Moscow, people were trying to sort out who stood to benefit from Litvinenko's death.

Litvinenko's supporters say Putin benefits by eliminating a fierce critic. Kremlin defenders say it is not Putin, but rather the Russian leader's enemies who gain. The fierce anti-Putin circle in London, including exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, has seized on the poisoning as a way to smear Putin's reputation internationally, they said.

Nikolai Kovalyov, chairman of the veterans committee of the lower house of the Russian parliament, told the Interfax news agency: "Doubtlessly, it did not benefit Russia and its special services. . . . It is not in our interests at all."

Kovalyov, who once headed the Federal Security Service, the domestic successor to the KGB, added that other "defectors who did incomparably more harm to Russia than Litvinenko continue to live in the West safe and sound."

Putin Denies Role In Death Of Ex-spy (FT)

By Jimmy Burns, Stephen Fidler, Frederick Studemann

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

Vladimir Putin was on Friday forced into a public denial of responsibility for the death of the former Russian intelligence officer Alexander Litvinenko, after British authorities said the ex-spy had been poisoned by highly radioactive polonium 210.

The UK Foreign Office said it had raised the incident with the Russian ambassador after British authorities said they knew of no precedent for such a killing.

Litvinenko died in a London hospital on Thursday night, and a statement he is said to have dictated on Tuesday night blamed the Russian president.

"You succeeded in silencing one man but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life," said the statement, read publicly on Friday by a friend, Alexander Goldfarb. "You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed."

As Kremlin officials vigorously denied official Russian involvement, Mr Putin was forced to answer questions about Litvinenko's death while at an EU/Russia summit in Helsinki.

"There is no grounds for speculation of this kind," Mr Putin said, adding that talk of his government being involved "has nothing to do with reality". He expressed his sympathy for Mr Litvinenko's family, but added that he hoped Britain would not seek to create a "political scandal" over the death.

Mr Putin added: "As far as I understand from the medical statement, it does not say this was the result of a violence."

He also expressed doubts as to the authenticity of the declaration. He said he was "unclear" why, if the statement had been written while Mr Litvinenko was still alive, it had not been reported at that time.

In a rare televised appearance, a spokesman for Russia's SVR foreign intelligence service also reiterated its denials of responsibility. "Probably someone wanted to make a splash out of this, but it's difficult to say who," he said.

Last night, three places in London visited by Mr Litvinenko before he died – a restaurant, his home and sections of a hotel – were sealed off and police said they had found traces of the isotope at each location.

Polonium 210 emits 5,000 times more alpha radiation than radium and a microscopic dose can be lethal if ingested. It has a number of uses, including as nuclear bomb triggers, nuclear batteries and, more frequently, in static electricity eliminators.

The Soviet-era predecessor to Russia's intelligence services, the KGB, used radioactive substances to assassinate opponents, but British experts said they knew of no precedent for the use of polonium. In 1957, in an incident with reverberations in the Litvinenko case, the KGB tried to kill a defector, Nikolai Kholkhov, using radioactive thallium. He suffered horrific symptoms but he survived.

Andrei Nekrasov, a Russian film-maker and friend of Mr Litvinenko, said that his death was "clearly intentional - no doubt about that".

He said Mr Litvinenko was convinced it was the FSB, Russia's domestic intelligence service, that had killed him but that there was no proof. Mr Litvinenko had said that "they were threatening him" and that poisoning would be completely in their style.

Mr Nekrasov said that a recent law passed by the Duma allowing Russian intelligence to eliminate Russia's enemies abroad effectively gave licence to Mr Litvinenko's enemies. "They hated him for going public on all these issues," he said.

Poisoned Spy Blames Putin For His Death (AP)

By Jill Lawless, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

A rare radioactive substance killed an ex-KGB spy turned Kremlin critic, the British government said Friday. In a dramatic statement written before he died, the man called Russian President Vladimir Putin "barbaric and ruthless" and blamed him personally for the poisoning.

Putin, in Finland, offered his condolences for the death of Alexander Litvinenko and denied any involvement. He called the release of the deathbed statement a "political provocation" by his opponents.

Litvinenko died late Thursday at a London hospital after spending days in intensive care as doctors puzzled over what was causing his organs to fail and attacking his bone marrow and destroying his immune system.

Britain's Health Protection Agency said Friday that the radioactive element polonium-210 had been found in his urine, and the police said traces of radiation were found at Litvinenko's home and a ritzy hotel bar and sushi restaurant he visited on the day he became ill.

Police said they were treating the case as an "unexplained death" — but not yet as a murder.

The 43-year-old Litvinenko, who fiercely criticized Putin's government from his refuge in London since 2000, told police he believed he was poisoned Nov. 1 while investigating the October slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another critic of Putin.

Litvinenko's statement, read by his friend Alex Goldfarb to reporters outside the hospital, put the blame for his death squarely on Putin.

He accused Putin of having "no respect for life, liberty or any civilized value."

"You may succeed in silencing me but that silence comes at a price. You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed," the statement said.

"You may succeed in silencing one man but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life."

Goldfarb said Litvinenko dictated the statement before he lost consciousness Tuesday, and signed it in the presence of his wife, Marina.

Putin strongly denied involvement by his government.

"A death of a man is always a tragedy and I deplore this," the Russian leader said when asked about Litvinenko during a news conference after a meeting with European Union leaders.

Putin said the fact that Litvinenko's statement was released only after his death showed it was a provocation. "It's extremely regrettable that such a tragic event as death is being used for political provocation," he said.

At a meeting Friday with Russian Ambassador Yury Fedotov at London's Foreign Office, British diplomats asked Moscow to provide all assistance necessary to a police inquiry into the death, government officials said. Putin pledged to cooperate.

Home Secretary John Reid convened the British government's crisis committee Friday to discuss the death, a Cabinet Office spokeswoman said. Prime Minister Tony Blair's Downing Street office said he was in Scotland and did not attend.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the United States has sought information on the case from British authorities. "We have been told that they have no definitive conclusions and that they are conducting an investigation," Casey said.

The Health Protection Agency described poisoning with polonium-210 as "an unprecedented event."

"I've been in radiation sciences for 30-odd years and I'm not aware of any such incident," said Roger Cox, director of the agency's center for radiation, chemicals and environmental hazards.

The agency's chief executive, Pat Troop, said the high level of polonium-210 indicated Litvinenko "would either have to have eaten it, inhaled it or taken it in through a wound."

Troop said the agency was evaluating whether it was safe to perform an autopsy.

Peter Clarke, head of London's anti-terrorist police, said officers and military radiation experts were searching several locations in London. A police statement later said at least five locations were being checked, but did not identify two of them.

Traces of radiation had been found at Litvinenko's north London house, the sushi restaurant where he met a contact Nov. 1 and a hotel he visited earlier that day, Clarke said. The restaurant and part of the hotel were closed, with officers removing materials in heavy metal boxes.

Clarke said extensive tests by forensic toxicologists on behalf of police — which began before Litvinenko's death — had on Friday confirmed the presence of polonium-210.

"There is no risk to the public unless they came into close contact with the men or their meals," said Katherine Lewis, a spokeswoman for the Health Protection Agency.

Experts said small amounts of polonium-210 — but not enough to kill someone — are used legitimately in Britain and elsewhere for industrial purposes.

Professor Dudley Goodhead, a radiation expert at the Medical Research Council, said that "to poison someone, much larger amounts are required and this would have to be manmade, perhaps from a particle accelerator or a nuclear reactor."

Chris Lloyd, a British radiation protection adviser, said it would be relatively easy to smuggle polonium into the country, because its alpha radiation would not set off radiation detectors.

Doctors treating Litvinenko had said Thursday that they could not explain his rapid decline. They discounted earlier theories that the father of three had been poisoned with the toxic metal thallium.

Lewis, the Health Protection Agency spokeswoman, said doctors had not discovered the presence of polonium-210 in Litvinenko earlier because hospitals do not normally test for the alpha-ray radiation it emits.

University College Hospital, where Litvinenko died, said Friday it could not comment further because the case was being investigated by police.

Litvinenko's friends had little doubt about who was to blame — Putin's regime.

They said the former spy, who sought asylum in Britain in 2000 and became a citizen, worked tirelessly to uncover corruption in Russia's Federal Security Service, the successor agency to the Soviet-era KGB, and unmask Politkovskaya's killers.

Litvinenko had worked for the KGB and then the Federal Security Service until he publicly accused his superiors in 1998 of ordering him to kill Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky. He spent nine months in jail on charges of abuse of office, but was later acquitted and moved to Britain.

In Moscow, pro-Kremlin legislators pointed at Berezovsky, who amassed a fortune in dubious privatization deals after the 1991 Soviet collapse but fled to London after falling out of favor with Putin. He has been a persistent critic of Putin and worked with Litvinenko.

Lawmakers questioned whether the two critics had a falling out and argued the Kremlin had nothing to gain from Litvinenko's death. "I think this is another game of some kind by Berezovsky," Valery Dyatlenko said on Channel One.

Litvinenko's father, Walter, said his son "fought this regime, and this regime got him."

"It was an excruciating death and he was taking it as a real man," Walter Litvinenko told reporters outside the hospital, his voice choked with emotion.

Goldfarb said the attack bore "all the hallmarks of a very professional, sophisticated and specialist operation."

Another friend, Andrei Nekrasov, said Litvinenko told him: "The bastards got me, but they won't get everybody."

Poisoning Of Ex-spy Ignites Health Scare (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella, Janet Stobart

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

LONDON — Counter-terrorism police investigating the mysterious death of a Russian spy-turned-dissident warned Friday of a potential public health hazard at two hospitals that treated him and three other locations where officials found traces of the radioactive material thought to have killed him.

On a day of dramatic revelations and accusations, authorities said they believed Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB agent and a fierce critic of Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, died Thursday night from a lethal dose of polonium-210, a radioactive substance that is deadly only if ingested.

Concern about danger to the public prompted meetings Friday of a government committee that responds to national emergencies such as terrorist attacks.

Contamination could result from direct contact with the dead man's bodily fluids, authorities said, or by swallowing polonium-210, inhaling it or absorbing it through an open wound. Investigators suspect the 43-year-old was poisoned Nov. 1, when he had meetings in central London at a sushi restaurant and a luxury hotel. Traces of the radioactive material have been found at both locations and his home in North London.

Health officials said they had worked overnight interviewing staffers at the hospitals that treated Litvinenko and were trying to determine the number of people at risk. The government appealed Friday night to anyone who ate at the restaurant Nov. 1 to contact health officials because they may have been contaminated.

"This is an unprecedented event in the U.K. in which someone has apparently been deliberately poisoned with a type of radiation," said Pat Troop, executive director of the Health Protection Agency, which advises the government on major health threats such as radiation and infectious diseases.

Three days before he died, an emaciated Litvinenko dictated a statement from his hospital bed in which he accused the Russian secret services of poisoning him, friends and family revealed at a news conference Friday.

Saying he heard the "beating wings of the angel of death," Litvinenko lashed out at Putin in the statement, read by his close friend Alexander Goldfarb.

"You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed," Litvinenko said in the statement. "You have shown yourself to have no respect for life, liberty or any civilized value. You have shown yourself to be unworthy of your office, to be unworthy of the trust of civilized men and women. You may succeed in silencing one man, but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life."

Putin, whose government has repeatedly denied involvement, responded quickly. At a summit of the European Union and Russia in Helsinki, Finland, he called the death a tragedy and expressed condolences to the family. But he warned against political manipulation and "provocation."

"I hope that British authorities will not assist in blowing up some kind of political scandals not based on real grounds," Putin said. "If need be, the Russian authorities, including investigators and the Russian prosecutor's office, will render all necessary assistance in the investigation."

A sensitive case

Scotland Yard's elite counter-terrorism unit is leading the investigation. The case is politically delicate, in part because Russian spy agencies have been accused or implicated in previous attacks on opponents, some of whom were poisoned.

A British official knowledgeable about the case, who asked not to be identified, said police conducted in-depth interviews of the hospitalized Litvinenko, four or five sessions lasting about four hours each. In addition, they are reconstructing his movements through interviews of witnesses and analysis of footage from London's widespread surveillance camera network, Deputy Assistant Commissioner Peter Clarke, head of the Counter Terrorism Command, said in a statement.

Police have assembled a detailed picture of the dead man's life, the first British official said. They have not ruled out any theories, some of which are as convoluted and murky as Russia's political underworld, the official said.

In contrast to the victim's deathbed accusations against Putin, Russian leaders alleged Friday that exiled Russian "oligarch" Boris Berezovsky, a rival of Putin and ally of Litvinenko, may have engineered the plot to discredit the Kremlin.

Moreover, police have not discounted the possibility that Litvinenko, a veteran of an intelligence culture steeped in the use of poisons, somehow ingested the substance while handling it, the British official said.

"They are not ruling out anything," the official said. "Our police are good and they will follow it wherever it goes. But they are not going to be affected by political pressure to go in only one direction. There are things that came up in the investigation of his life that don't point all in one direction."

Whoever the mastermind may be, the amount of the traces found at the restaurant and the relatively open form in which food is prepared and served at sushi bars are among factors making it likely that the poison was slipped into the victim's food there, the official said.

It is also possible that Litvinenko was poisoned before the two meetings and left traces of the material at the location because it had gotten onto his hands or clothes, the official said.

The culprit had to be an expert. It is difficult to obtain polonium-210 and to employ it as a weapon, said Sally Leivesley, a security and terrorism advisor interviewed Friday by the BBC.

"It's not only a weapon of assassination, it's also a weapon of terror," Leivesley said. "Let's remember what happened with our victim, who has had an unfortunate and absolutely ghastly death.

DOJ_NMG_0098502

"What we're seeing is a very measured dose, so the understanding of the people who did this is absolutely acute…. If it had been too high, he would have gone into convulsions on the spot and he would have died immediately. If it had been too low, very fortunately he would have been able to recover, but perhaps been quite ill in the long term."

Victim's day

On Nov. 1, Litvinenko ate lunch at the Itsu sushi bar in the bustling Piccadilly area with Italian security analyst Mario Scaramella, who had come to London to discuss with him the killing in Moscow last month of Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian investigative journalist. Litvinenko was investigating her death. Scaramella showed him a Russian security hit list of anti-government critics on which the names of both Politkovskaya and Litvinenko appeared, according to Litvinenko's accounts to journalists and friends.

Scaramella has denied any involvement and pledged full cooperation with police, saying that he now fears for his life.

After the meal with the Italian academic, officials said, Litvinenko had tea with two Russian men at the Millennium Hotel in Grosvenor Square, where the U.S. Embassy is located. One of the Russians was a former KGB officer, Andrei Lugovoy, and the other was referred to simply as Vladimir, according to Litvinenko's accounts.

Lugovoy, who now runs a private security company, has denied wrongdoing, according to an interview published Friday in the Times of London newspaper. He described himself as a business associate of the slain man and identified the third man as Dmitri Kovron, a businessman, according to the Times. Lugovoy told the newspaper that Litvinenko had requested the meeting to discuss a British company interested in the Russian market, and that Litvinenko did not drink or eat anything during the afternoon conversation.

The sushi bar has been closed while it is searched for radioactive traces. Police said parts of the hotel also had been closed, but a hotel spokesman said all areas of the hotel were functioning normally Friday.

Litvinenko fell ill on the evening of Nov. 1 and was admitted to North London's Barnet General Hospital. His condition worsened, and Nov. 17 he was transferred to University College Hospital in central London, where he was kept under armed surveillance.

In interviews and exchanges with friends from his hospital bed, he said he was the victim of a poisoning.

Doctors named thallium or some kind of radiation poisoning as the cause of his illness, but were unable to pinpoint the substance that caused excruciating pain and a gruesome transformation as his hair fell out and his organs failed.

By Thursday morning, he had been resuscitated from cardiac arrest, and after several hours on a respirator and life-support machine, he died about 9:20 p.m.

The substance that killed him is a radioactive material that occurs naturally and is present in the environment and people in very low concentrations, officials said. It is used industrially for anti-static devices in factories.

Although it cannot penetrate skin, if ingested it can cause an increased cancer risk or, if the quantity is large enough, destruction of body tissues and organs, officials said.

The dissident's father, Walter, spoke tearfully Friday, saying his son displayed dignity and courage throughout his ordeal. He echoed his son's denunciation of the Kremlin.

"My son died yesterday, and he was killed by a tiny nuclear bomb," the elder Litvinenko said. "It was so small you could not see it. But the people who killed him have big nuclear bombs and missiles, and those people should not be trusted."

Russia Said To Deliver Arms To Iran (AP)

By Judith Ingram, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Russia has begun delivery of Tor-M1 air defense missile systems to Iran, a Defense Ministry official said Friday, confirming that Moscow would proceed with arms deals with Tehran in spite of Western criticism.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue, declined to specify when the deliveries had been made and how many systems had been delivered.

Ministry officials have previously said Moscow would supply 29 of the sophisticated missile systems to Iran under a $700 million contract signed in December, according to Russian media reports.

The United States called on all countries last spring to stop all arms exports to Iran, as well as ending all nuclear cooperation with it to put pressure on Tehran to halt uranium enrichment activities. Israel, too, has severely criticized arm s deals with Iran.

Tehran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but the United States and its allies suspect Iran is trying to develop weapons.

The U.N. Security Council, where Russia is a veto-wielding permanent member, is currently stalemated on the severity of sanctions on Iran for defying its demand to cease enrichment.

The Tor-M1 deal, involving conventional weapons, does not violate any international agreements.

Russian officials say the missiles are purely defensive weapons with a limited range.

According to the Interfax news agency, the Tor-M1 system can identify up to 48 targets and fire at two targets simultaneously at a height of up to 20,000 feet.

Russian media have reported previously that Moscow had conducted talks on selling even more powerful long-range S-300 air defense missiles, but Russian officials have denied that.

Lebanon's Crisis Worsens With Strike (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Lebanon's political crisis worsened Friday with government ministers fearing for their lives after the murder of one of their own, businesses on strike and Hezbollah renewing threats of protests.

Beirut was tense after several hundred supporters of the pro-Syrian Hezbollah briefly took to the streets on Thursday night, burning tires and blocking the road to the airport until the Islamic militant group's leader ordered them home.

Tuesday's assassination of Interior Minister Pierre Gemayel, an anti-Syrian Christian leader, has added to Lebanon's political uncertainty. It has also reignited anger at Syria, which dominated Lebanon for nearly three decades but was forced to withdraw its troops last year over accusations it was behind Hariri's killing.

The U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora moved ahead with an issue that was likely to anger Hezbollah. The Cabinet was due to meet Saturday to give its final approval to a U.N.-created international court to try suspects in the February 2005 killing of former prime minister Rafik Hariri.

In a gesture toward the government and the anti-Syrian majority in parliament — which regard the U.N. court as a priority — Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah and parliament speaker Amal leader Nabih Berri said they supported the creation of the tribunal. But they accused their opponents of using the issue to block their demands for enough Cabinet seats to be able to veto decisions.

"We insist on our legitimate right to demand a real participation in the political decision-making," the two said a statement. They pledged to press their "demand by using all available democratic and legal means," a reiteration of threats to hold non-violent protests. When Nasrallah first demanded more Cabinet seats earlier this month, he said that Hezbollah would call demonstrations to bring down the government if its demands were not met. But those protests were called off following Gemayel's death.

Damascus has denied any role in the slayings of Hariri, Gemayel or four other anti-Syrian politicians over the past two years. But Syria suggested in a letter that circulated at the U.N. Friday that it may not cooperate with the international court, saying it was not consulted about the planned court.

An estimated 800,000 government supporters — a fifth of the population — turned out for Gemayel's funeral on Thursday, turning it into a political rally against Syria as Lebanon's ethnic groups faced their sharpest divisions since the 1975-90 civil war.

"Even at the height of the civil war, Lebanon has never witnessed this level of polarization among its sects, this kind of political mobilization and the crisis at such a dead end," wrote Sateh Noureddine, managing editor of the daily As-Safir.

Fearing a meltdown, business leaders called a two-day strike starting Friday to urge the rival leaders to "take national decisions ... engage in dialogue and stop making threats of street protests."

Factories, banks and financial institutions closed Friday. Though many small shops remained open, many schools shut down and traffic was thinner than normal on Beirut's usually bustling streets.

Underlining the atmosphere of fear following Gemayel's assassination, some Cabinet ministers are taking shelter in the government headquarters in downtown Beirut, although Cabinet Minister Ahmed Fatfat, speaking on Lebanese Broadcasting Corp. television, would not say how many ministers.

Efforts to break the deadlock — and even the outpouring of grief over the slaying of the young Christian politician — have failed to soften the entrenched positions.

Egypt and Saudi Arabia have mediated in recent days, apparently to no avail.

Hezbollah ignored a call by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora on Thursday night for it to resume dialogue and for six pro-Hezbollah members who quit his Cabinet to return to their posts. The six quit in protest just before the Cabinet gave its initial approval of the international tribunal, which is opposed by Hezbollah.

Pro-government groups have warned that more government ministers may be targeted for assassination, which could deny the Cabinet the legal two-thirds quorum of 16 needed to approve the court. The Cabinet now has 17 members following the Shiites' withdrawal and Gemayel's death.

Nabil Bou Monsef, a political analyst speaking on LBC TV Friday, said the latest events served as "a great red alert" to the country. "Tensions are flashing red."

Lebanon's Ominous Sense Of Deja Vu (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

BEIRUT — The Sunnis were lucky: The homemade bomb that exploded outside their little filling station in the early hours Friday didn't ignite the tanks of gasoline. Shrapnel smashed through the glass windows and metal shutters, but the lone employee was in the bathroom and nobody was hurt.

Shiite gangs roamed the surrounding streets that night, attacking any Sunni symbols they could find, including a mosque. All over Lebanon, Shiites were spoiling for revenge after seeing television footage of the funeral of assassinated Christian Cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel.

Mourners, including some Sunnis, had cursed Shiites and their leaders at the funeral. Afterward, Shiites turned their rage on the nearest Sunnis they could find. Sunnis fought back. A cycle of violence, with uncomfortable echoes of Lebanon's past, was getting underway.

"The country is headed for war," said Abbas Ismail, 50, a Sunni who works in the bombed gas station. He stood on a small concrete ledge as a sinking sun spilled long shadows over Beirut's southern suburbs. "People think we are going to face a civil war."

Brawls and vandalism with sectarian overtones have erupted in the Lebanese capital in recent days, especially where rival sects or political parties live side by side. Gangs roamed the streets, looking for a place to vent their rage.

The incidents are minor: insults shouted, rocks thrown at mosques, posters of sectarian leaders shredded. But they reveal a precarious mood. This is just the sort of low-level violence that has sparked clashes and fueled Lebanon's internal religious fighting for generations.

A political rift has grown steadily more serious. On one side is a government clinging precariously to existence; on the other, a Hezbollah-led opposition determined to grab a greater share of power.

With Hezbollah, a powerful Shiite party, and its allies threatening to stage massive protests to topple the government, there is mounting concern that street violence could give way to wider reprisals.

"Maybe it will start like this. It's very obvious — in 1975 it started like this," said Romel Sherri, a 34-year-old engineer, referring to the start of Lebanon's 15-year civil war. Like most people in Lebanon, Sherri was confident that his own group, Hezbollah, would behave itself, and skeptical about the intentions of its rivals.

"Hassan Nasrallah can control the street, but the others can't," he said, referring to the popular leader of Hezbollah. "They start throwing poison between the religions."

Against the backdrop of religious slaughter in Iraq, tensions are particularly thick between Lebanon's Sunni and Shiite Muslims. Members of both sects speak of a regional spillover, saying that news from Iraq, along with growing Arab anxiety over the rising influence of Shiite-ruled Iran, has worsened the animosities here.

"If we hear on the news at night that Shiites have been killed by Sunnis in Iraq, then they want to attack Sunnis here in Lebanon," said Ismail, the gas station employee. "It makes them hate us even more."

This is not the same Lebanon that slipped into civil war three decades ago, with the most glaring difference this: Instead of Christians fighting Muslims, the most heated divisions are emerging among rival Christians and, especially, between Sunnis and Shiites.

"It's much more among communities, internally, than between communities," said Fadia Kiwan, head of political science at Beirut's St. Joseph University. "The tension that is of concern to everybody now is the emergence of a Sunni and Shiite split. The situation is very critical."

Tensions also have flared between Christians who are still loyal to the government and the followers of Gen. Michel Aoun, a popular Christian leader who has forged an unlikely alliance with Hezbollah. The night Gemayel was killed, furious young men from the slain minister's Falangist Party attacked Aoun's posters and burned his militia flags in Beirut's Christian neighborhoods.

The tiny gas station that came under attack stands at the entrance to a small enclave of about 60 Sunni families. A ramshackle maze tacked together from cinderblocks and scraps of corrugated tin, their neighborhood is an impoverished island in a sea of Shiites.

These are the southern suburbs, indisputably Hezbollah's turf. But above a rusting fuel tank at the small gas station, Sunnis have tacked up a massive banner printed with the pictures of assassinated former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri; his son, parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri; and the elder Hariri's Sunni driver, who hailed from a nearby neighborhood and was killed in February 2005 along with his boss.

"Our eyes are on you," read the Arabic lettering swimming across a backdrop of Lebanese flags.

The massive poster is a sign of defiance. The younger Hariri has accused Syria of assassinating Lebanon's leaders, and is battling to establish an international tribunal to prosecute his father's killers. He is also locked in a political battle with Hezbollah, which has long been backed by Syria.

The gas station owners acknowledge that once Shiite customers notice the banner, they usually don't come back.

"If we take this picture down, it's humiliation for us," said Mohammed abu Ali, 45, a driver who lives in the neighborhood. "If the situation were calm, we'd take it down. But in times like these, we can't."

Hezbollah put out word Friday that it would go ahead with long-threatened street demonstrations meant to topple the government.

The date of the demonstrations will be a surprise, they said, but they might begin as early as Sunday. Shiites were already looking forward to showing off their numbers.

"We will stay in the streets," said Hassan Khodor, a Hezbollah official in the predominantly Shiite Beirut neighborhood of Zkak al Blat, "until the government resigns."

The Shiites from this neighborhood say that Druze, Christians and Sunnis rampaged in the streets Friday, shouting insults and ripping down posters of Nasrallah. The men of the neighborhood attacked the interlopers. The army had to wade into the brawl.

"They used to humiliate the opposition parties, Hezbollah and Amal. But now they are attacking the Shiites in general," Khodor said. "They even insulted our religious traditions. This amazed me."

Lebanon Death "May Presage Coup" (BBC)

BBC.com, November 25, 2006

This week's killing of Lebanese politician Pierre Gemayel may be the first shot in a coup against the government, says a top US official.

John Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, said recent probes into political killings in Lebanon suggested Syrian involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0098506

He told the BBC that if Syria was deemed to have been involved, the implications were serious.

Saturday sees the second day of a strike protesting at the killing.

Many shops closed on Friday with business leaders saying they hoped the action would move Lebanon closer to a "national dialogue" and ward off the threat of division and street protests.

Mr Gemayel, a Maronite Christian who was the industry minister, was shot in his car in a Christian area of Beirut on Tuesday.

Many Lebanese accuse Damascus of orchestrating the 34-year-old's murder, although Syria explicitly denies any involvement.

Speaking in a BBC interview, Mr Bolton said he did not want to pre-judge any investigation into Mr Gemayel's death.

Many Lebanese are still mourning Gemayel

Mr Bolton said that Washington would have to take such things into account when deciding whether to deal with Syria.

He said the Americans talked to the Syrians all the time - the issue was whether Syria was going to listen.

The Lebanese cabinet is due to meet on Saturday to approve a United Nations plan for an international tribunal to try those accused of murdering the former Prime Minister, Rafiq Hariri.

Syria has been implicated in the bombing that killed Mr Hariri last year, but denies involvement.

Correspondents say the Lebanese cabinet is expected to give its final approval to the tribunal, and this is likely to increase tensions with pro-Syrian politicians.

Earlier this month six pro-Syrian ministers resigned from the cabinet, saying they wanted a greater role in government.

The death or resignation of two more cabinet ministers would bring down the government.

Meanwhile, the UN Security Council has agreed to a request from the Lebanese government to help investigate Mr Gemayel's murder.

His killing will be probed by the same tribunal that implicated senior Syrian officials and pro-Syrian Lebanese in the killing of Mr Hariri.

Correspondents say the government is accusing Hezbollah of exploiting the delicate political situation in Lebanon to try and block the UN-backed probe into the Hariri killing.

Pro-Syrian groups have already said the UN plan is illegal under Lebanon's constitution.

In 2005, Syria withdrew its troops from Lebanon following 29 years of military and political rule over its smaller neighbour, after massive international pressure following the assassination of Mr Hariri.

Iran And Syria Helping Hizballah Rearm (TIME)

By Elaine Shannon

Time, November 24, 2006

Iran is smuggling weapons through Syria to re-arm Lebanese allies Hizballah, despite renewed efforts by United Nations peacekeepers and the Lebanese army to seal off the mountain borders with Syria in the wake of last summer's war between the Shi'ite militia and Israel, according to reports by Saudi and Israeli intelligence sources that have been confirmed by western diplomats in Beirut.

Israeli military officials in Tel Aviv say that Hizballah replenished nearly half of its pre-war stockpiles of short-range missiles and small arms. But western diplomats in Beirut say these calculations under-estimate the weapons flow and that Hizballah has now filled its war chest with over 20,000 short-range missiles -- a similar amount fo what they had at the start of the conflict, during which the group is believed to have fired over 3,000 rockets at Israel. "The Iranian pipeline through Syria was already working during the war," despite constant Israeli bombing raids on the roads into Lebanon from Syria, this Beirut source said. Officially, Syria and Iran deny that they're supplying weapons to Hizballah. As for the Shi'ite group itself, when asked about receiving a new shipment of arms from Syria and Iran, a spokesman told TIME, without elaborating, "We have more than enough weapons if Israel tries to attack us again."

Over the past three months, according to a knowledgeable Saudi source, Iranian Revolutionary Guard officers have been operating out of a military base on the outskirts of Damascus. The Iranian government has dispatched shipments of small arms and what appear to be missile components to this military base, according to the source. From the secret base, weapons have been shipped by truck across the border into Lebanon. Western diplomats say that the Lebanese army has posted over 8,000 troops along the border, forcing smugglers to use mountain passes instead of the heavily-monitored crossing on the main Beirut-Damascus road.

The Saudis, in particular, are alarmed at Iran's spreading influence in Lebanon. "There has been a serious increase in (Iranian and Syrian) activity in the rearming of Hlzballah," says Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security advisor who is managing director of the Riyadh-based Saudi National Security Assessment Project, a consulting group that advises the Saudi government. Obaid contends that "a huge stream of trucks" has been crossing the border from Syria into Lebanon, ferrying thinly disguised shipments of arms.

Moreover, Obaid says, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and Iran's Ministry of Intelligence and Security (MOIS) are using the Iranian embassies in Damascus and Beirut as command and control centers -- an allegation that was also confirmed to TIME by Israeli military sources. Obaid says there appear to be direct communications links between the Iranians and Hizballah, via Hizballah officers working inside the Iranian embassy in Beirut, and Iranian officers in the field with Hizballah fighters; in the past, some Middle East analysts have rejected the popular notion that Hizballah takes direct orders from Iran.

Iran's apparent efforts to destabilize Lebanon and to expand Shi'ite influence in Iraq and throughout the region are of major concern to the Saudi government, a leading power in the Sunni Muslim world that presumably would like to see the U.S. take a more active stance in Lebanon against its regional rivals. Obaid says that when Vice President Cheney visits King Abdallah bin Abd Al Aziz Al Saud Saturday in Riyadh, the Saudi king is expected to tell Cheney that "the Saudi leadership will not and cannot allow Iran, through Syria and Hizballah, to bring down the Lebanese government and overtake the levers of power in Beirut." Obaid says the Saudi king is also expected to discuss with Cheney the kingdom's worries about Iranian activity in Iraq and the Palestinian territories as well as its alliance with Syria.

All of the Iranian and Syrian activity is taking place against the backdrop of growing instability within Lebanon's government and Saturday's upcoming vote among government ministers to bring the assassins of the late Prime Minister Rafik Hariri before an international tribunal -- a process that is expected to implicate high-level Syrian officials. Hizballah pulled out of the country's coalition government recently after its push for greater representation was rebuffed; many observers viewed the push for effectve veto power as motivated by its concern that prime minister Fouad Siniora would try to begin the process of Hizballah's disarmament that was reaffirmed in the UN-brokered ceasefire that ended this summer's war. Moreover, some politicians in Beirut suspect that the assassination of Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel on Tuesday was plotted by Syria to scare cabinet ministers into voting against the international probe into Hariri's death by a massive truck bomb (other analysts argue the predictable fallout from the killing just ahead of such a crucial vote is precisely why Syria would not have ordered it). Saad Hariri, the prime minister's son and a supporter of the current government, told TIME, "Syria is waging a campaign of intimidation and assassinations to stop the tribunal."

If the Lebanese government approves of the tribunal, it will then go to the United Nations, which could slap an embargo on Syria. This process will drag on for months before it wends its way into the UN Security Council. Moreover, such a confrontational approach would run counter to the expected recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, commissioned by the White House, to engage with Syria. But after the assassination of Pierre Gemayel the notion of US talks with Syria may be off the table, at least for the moment.

Palestinians And Israel Say They Are Open To Truce (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 24 — After another surge of violence in and around the Gaza Strip over the past month, Israel and the Palestinians moved gingerly on Friday toward reinstating an often-broken cease-fire between them.

DOJ_NMG_0098508

In Gaza, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas confirmed that the Palestinian factions — including Islamic Jihad, which had previously rejected any cease-fire with Israel — would halt their rocket fire if Israel halted its military operations in both the West Bank and Gaza.

Israel called the offer a media presentation, but said it was open to a more serious, formal proposal. "It's not a question of, 'You go first,' " said Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. "It's a question of, 'What are we talking about?' " A halt to all Israeli military operations in return for a halt to rocket fire alone would be unacceptable, she said.

On Thursday night in Gaza, the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, said that since the summer, Palestinians have been "victims of a barbaric Israeli offensive that has left more than 400 dead and 1,500 wounded while thousands of homes have been destroyed." But he added, "All that on the pretext of homemade rocket fire, and unfortunately we are giving them such a pretext."

In fact, Israel re-entered Gaza in late June in response to the capture of a soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, by a group of Palestinian militants that included Hamas. Hamas said that they were responding to Israeli shelling that had killed civilians; Israel said the shelling was in response to Palestinian rocket fire. Since Israel pulled its settlers and troops out of Gaza in September 2005, at least 1,100 rockets have been fired from Gaza, and four Israelis have died — two of them in the past 10 days.

Mr. Abbas, aided by Egypt, is negotiating with Hamas over a national-unity government that could meet the conditions for ending an international freeze on direct budget aid, as well as Israel's withholding of tax and duties collected on behalf of the Palestinians. The government is also held up by disagreements over the release of Corporal Shalit and different demands about the number of Palestinian prisoners to be exchanged for him. Israel wants the corporal back before releasing prisoners. These issues are holding back the prospect of a meeting between Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to make an unannounced visit here to see both men next week. The United States is eager to break the bloody stalemate and at least have Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas talking again.

Amid the negotiating, the shooting continued Friday, with Israeli troops in Gaza killing two Palestinians in Beit Lahiya, including a militant who served as a cameraman for Hamas's military wing. A 10-year-old boy, Abdel Aziz Salman, died from gunshot wounds, hospital workers said. Palestinians said he was hit by an Israeli sniper; the Israeli Army said its troops in Beit Lahiya had no knowledge of the boy's death.

Israel Rejects Palestinian Peace Offer (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

The Palestinian prime minister said Friday that militants were prepared to stop firing rockets at Israel if it would halt all military action in Palestinian territories. Israel rejected the offer, saying it would respond positively only to a total truce.

Similar proposals in the past have failed to curb fighting, and a spokesman for the ruling Hamas group quickly stepped back from the cease-fire talk, which came as fighting between militants and Israeli troops in Gaza claimed the lives of a 10-year-old Palestinian boy and a militant filming the clashes.

A third Palestinian died Friday of wounds sustained in earlier violence. It wasn't immediately known whether he was a militant or civilian.

Israeli launched a military campaign in Gaza five months ago, in an unsuccessful attempt to curb militant rocket fire on Israeli border communities.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said armed factions had agreed Thursday to halt rocket fire in exchange for a complete cessation of Israeli military operations in Gaza and the West Bank.

"The ball now is in the Israeli court," Haniyeh said. "It (Israel) must stop its aggression and escalation against the Palestinian people, then there will be no problem according to what the factions agreed in their last meeting."

After meeting with faction leaders again Friday night, Haniyeh urged the Israelis "to respect this positive readiness expressed by the Palestinian resistance factions." And government spokesman Ghazi Hamad suggested that a broader cease-fire was possible if Israel were to take up the militants' offer.

"After that, we (the Palestinians) will talk about a comprehensive truce," Hamad said.

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said the offer to trade a partial cease-fire for a suspension of all Israeli military operations in Palestinian territories was "ludicrous" and "a media stunt."

"Israel would respond very positively to the idea of a complete cease-fire in the Gaza Strip, which is what we hoped for in September 2005 when we left every inch of the Gaza Strip," Eisin said. "If the Palestinian factions have a proposal which is supposed to bring about the complete stopping of fire from the Gaza Strip, Israel would be very happy to stop all, all - and I'm going to say it again — all fire from the Gaza Strip."

A Hamas spokesman in Gaza, Ismail Radwan, watered down Haniyeh's talk of a cease-fire, saying the Palestinian factions had agreed to "alter their strategies of resistance" if Israel halted fire.

The Palestinian rocket fire, which over the years has generated more panic and anxiety than casualties, grew deadlier over the past week, claiming the lives of two Israeli civilians.

Eisin said Israel regarded recent efforts by moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, to achieve a "complete stop of all violence" as a "very positive development."

Abbas has been trying to work out a package deal with Haniyeh that would include a total cease-fire and a more moderate government of professionals to replace the one led by Hamas, which doesn't recognize the Jewish state.

The two men met twice on Thursday, and aides to Abbas said the key sticking point in coalition talks was who would control the Interior Ministry, which is in charge of powerful Palestinian security branches.

Abbas hopes a more moderate government would encourage the West to restore vitally needed aid, cut off after Hamas took power in March. Western leaders have said the flow would not resume until the Palestinian government recognizes Israel and renounces violence.

Hamas' political chief, Khaled Mashaal, was in Cairo on Friday for talks with Egyptian mediators on the so-called national unity government, but no breakthrough was reported.

In Damascus, Syria, the Palestinian foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar, blamed Abbas' effort to create a government of technocrats for the failure in forming a unity government. He called it a "dangerous" idea that was unacceptable to Hamas.

Zahar, who spoke late Thursday after meeting with radical Palestinian factions, also repeated Hamas' stance that it will not agree to any government that would recognize Israel and renounce violence against the Jewish state.

In northern Gaza, hundreds gathered to bury a 64-year-old grandmother who blew herself up a day earlier as Israeli forces moved through the Jebaliya refugee camp.

Mourners shouting "God is great" draped her simple wooden coffin with a green Hamas flag on Friday before driving it off to a nearby cemetery.

"I knew she wanted martyrdom. She was brave. But I'm still surprised that she did it," said one of her 38 grandchildren, 13-year-old Leila.

Fatma An-Najar was by far the oldest of more than 100 Palestinian suicide bombers who have attacked Israelis over the past six years, killing hundreds.

Female suicide bombers were a rarity during the first several years of the current conflict, but have become more common over the years as women become more involved in the Palestinian struggle.

A Tumultuous World Tests A Rigid Pope (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn, Stacy Meichtry

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

On official trips, he rarely strays from the timetable or jokes with the crowds. He is wary of the mass media and disdains made-for-TV images like those that helped define the papacy of his predecessor, John Paul II. Friends describe him as a man who is shy in crowds and prefers thinking to talking. He is more likely to settle down with a book than sit down at a crowded dinner table.

In private, colleagues say, Pope Benedict XVI can demonstrate a disarming humbleness. Whereas John Paul would spend hours chatting with guests, Benedict is businesslike. He always seems to know what time it is, says Robert Spaemann, a conservative German Catholic philosopher who has known Benedict for years. "Then he'll stand up and say, 'Right, it's time,' and end the meeting."

Nineteen months after being selected pope, Benedict is transforming the Vatican with a different style and a different stance. Beneath his blunt words and rigid style lies a profound divergence from John Paul's buoyant optimism. Pope Benedict believes that the Roman Catholic Church must stand apart from the world of today rather than embrace it.

John Paul II was the master of the grand overture -- from praying at the Western Wall in Jerusalem to kissing a copy of the Quran -- which dissolved tensions with even his harshest foes.

For Benedict, the modern age is defined by growing secularism in the West and the rise of religious fanaticism most everywhere else. In order to fulfill its mission, he believes, the Church needs to shun both forces. Benedict is "pessimistic about the compatibility of the Church and the modern world," says Mr. Spaemann.

This vision has sweeping implications for the Church -- both in its approach to Catholic doctrine and liturgy and in its outreach to other faiths, particularly Islam.

Benedict preaches a renewal of the Church's fundamental teachings and rituals, and is considering expanding the use of the Latin Mass. Benedict's emphasis on tradition risks alienating a broad cross-section of Catholics who argue the Church needs to become more accessible to maintain its increasingly diverse flock. Only once the Church has reclaimed its own distinct identity, he says, can it mount an effective resistance against its chief foe, a "dictatorship of relativism."

Benedict's public call to arms fires the imaginations of many of the cardinals who elected him pope. They share Benedict's view of a Church that is under siege, and they want a leader who is ready to confront the dual challenges of secularism and Islam, even if such confrontation brings danger. Some cardinals insist that Benedict's brusque language on such delicate matters as the Church's relationship with Islam is necessary in order to set the stage for frank and constructive dialogue in the future.

Now, Benedict's approach faces the biggest test of his young pontificate as he travels to Turkey this coming week, his first papal trip to a Muslim nation.

Catholic-Muslim tensions have soared in recent months, in part because of Benedict's own actions. In a September speech in Germany, the pope cited a 15th-century Byzantine emperor's description of Muhammad's teachings as "evil and inhuman." The speech ricocheted around the Muslim world, leading to riots, church bombings and the killing of a nun.

The reaction unnerved both the Vatican and the pope. But the speech itself laid out one of Benedict's most crucial departures from John Paul's path of aggressive outreach. John Paul believed fervently -- some say foolishly -- that Christians and others faiths, even Islam, could always find common ground. Benedict, on the other hand, believes Catholics and Muslims are divided by an ideological chasm, and makes little effort to temper his conviction.

The approach risks provoking a backlash in Turkey, where devout Muslims are incensed by what they see as the pope's unjust criticism of their faith, and where Turkish nationalists view the pope as a Western provocateur bent on weakening the Turkish state. This past week, a group of right-wing Turkish nationalists stormed a former church in Istanbul as part of a protest against the pope's coming visit. "This attitude, which fuels division and lack of mutual trust, is seriously threatening world peace," Ali Bardakoglu, head of Turkey's religious affairs department, said recently, though he didn't specifically mention the pope. Mr. Bardakoglu, who is scheduled to meet with the pontiff during his trip, has vowed to make his views clear.

As tensions mounted late Friday, a Vatican spokesman said Benedict was considering a last-minute change to his travel schedule that would allow him to visit Istanbul's Blue Mosque.

FORMER STUDENTS from the pope's time as a university professor in Germany say that the pontiff's mind is spongelike, and that he can quote from memory works ranging from St. Augustine to Nietzsche. His scholarly stature creates such a sense of awe, colleagues say, that he often goes unchallenged within the Vatican. His texts are rarely edited, say those who work with him, and his ideas are seldom disputed. Many of the pontiff's close associates view him with trepidation.

"He's so head and shoulders above everybody else," says Father Joseph Fessio, who studied under him as a graduate student and now, as head of Florida-based Ignatius Press, publishes his works in English. "Who's going to be able to proof something or correct something?"

This leaves the pope with a level of intellectual isolation even within the Vatican. "Whom would he sit down with? Can you imagine being papal theologian? What are you going to say?" asks Father Fessio.

Many of Benedict's close colleagues say he only really unwinds when surrounded by his intellectual peers. Since his days as a professor in Germany he has hosted the Schülerkreis, or "student circle," where he gathers students and colleagues for free-flowing debate on an issue that is crucial for the Church.

"The first thing he said to us after his election as Pope was that we must continue our seminars," recalls Father Vincent Twomey, an Irish priest and professor who did his doctoral studies with then-Father Ratzinger at the University of Regensburg.

IN THE SUMMER OF 2005, four months after his election, the topic was Islam. The pontiff invited some of the Church's top Islam experts to attend the gathering.

In a speech at the meeting, German Jesuit Father Christian Troll discussed how Muslims might be able to reinterpret the Quran along the lines of modern thinking. The pope questioned whether such a shift was possible, according to Father Fessio, who attended the gathering.

Many of the themes from that meeting re-emerged in the pope's contentious speech at the University of Regensburg on Sept. 12. (Read the speech1.)

The 4,000-word speech delved into a theme present in many of his writings: the West's failure to accept the interdependence between faith and reason.

Benedict prefaced this reflection, however, with a meandering analysis of Islam that relied on obscure source material: the observations of Manuel Paleologos II, a Byzantine emperor who reigned in Christian Constantinople before its fall to the Ottoman Turks in the 15th century.

"Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached," Benedict quoted Manuel II as saying.

In the speech, Benedict advanced a bold position: True interreligious dialogue between Islam and Catholicism is blocked because of the two faiths' divergent interpretations of the role of reason. Catholicism views reason as integral to understanding and interpreting God; Islam, he argues, sees God as being beyond reason.

Father Fessio described Benedict's position on Islam in this way: "He's saying that if your view of God...is that he's so transcendent that he transcends all human categories, including rationality, well then you can justify the irrational, including violence, to spread religion, including terrorism."

"You can't dialogue with us because you won't accept reason as a basis. Because the God you are obeying is above reason," Father Fessio added.

As Muslim criticism of the speech grew, occasionally spilling into violence, the pope sought to quell the anger by expressing regret for the misunderstanding, and saying he was "deeply sorry for the reactions provoked by a few passages in my address." He resisted calls, however, for an unequivocal apology.

He also sought to calm tempers by posting an amended version of the address with footnotes on the Vatican's Web site. In one footnote, the pontiff wrote that his quotation of Manuel II "does not express my personal view of the Quran," but added, "I intended solely to draw out the essential relationship between faith and reason. On this point I am in agreement with Manuel II, but without endorsing his polemic."

Some saw the speech as evidence of the pope's political naiveté. At Regensburg, the university where he once taught and helped turn into a bastion of conservative Catholic thought, Benedict was in his intellectual comfort zone. "He thought he could slip back into the role of professor," says Mr. Spaemann. "Perhaps he didn't realize that every word would be weighed around the world, and that he can never again speak as non-Pope."

Despite the tensions, some Church elders see the Regensburg speech as actually offering an opportunity to restart dialogue on a more frank footing. Cardinal Angelo Scola, the patriarch of Venice, for example, says the Regensburg speech doesn't reject having mutual respect for other faiths but just recognizes their deep differences.

The speech, says Cardinal Scola, who has known Benedict for more than 30 years, "represents a foundation upon which interreligious dialogue will be built in the future."

DOJ_NMG_0098512

EVEN BEFORE THE POPE ignited Muslim rage with his Regensburg address, he was well aware that relations with Islam had reached a boiling point. In the library of the Apostolic Palace last February, Benedict listened as Bishop Luigi Padovese recounted a grim tale: A few weeks earlier, a gunman had burst into a church in Trabzon, Turkey, near the Black Sea, and opened fire on a priest who had been kneeling in prayer. The gunman later claimed to have been driven to violence by cartoons published in a Danish newspaper that lampooned the Muslim prophet Muhammad.

At the pope's urging, Bishop Padovese described how the first bullet tore through the priest's lung. Moments later the gunman fired a second shot, and the priest collapsed dead.

The pope "wanted to know how everything happened in detail," recalls Bishop Padovese, a prelate whose Anatolia-based region includes Trabzon. Bishop Padovese now travels with a police escort in Turkey after a botched attempt on his life.

Benedict is also running the Vatican much differently than John Paul did, leaving him in many ways more removed from the rest of the world. He is traveling less and has cut down on the number of protocol duties, holding fewer meetings. As a result, his contact with people from outside the Church is more limited. He has filled top positions with people he has worked closely with for years, giving the Vatican an ideological homogeneity that didn't exist as much under John Paul, when top officials often sparred.

One appointment in particular surprised many: Benedict's choice of Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, his former chief deputy at the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, as the Vatican's secretary of state. Cardinal Bertone has stellar qualifications in matters of Church doctrine but practically no experience as a diplomat. He isn't a graduate of the Vatican's prestigious diplomatic school, the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy, nor does he have a strong command of English.

Sandro Magister, a veteran Vatican expert who writes for Italian newsweekly L'Espresso, says Cardinal Bertone's appointment is a sign that Vatican foreign policy is likely to be based more on ideals than on pragmatism.

In an essay recently posted on a Catholic Web site, 30 Days, Cardinal Bertone wrote that Vatican envoys to predominantly Muslim nations should take a more aggressive stance in promoting Christianity. "We must not cease to propose and proclaim the Gospel, to Muslims also."

Other key appointments have also elevated former top officials who worked alongside then-Cardinal Ratzinger at the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, though not all of the pope's appointments have come from his inner circle. In late October, Benedict tapped Cardinal Claudio Hummes, who heads the Roman Catholic diocese in São Paulo, Brazil's largest, to run the Vatican's Congregation for the Clergy, putting a moderate Latin American in charge of priests around the world.

Cardinal Julián Herranz, who was chosen by John Paul to head the Vatican's Council for Legislative Texts and who has remained in the post under Benedict, says that the reshuffle hasn't discouraged top officials from expressing their criticisms of papal policy. "If it occurs to me to say something, I will very delicately make the suggestion," he says.

Alberto Melloni, a Church historian at the University of Modena, says Benedict's "pessimistic" view of the modern world, and his tendency for homogeneity, may in some respects be a reflection of his generation, and his age. "He was 78 when he became pope, not 58" like John Paul, says Mr. Melloni.

Benedict is very conscious of his age, now 79, and comments on it frequently to colleagues. During a recent meeting with Mr. Spaemann, the German philosopher, he remarked: "I'm an old dog."

That makes Benedict more focused on changing the Church, instead of the world, and less concerned about whom he might offend in the process.

Last month several dozen top Catholic theologians crowded into a Vatican chapel for 7:30 a.m. mass with Benedict. The pontiff gave pointed marching orders:

"Speaking just to find applause or to tell people what they want to hear....is like prostitution," he told the theologians, according to a transcript. "Don't look for applause, but look to obey the truth."

A Tense Time For A Papal Visit (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098513

ISTANBUL, TURKEY — To reach Turkey's most important Roman Catholic church, a visitor must scour a traffic-choked street to find the metal doors, walk down a flight of stairs, cross a courtyard and finally step into the consecrated basilica.

Inside the Holy Spirit Cathedral here, the lights remain low until a minute before evening Mass, and then reveal frescoed ceilings with gold-trimmed arches, 22 crystal chandeliers and blond-marble columns. On this night, 14 worshipers dot the pews.

In the Turkish capital, Ankara, the only Catholic church is even more discreet: It is marked simply by a French flag.

When Pope Benedict XVI travels to Turkey next week, he will be making his first trip to a predominantly Muslim country at a moment of diplomatic fragility.

He also will be traversing some of the most ancient and revered milestones of Christianity, in a land where Christianity is disappearing and where non-Muslim minorities complain of systemic discrimination, harassment and violence against them.

It is a complex agenda. The pope's main purpose is to meet with the Istanbul-based spiritual leader of the world's 250 million Eastern Orthodox Christians in a show of ecumenical solidarity. But he must also use the visit to attempt to repair the damage from comments he has made that cast Islam in a negative light.

Among Turkey's nearly 70 million Muslims, reaction to Benedict's visit ranges from disinterest to intense anger. A man opened fire early this month on the Italian Consulate in Istanbul, telling police later that he wanted to "strangle" the pope. A nationalist gang called the Gray Wolves is staging regular demonstrations protesting the pontiff's arrival.

Among the estimated 100,000 Christians who live in Turkey, there is hope that Benedict's presence will cast light on their difficulties.

The Roman Catholic Church is not legally recognized in Turkey. It functions largely attached to foreign embassies; its priests do not wear their collars in public.

Most Christians in Turkey are of the Armenian, Greek and other Orthodox denominations, and although most of these are recognized in the Turkish Constitution as minority communities, they face severe restrictions on property ownership and cannot build places of worship or run seminaries to train their clerics.

Such hardships make it almost impossible for Christians to sustain and expand their communities, advocates say. The Greek Orthodox, for example, have dwindled to no more than 3,000, just 2% of the community's size in the 1960s.

Fueled by a vitriolic, and growing, potion of nationalism and Islamic radicalism, spasms of violence have led to the killing of one priest this year, the beatings of two others and the burning of a Christian prayer center. Christian tombstones are often vandalized and property frequently confiscated by authorities.

Turkey has come under repeated criticism from Western human rights organizations and the Vatican for its failure to promote religious freedom. Turkey is an Islamic but secular country; in reality, this means that all religious activity, including mosques and imams, is controlled by the government.

"Obviously, more needs to be done to promote religious freedom for all denominations," Ali Bardakoglu, president of Turkey's powerful Religious Affairs Directorate, said in an interview. But he defended the government's treatment of minorities, contending that Christians and other non-Muslims do not face serious problems.

Bardakoglu was one of the most emphatic critics of Benedict after the pope delivered a speech in Regensburg, Germany, in September that denounced Islamic violence and quoted a medieval Byzantine emperor who disdained Islam and its prophet, Muhammad. Adding insult to injury, as far as many Turks were concerned, the emperor was defending Constantinople, cradle of Orthodox Christianity, against the Muslim conquest that gave the city its name today: Istanbul.

Bardakoglu said the pope was welcome in Turkey despite the speech, which touched off outrage throughout the Muslim world. And although he said he accepted Benedict's subsequent explanations, Bardakoglu did not appear completely appeased.

"It is unfortunate that there are circles within Western society that attempt to blacken the name of our religion and are infected with Islamophobia," he said. "The role of the Vatican and the pope should be to help fight stereotypes. Rather than open debate, they should be seeking to heal wounds."

In a remarkable gesture, the pope will meet with Bardakoglu, the country's top religious figure, at his ministry, a modern, imposing building on Ankara's outskirts, on the first day of his Turkey visit. Bardakoglu's directorate commands a huge budget and oversees all of Turkey's imams.

Originally, the Vatican expected Bardakoglu to call on the pope at the Vatican Embassy, as protocol would have dictated. But the Turks refused. After a series of negotiations, the pope agreed to go to Bardakoglu. "It is a gesture of goodwill," a senior Vatican official said.

The pope's controversial presence in Turkey represents a balancing act for the government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, which regards itself a vital bridge between the West and East, a way for Westerners to deal with a modern and democratic Islam. But it also cannot appear too cozy with a pontiff who, in the view of many, is not fond of Muslims or Turks.

Erdogan is not scheduled to receive Benedict, citing a previous commitment to attend a NATO summit in Latvia on Tuesday and Wednesday. And there is no plan for the prime minister to see him off when the pope departs Dec. 1.

Both the Vatican and Turkish officials said this was not a snub, but Erdogan told visiting reporters in Istanbul last month, "You can't expect me to arrange my timetable according to the pope."

The frictions are rooted in history. The Ottoman Empire, which ruled the region for more than six centuries, was relatively tolerant of Jews, Christians and other non-Muslims. But before and during World War I, Western powers collaborated with Christian and other minorities to bring down the Ottomans. In the carnage that followed, as many as 1.5 million Armenians were slaughtered, a similar number of ethnic Greeks expelled and 1 million Turks deported from Greece.

The 1923 Lausanne Treaty founded the Republic of Turkey and recognized minorities. But deep mistrust persists, and even today among ardent nationalists, Christians are seen as a potential fifth column.

"It's a kind of preemptive intolerance: Don't let it flourish because it might take over," said Mustafa Akyol, a writer and expert on interfaith relations. "Everyone is afraid of something."

Akyol, a Muslim, said he once wrote a column advocating that the museum of St. Sophia, or Aya Sofya, in Istanbul be returned to its original use, that of a church. The response was harsh: He was threatened and castigated as a "secret Greek." The pope is scheduled to visit St. Sophia, built in the 6th century as a Byzantine church and converted to a mosque in the 15th century by the Ottomans.

The mere rumor that the pope might say a prayer at the site has led to a bit of hysteria. Islamic newspaper Milli Gazete, in a front-page commentary last week, lashed out at the government for permitting the "Crusaders" to plan to bless the former church in a brazen attempt to "revive Byzantium."

For their part, Turkish officials have sought to minimize the pontiff's main mission on this trip: to worship alongside Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, head of the world's Orthodox Christians. The coming together of the two religious leaders is meant as a bridging of the 1,000-year-old rift between the two ancient branches of Christianity.

Such frictions notwithstanding, Turkey, compared with many Muslim countries, is relatively hospitable to non-Muslims. But its failure to make more progress on freedom-of-religion issues has been an important stumbling block in its years-long campaign to join the European Union.

It is EU pressure that has nudged Ankara along in easing some of the restrictions on minorities; for example, a Protestant group in Istanbul has for the first time been allowed to open a church.

"The EU reforms give people a sense of hope that there is light at the end of the tunnel," said Greek Orthodox Father Alexander Karloutsos. "It's been very dark here."

Discord Accompanies Bahrain Vote (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

MANAMA, Bahrain -- Friction between Sunni and Shiite Muslims in this strategic Persian Gulf kingdom, which is holding its second parliamentary elections in three decades, has clouded the voting set here for Saturday.

The campaign for the National Assembly's 40-member lower house has been marred by an alleged plot by a senior government official to rig the elections in favor of the ruling Sunni minority.

A 214-page report disclosed in September accused a senior official of secretly plotting to sideline the country's majority Shiites. The report, released by a former government adviser, is the latest in a series of events that have exacerbated Sunni-Shiite discord in this nation of 700,000, home to the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet.

The report has sparked demonstrations and calls for the prime minister's resignation and an international investigation. Its release coincides with simmering tensions caused by the sectarian violence in Iraq, fears of neighboring Iran's regional ambitions and the birth of a conservative Sunni political movement here.

Bahrain, a grouping of 33 islands, is the poorest oil-producing Gulf country and the only one with a Shiite majority. More than 200 candidates, including 16 women, will vie for seats in Saturday's elections.

The report was written by Salah al-Bandar, the former government adviser, and claims that a government minister and member of Bahrain's ruling al-Khalifa family planned and funded a plot to weaken the country's Shiites, who make up more than 60 percent of the population.

The 10-point plan, to be executed over a five-year period, called for paying a stipend to poor Shiites who convert; accelerating the naturalization of foreign Sunnis to alter the country's demographic makeup; and spying on Shiite organizations.

Bahraini officials have acknowledged a need for political balance between the country's sects but said the Bandar report was all lies. The government charged Bandar, a British citizen of Sudanese origin, with sedition and deported him days after the report's release.

Several of the people named in the report sued Bandar for defamation last month. He, in turn, is suing the government for wrongful termination.

Government officials said about 20 officials cited in the report have been suspended but have declined to comment further while the court cases are pending.

Bandar, who worked for the cabinet affairs minister and the government statistics department, wrote the report on his own initiative with the help of government whistle-blowers. The report included copies of checks, bank statements showing large sums transferred to anti-Shiite figures and a memo calling for Shiites to be "cleansed" from Bahrain.

According to the report, more than $2.5 million was spent on the scheme, which also included plans to manipulate electronic voting to rig the upcoming elections in favor of Sunnis.

The report named people it said were hired to cause friction between the two sects by writing inflammatory articles, posting offensive comments on popular online forums, denigrating Shiite beliefs and casting suspicion on Shiites' patriotism.

Over the past couple of years, Bahraini Shiites have been accused by Sunnis and some in the government of allegiance to Shiite Iran, with which they have historic religious ties, and of ambitions to dominate the country, emboldened by the empowerment of Iraq's majority Shiites.

Shiite leaders say the government is trying to create a sectarian divide to deflect attention from the country's lack of democracy and political reform.

Wearing the long, dark cloak and rolled turban of the Shiite clergy, candidate Ali Salman, head of the largest Shiite opposition group, the al-Wefaq National Islamic Society, said the conflict is not between Shiites and a Sunni leadership, but between activists seeking political rights on the one hand and an autocratic regime on the other. "We are not asking for more Shiite mosques," said the 42-year cleric, who studied in Qom, Iran, and in Saudi Arabia. "We are not asking to set up an Islamic republic. All we're asking for is our full political rights."

At an election rally in Jid Hafs, a suburb of Manama, the capital, thousands of men and women sat on plastic chairs in a dusty lot to hear Salman speak.

Salman, who is widely viewed as the nation's most influential and moderate Shiite cleric, issued a warning to the government. "If this parliament is not able to give hope to the people, Bahrain will go through a very difficult time very soon," he said. "I will not be able to contain those who demand their rights."

In addition to the elected lower house, Bahrain's legislature includes an equally powerful, state-appointed upper chamber, and all legislation must be approved by the king. The opposition has called for constitutional amendments that would allow parliament to appoint the prime minister and for laws to be passed by elected representatives.

In a Shiite fishing village outside Manama, Mohsen Abdullah, a member of a local youth unemployment committee, sat cross-legged on the carpet in his living room and described a sit-in he plans to hold next week in front of the Interior Ministry. Abdullah, 24, who was released from prison last month after serving nine months for participating in an illegal demonstration, said he applied for a government job for more than two years and would keep protesting until he got one.

Now he lives with his parents, two brothers and a sister, and supplements his income by net-fishing near his home. He is enrolled in night school and said he is looking for any entry-level government job. "Why do they give foreigners jobs at the ministries and we don't get them?" he asked.

Despite police beatings and stints in jail, Abdullah still attends demonstrations and agitates for jobs for unemployed youths, most of whom are Shiites, he said. "I don't want to go to jail, but it's better than this," he said, gesturing. "Without a job, I can't get married, I can't buy a car, I can't get my own place."

Over lunch at an upscale Japanese restaurant, Information Minister Muhammad Abdul-Ghaffar Abdulla said that there was no poverty or discrimination in Bahrain and that jobs were awarded on merit.

"The government wants to build balance in the whole political system," he said. "Democracy is a long process. The most important thing for us is security and stability."

In Bahrain, A Referendum On Promises (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

MANAMA, Bahrain, Nov. 24 — For the past month, they have promised the world to voters in this tiny island kingdom off the east coast of Saudi Arabia: better housing, better jobs, higher salaries, and better services. One has even promised greater dignity.

But as more than 200 candidates vied for a seat in Bahrain's 40-member elected Parliament, the one thing that many were not prepared to promise was far-reaching political change.

"When I speak to supporters, I feel I have to acknowledge, yes, not much is going to change," said Sheik Ali Salman, the leader of the Wefaq National Islamic Society, Bahrain's leading opposition movement, which is predominantly Shiite and is vying for 17 seats in Parliament.

"But I try to emphasize to people that you are better off having someone looking out for your interests within the system, even if he wins only small victories," he said.

Bahrain goes to the polls Saturday to elect a new Parliament in an atmosphere of growing sectarian division and disillusionment. Tensions have been running high here, fueled by a widening economic disparity between the country's minority Sunni population and its Shiite majority, as well as a growing frustration that long-promised changes have yet to materialize.

Just a few years ago, this island kingdom of 700,000 was hailed as a model of reform in the Arab world. King Hamad al-Khalifa ended a 25-year state of emergency in 1999, and was promising to turn Bahrain into a constitutional monarchy with a newly elected Parliament.

But the euphoria all but evaporated two years later, when the king broke his promises and imposed a constitution establishing a second, appointed legislative house that significantly curtailed the power of the elected one. Gerrymandering ensured a Sunni advantage in the elected house, too, prompting the predominantly Shiite opposition to boycott elections in 2002.

In the years since, Bahrain's Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of the population, have been sidelined. They allege that the government has backed Sunni Islamists and encouraged increasingly sectarian politics. Activists here say they have uncovered a systematic effort to naturalize Sunnis from other Arab countries as well as from Southeast Asia; as an indication of the government's intentions, they point to a polling place close to the causeway with Saudi Arabia where Saudis naturalized as Bahrainis can vote.

Tensions were heightened two months ago when a government adviser published a report outlining a conspiracy by senior government officials, including members of the royal family, to undermine the Shiites. Bahraini newspapers have been banned from discussing the so-called Bandargate scandal, named for the report's author, Salah al-Bandar, and Web sites mentioning it have been blocked.

Nevertheless, Sheik Salman and the rest of the opposition have entered the race, insisting that some representation is better than no representation at all. Sheik Salman said that many Shiites had realized that their being out of the political process only allowed the government to promulgate laws that hurt the Shiites' interests, including regulations limiting public gatherings and protests, as well as new terrorism laws that threatened to hamper the work of the opposition. “We won something and lost something by boycotting,” he said “People are now convinced that it is better to take part even if it has small advantages.”

Government officials hope the entry of the Shiites will serve to ease tensions. But opposition members say they intend to use their seats in Parliament as bully pulpits to goad the government into changing.

“I want to get inside to weaken the gates,” said Ibrahim Sharif al-Sayed, a Sunni opposition candidate with the National Democratic Action Society, which has campaigned in alliance with Wefaq. “We will be there to expose the government, not to legitimize it. We want to show why we have no power in this country. I intend to be a Trojan horse.”

But Mr. Sayed, a wealthy banker who has led a campaign to publicize the royal family’s seizure of coastal lands for personal benefit, said liberal Sunnis like him had faced the greatest battles during this election. He was the subject of a relentless smear campaign, waged through cellphone text messages and e-mail messages. He alleges that the government is behind the campaign.

“The government wants a polarized Parliament based on sectarian grounds,” he said. “They want to have a Sunni bloc and a Shia bloc which they can accuse of being tied to Iran. But we will get in the way of that agenda.”

Sheik Salman says he hopes that his involvement will win at least some good faith gestures from the government. Otherwise, he warns, the current tensions could explode in the future.

“People rightly feel depressed because they know that the change will be very, very limited,” he said. “But better slow, gradual advances than explosive change on the street.”

Taiwan Leader Survives In Vote (WP)

By Jane Rickards

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan, Nov. 24 -- President Chen Shui-bian easily survived an impeachment vote in Taiwan's legislature Friday despite his wife's indictment on embezzlement charges and a prosecutor's statement that Chen could be indicted as well if he did not have presidential immunity.

The vote signaled that Chen, a combative champion of Taiwanese independence, is likely to remain in office until the end of his second four-year term in 2008 unless new irregularities are brought to light or new charges are filed.

But his mandate has been seriously undermined by the corruption indictment against his wife and similar indictments against his son-in-law and several senior aides. As a result, the political storm buffeting his leadership seemed unlikely to subside anytime soon.

The impeachment motion, brought by the opposition Nationalist Party, garnered 118 votes, 28 short of the 146 needed for a required two-thirds majority in the Legislative Yuan, or parliament. It was the third time since June that Chen's forces have defeated a recall motion, which if successful would precipitate a national referendum on whether the president should be ousted.

The tally indicated that most lawmakers from Chen's Democratic Progressive Party and the allied Taiwan Solidarity Union remained loyal to the president, despite widespread discontent over the embezzlement scandal, including among his most loyal followers.

Two Democratic Progressive Party lawmakers quit parliament 10 days ago to protest the way the corruption scandals were being handled. But the party threatened to expel any members who cast ballots for impeachment, and with their own political futures hanging in the balance, Democratic Progressive lawmakers closed ranks and all 83 boycotted the vote.

On Nov. 3, a high court prosecutor charged Chen's wife, Wu Shu-chen, with forging receipts and embezzling about $450,000 from the president's discretionary funds. At that time, the prosecutor made his statement about presidential immunity preventing an indictment of Chen.

Chen, in a televised speech two days later, argued that the money in question was used for "secret diplomatic work," suggesting it went to pay off foreign leaders and lobbyists to further Taiwan's quest for diplomatic recognition. The rules governing receipts for such expenditures are complicated and unclear, he maintained, and at no time did he divert money for his own use. He said he would resign only if his wife was convicted.

Chen did not explain how his wife came to be involved in gathering receipts for such expenditures. The two have worked closely together since they married in 1975 and struggled side by side during the 1980s for native Taiwanese rights during martial law under the Nationalist Party government.

Ma Yingjeou, the Nationalist leader and the party's putative candidate for president in 2008, has reaped political benefits from the uproar for the past six months. But over the last 10 days, Ma, who is mayor of Taipei, has himself been accused of misusing official funds and has been interrogated by prosecutors. While Ma has denied the allegations, he acknowledged that a clerk in his office forged receipts to claim expenses.

Chen said Friday that he respected the legislature's democratic right to attempt impeachment, provided it followed constitutional procedures. "Democracy is nothing more than freedom and the rule of law," he told Therese Shaheen, the visiting former head of the American Institute in Taiwan, the government-sponsored organization through which the United States maintains quasi-diplomatic representation in Taiwan.

Corruption Scandal At Top Tests Taiwan's Democracy (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

TAIPEI, Taiwan, Nov. 18 — At times, Taiwanese politics is a blend of opera and blood sport, and this is one of those times. Scandal and outrage, lying and humiliation — all of it messy and delivered in a loud, public fashion — are consuming political life here, as a virtual death watch has settled over the second term of President Chen Shui-bian.

Mr. Chen, who once aspired to be Taiwan's George Washington, is now accused of being its Boss Tweed. Prosecutors have implicated him in a fake receipts scandal and are planning to put his wife on trial next month. The rival Nationalist Party, salivating over Mr. Chen's troubles, is facing its own scandal, as prosecutors say they are investigating the party's presumptive 2008 presidential candidate for his own fake receipts.

Taiwan's partisan newspapers have been filled with so many suggestive details — a reportedly ill-gotten Tiffany diamond ring, to name one — that the noise and acrimony have obscured the more elemental issue that the island's young democracy is being severely tested.

"In 10 years, when we look back, this could be a turning point for Taiwan's democracy to become mature," said Emile C. J. Sheng, a political science professor at Soochow University. "Right now, it is a disgrace, and it is quite humiliating. But once we get past this, I think Taiwan's politics will get a lot cleaner."

Politically, Taiwan's symbolic power has always been as a democratic counterpoint to China. But democracy in Taiwan remains a work in progress that has been repeatedly challenged during Mr. Chen's tenure. The pivotal recent event occurred Nov. 3 when a prosecutor in Taipei, the capital, indicted the first lady and also announced that Mr. Chen, immune from prosecution as president, could face charges after he left office. For a judicial branch regarded as a weak constitutional pillar, it was a historic moment.

"This is very hard evidence that at last we have a fair and independent-minded judicial branch," said Hwang Yih-jiau, an opposition legislator with the People First Party and a critic of the president. "The principle of separation of power has taken root in Taiwan."

Equally important, many analysts say the intense news media and prosecutorial focus on government accounts, and on how elected officials use them, has set a precedent that will bring more sunshine into the system. "I think members of future first families will be a lot more careful," said Chao Chien-min, a political analyst at a Taipei research institute.

[For the immediate future, though, Taiwan's political scene will remain in turmoil. On Friday, the "pan blue" camp, made up of lawmakers from the Nationalist Party and the People First Party, tried to pass a motion for a nationwide recall referendum against the president. The bill failed to get the required two-thirds majority because lawmakers from Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party remained unified behind him.]

Mayoral races on Dec. 7 in Taiwan's two largest cities, Taipei and Kaohsiung, will serve as barometers of the public mood toward Mr. Chen and his Democratic Progressive Party.

Then there is the corruption trial of the first lady, Wu Shu-chen, to begin Dec. 15. Mr. Chen has said he will leave office if his wife is convicted. Her trial will focus on the roughly $424,000 the couple collected from an executive "state affairs" fund.

To get the money, they submitted personal receipts gathered from friends and family. Mr. Chen has admitted initially lying to prosecutors about the receipts. But he has since explained on live television that the receipts were a bookkeeping necessity that enabled him to use state money for secret diplomacy — for which there are no receipts.

His defenders note that before Mr. Chen took office in 2000, presidents were not required to submit receipts to use such discretionary funds. They say prosecutors presented no evidence that Mr. Chen had used any of the money for personal gain. They also say Taiwan's unique international isolation, defined by its tense coexistence with China, makes confidentiality essential when a president wants to engage in diplomacy.

"Only the Taiwanese people and politicians can understand the importance of keeping things completely confidential," said Hsiao Mei-khim, a Democratic Progressive Party lawmaker who is an ally of Mr. Chen.

His critics, though, say the receipts scandal is just the latest example of what they describe as a pattern of corruption by the first family. This summer, prosecutors charged Mr. Chen's son-in-law with insider trading in a case that is still pending. The first lady has already been investigated — and cleared of any wrongdoing — after she received gift certificates from a department store seeking government approval for a change of ownership.

With so much baggage, Mr. Chen's secret diplomacy explanation in the receipts scandal has rung hollow to critics and much of the public. Polls place the president's approval ratings at record lows.

The scandal has also focused public attention on Mr. Chen's marriage, as several lawmakers have questioned the scruples of the first lady. She grew up as a doctor's daughter while Mr. Chen was dirt poor. Early in Mr. Chen's political career, Ms. Wu was paralyzed after being struck by a car during a political rally. The police ruled it an accident, but many people in the Democratic Progressive Party believe that it was an assassination attempt against Mr. Chen.

As first lady, Ms. Wu has attracted whispers for her penchant for luxury. One of the receipts in the scandal was for a Tiffany diamond ring valued at more than $30,000. Newspapers have reported that a Taiwanese sea cargo company had originally given jeweled watches to Mr. Chen's son for his wedding. But the family had returned the watches for a ring reportedly fitted for Ms. Wu.

Elected officials are allowed to accept gifts in Taiwan, but the ring has angered some of Mr. Chen's allies because the sea cargo company had business with the state. "It's a political question, it's a moral question, but it's not a legal question," Ms. Hsiao said. "We think it was very poor political judgment to take this kind of gift or live a lifestyle like that."

Public revulsion over the different scandals peaked late this summer when a former chairman of the Democratic Progressive Party organized enormous demonstrations in Taipei calling for Mr. Chen's resignation. At one level, the protests represented democratic free speech. But some here worried that they might overwhelm Taiwan's democratic institutions, the way similar protests prompted the recent "soft coup" in Thailand or have toppled presidents in the Philippines.

"We worried that if the demonstrations succeeded it would not be good for Taiwan's democracy," said Antonio Chiang, a former member of Mr. Chen's government who had been a dissident in Taiwan's pre-democracy era. "It would be like Thailand. But when the indictment came out, suddenly all these demonstrations went silent."

Mr. Chiang added: "Democracy without rule of law is very dangerous. Now, we are going to have rule of law."

Mr. Chen's election in 2000 was historic because it ended more than five decades of rule by the Nationalist Party. But many analysts say that many democratic values have not fully taken hold, and also blame the rival political camps for taking a zero-sum attitude toward politics and governing.

The Nationalists never seemed to accept Mr. Chen's legitimacy as president, political observers say, even as the Democratic Progressive Party, or D.P.P., remained deeply distrustful of its rivals. Political analysts say that Mr. Chen exacerbated this poisonous partisanship with his different political efforts to push for Taiwanese independence.

The question now is whether Mr. Chen will serve until his term ends in the spring of 2008. His party is disappointed, even disgusted, with him but has remained unified enough to fend off recall efforts. However, Mr. Chen's support could disintegrate if his party suffers in the mayoral elections, particularly in Kaohsiung, its stronghold.

For now, the D.P.P. is pointing at the Nationalist Party's likely 2008 presidential nominee, Ma Ying-jeou, who is also mayor of Taipei. Prosecutors are investigating whether Mr. Ma also wrongly submitted false receipts for public money. Mr. Ma has claimed his innocence and described the irregularity as an error by a clerk.

One way that some Taiwanese have reassured themselves is to note that none of this — a public demonstration against a president, an indictment against the first family — could have happened across the strait in nondemocratic China. Indeed, that point has been made by a handful of bloggers in China who have watched Taiwan's democratic convulsions not with disgust but with admiration.

Mr. Chiang, the former dissident, agreed but said Taiwan still had work to do. "We still have a lot to learn," he said. "Democracy is not so easy."

China And Pakistan Sign Free-trade Deal (LAT)

By Henry Chu And Mubashir Zaidi, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN — Chinese President Hu Jintao, visiting his country's staunchest ally in Asia, signed a free-trade deal here Friday and pledged to continue helping Pakistan build its civilian nuclear program.

But the Chinese leader stopped short of announcing the wide-ranging nuclear cooperation deal that many observers had expected him to unveil as a counterweight to a similar accord being hammered out between the United States and India, Pakistan's archrival.

Beijing already has supplied Islamabad with one nuclear reactor and is helping build a second at Chashma, in Punjab province. Pakistan is increasingly looking to nuclear sources as its energy needs grow in step with its expanding economy.

"We will continue to carry out such cooperation," Hu told reporters at a news conference here, during the first visit to Pakistan by a Chinese president in a decade.

Hu arrived in the Pakistani capital Thursday as part of a weeklong tour of South Asia that began with a four-day visit to India. China's communist government is eager to expand its political influence in the region and to improve its access to the area's abundant natural resources, including metals and natural gas.

Islamabad and Beijing have a long-standing "all-weather" friendship, based partly on a shared antagonism toward New Delhi.

Pakistan rolled out the red carpet for Hu, who was accorded the privilege Friday of addressing the country directly in a nationally televised speech. Relations between China and Pakistan, Hu said, were "higher than the Himalayas, deeper than the Indian Ocean and sweeter than honey."

China is Pakistan's chief arms supplier, and the nations signed a preliminary agreement for Beijing to outfit its ally with airborne early-warning systems.

But Hu's vaguely worded announcement of further collaboration regarding civilian nuclear energy probably was a disappointment for Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Islamabad had hoped China would commit to building as many as six more nuclear reactors.

Such an agreement would have served to counterbalance an accord, overwhelmingly approved by the U.S. Senate last week, that would allow American companies to sell nuclear fuel and technology to India, despite New Delhi's long-standing refusal to join the global Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Islamabad repeatedly has been rebuffed when seeking similarly favorable treatment from Washington. Last week, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher said in New Delhi that an exemption for India was warranted because of its "good track record" on nonproliferation and that those conditions did not exist elsewhere. He was referring to Pakistan, whose former chief nuclear scientist has admitted sharing information with Libya and North Korea.

As it was, Hu's pledge to continue civilian nuclear cooperation here did not appear to offer much more than the promise he gave India on Tuesday.

However, he got a free-trade agreement with Pakistan, a move India has rejected for fear unleashing of a flood of cheap goods. Officials in Beijing and Islamabad hope trade between their countries, which amounted to slightly more than $4 billion last year, can swell to $15 billion in five years.

"I am sure the free-trade agreement that we have signed with China will quadruple our trade and will give a boost to investments in Pakistan," Musharraf said. "We also look forward to the Chinese private sector taking advantage of the opportunities offered by Pakistan's vibrant and reformed economy."

Hu is scheduled to go on to the city of Lahore today before departing Pakistan on Sunday.

Times staff writer Chu reported from New Delhi and special correspondent Zaidi from Islamabad.

China Rejects Journalist's Appeal Of Spying Conviction (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 24 — A Beijing appeals court on Friday upheld a spying conviction of a prominent Hong Kong journalist in a case that has elicited criticism of China from human rights and press advocacy groups.

The journalist, Ching Cheong, faces a five-year prison sentence. He was arrested in April 2005 during a visit to Guangdong Province in mainland China and charged with taking payoffs in exchange for gathering information for Taiwan. A lower court in Beijing convicted him in August.

His family continues to dispute the charges.

"We feel very sad and shocked," Ching Hai, the defendant's older brother, told The Associated Press outside the courthouse on Friday morning. "We think it's very unfair. We question the fairness and transparency of this country's legal system."

Mr. Ching, 56, based in Hong Kong, is the chief China correspondent for The Straits Times, the leading newspaper in Singapore. His case, as well as the detention of a Chinese researcher for The New York Times, has prompted international concern about China's crackdown on press freedom. Earlier this year, the researcher for The Times, Zhao Yan, was acquitted of a charge of disclosing state secrets, but he is still awaiting a ruling on his appeal of an unrelated fraud conviction.

The Straits Times expressed disappointment with Friday's ruling. "As he is still not in the best of health, we appeal to the Chinese authorities to show him leniency and compassion while he is serving his sentence," the newspaper said in a statement. "We will continue to provide all necessary support and assistance to him and his family."

Family members have told reporters that Mr. Ching has been suffering from insomnia and stomach pains in prison. Born in southern China and raised in Hong Kong, Mr. Ching is a veteran journalist. His wife, Mary Lau, wrote an open letter in June that conceded that her husband played a dual role as a journalist and as a political adviser. But she said that he had advised Chinese leaders, not anyone in Taiwan, and she described him as a Chinese patriot who wanted to improve relations among China, Hong Kong and Taiwan.

Mr. Ching's arrest also raised questions about whether the Chinese authorities were trying to prevent him from writing about delicate political issues. Ms. Lau has said that her husband traveled to Guangdong in April 2005 to try to obtain tapes of secret interviews with China's former president, Zhao Ziyang, who had died three months earlier. The former leader had spent 16 years under house arrest in Beijing as a penalty for expressing sympathy for student protesters during the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations.

Ms. Lau has said that an intermediary entrapped Mr. Ching as he tried to collect the tapes.

On Friday, the official New China News Agency quoted an unidentified judge involved in the appeal as characterizing the August verdict as "accurate in application of the law and appropriate in meting out punishment."

Despite Setbacks, Blair Is Hopeful On Ulster Local Rule (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Nov. 24 — Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain on Friday held on to his hopes of restoring local rule across Northern Ireland next March, despite a day of high drama in which Protestant and Roman Catholic politicians failed to reach agreement on nominating leaders to a future power-sharing executive.

Echoing the province's recent violent past, the meeting was cut short after a notorious Protestant militant, Michael Stone, attacked the lobby of the parliament buildings here, carrying a gun and tossing inside a bag of homemade explosives. Shouting threats, he was wrestled to the ground by security staff members and arrested by the police.

Before the disruption, the Rev. Ian Paisley, Protestant leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, refused to nominate himself as first minister of Northern Ireland to serve alongside Martin McGuinness of Sinn Fein, the main Catholic republican party. Mr. Paisley explained his resistance by saying that Sinn Fein had yet to endorse Northern Ireland's police force and its courts. Friday was the nominal deadline to do so.

Mr. Paisley, who seeks to maintain the province's political ties with Britain, had for years based his political career on rejecting sharing power with Sinn Fein because of its links with the Irish Republican Army.

Speaking in London, Mr. Blair indicated that despite the setback the British and Irish governments would continue their efforts to restore local rule, a process that is contingent on the divided parties resolving crucial differences over power sharing and support for the police.

"What is clear is this: If Sinn Fein agrees to the proper and full support of policing in Northern Ireland by the Police Service of Northern Ireland and to the rule of law, then the Democratic Unionist Party will share power with them," Mr. Blair said.

He also spoke of the need for the province to get away from its "wretched and divisive past."

The attack on the parliament buildings by Mr. Stone, a convicted killer, was a reminder of a more violent past that many in Northern Ireland now believe is behind them.

Mr. Stone became an iconic figure for Protestant militants when he killed three mourners in a gun and grenade attack on an Irish Republican Army funeral in 1988. He was released early in 2000 under the terms of the Good Friday peace accord for that attack and others. This year, Mr. Stone took part in a series of televised broadcasts in which Archbishop Desmond Tutu, the former head of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission, brought together victims and perpetrators from the sectarian violence in Northern Ireland.

The targets and motives for his attack on Friday remained unclear. Politicians and journalists evacuated the buildings. [A news agency], quoting a police official, reported that the British Army had defused the six to eight explosive devices in Mr. Stone's bag.

The level of distrust between political parties has remained high in the eight years since the negotiation of the 1998 Good Friday peace agreement, which ended much of the politically motivated violence and led to the first power-sharing local government to involve Protestant politicians and Catholic representatives from Sinn Fein. But local rule fell apart in 2002 amid distrust between Catholic and Protestant leaders.

In Scotland last month, Britain and Ireland acted to restore that local government, by putting forward a series of proposals and deadlines for the province's parties.

Under the proposals, elections to the 108-seat assembly were to be held early in March before the formation of a local executive later that month.

Sinn Fein, which has yet to call a full meeting of its party delegates to endorse policing, is seeking guarantees from the British government over what appears to be their central demand: that powers over policing and the courts will shift from London to the local executive in Belfast.

Bomb Threat Empties N. Ireland Assembly (WP/AP)

By Shawn Pogatchnik, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland -- The Northern Ireland Assembly missed another deadline for forming a government Friday, then politicians fled the building after one of the province's most infamous Protestant militants tossed a bomb-filled bag into the entrance.

Police subdued Michael Stone, who killed three people at an Irish Republican Army funeral in 1988. The Northern Ireland police commander, Chief Constable Hugh Orde, later said Stone's bag contained at least six explosive devices that British army experts safely dismantled.

Politicians and journalists were ordered out of Stormont Parliamentary Building as the fire alarm sounded _ and two security guards pinned Stone by both arms to the main doorway. He was later wrestled outside, into pouring rain and wind, as he shouted a favored Protestant militant slogan: "No surrender!" Police later recovered a handgun and knife from him.

Stone had abandoned the bag near the building's security checkpoint staff, who operate metal detectors and search bags. He also appeared to have been spray-painting the entrance to Stormont with "Sinn Fein-IRA murderers" or "war criminals," but did not finish it.

Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Hain ordered an immediate investigation into what he called a "very serious breach of security. ... The chaotic scenes at Stormont were deeply disturbing."

Chief Constable Hugh Orde said the explosives inside the bag, which convicted killer Michael Stone threw into the lobby of Stormont Parliamentary Building during a debate on power-sharing, were "fairly amateurish in design. That does not make them any less dangerous."

Orde called Stone's action "a sad publicity act by a very sad individual."

Stone's incursion came minutes after Protestant leader Ian Paisley refused to accept a nomination as the future leader of Northern Ireland's power-sharing administration.

Paisley, whose Democratic Unionist Party is the largest in Northern Ireland, said he would work with Sinn Fein, the IRA-linked party that represents most Catholics, only when it begins to support the police force. If that happened, Paisley said, he would accept the post.

"When Sinn Fein has fulfilled its obligations with regard to the police, the courts and the rule of law, then and only then can progress be made. There can and will be no movement until they face and sign up to their obligations," Paisley told the assembly.

The prime ministers of Britain and Ireland, Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern, said Stone's threat illustrated why rival British Protestant and Irish Catholic politicians should compromise and form a stable coalition as the Good Friday peace accord intended.

More than seven months ago, Blair and Ahern announced that Nov. 24 would be their final deadline for a power-sharing deal _ but both on Friday shrugged off this commitment and insisted that Paisley's statement contained the hope of future progress.

Both premiers said they expected Sinn Fein to clear the way for Paisley by accepting the authority of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Sinn Fein insists it will not take this step first, if at all.

"It seems that Michael Stone has gone on the rampage again, in a very dangerous way. But he was stopped," Ahern said in Dublin. "It just shows you exactly what we are trying to get away from in Northern Ireland."

"No move forward in Northern Ireland is easy. We've learned that over 10 years," said Blair, who has closely cooperated with Ahern in brokering compromise in Northern Ireland since both premiers rose to power in 1997. "And it's not because the people, or indeed, the leaders in Northern Ireland want it to be so, but because each step towards a different and better future is taken alongside the memory of a wretched and divisive past."

Stone was responsible for one of Northern Ireland's most dramatic days _ March 16, 1988, when he launched a solo gun-and-grenade strike on an IRA funeral. He killed three mourners, among them an IRA man, and wounded about 60 other people before a pursuing Catholic mob surrounded and badly beat him.

Stone was paroled from prison in 2000 under terms of the 1998 peace pact, which permitted early releases for more than 500 convicted members of the IRA and outlawed Protestant paramilitary groups. He took part in a televised discussion with relatives of a Catholic man he had shot to death in a different attack.

Despite Paisley's refusal, Hain said his words were sufficient to keep the assembly intact until the end of January, when Britain plans to dissolve it anyway.

An election to a new assembly is scheduled March 7. Britain expects the members to elect all 12 members of the administration, to be led by Paisley and McGuinness, on March 14. If this happened, Britain would transfer control of Northern Ireland's 13 government departments to the administration March 26.

Ecuador's Presidential Vote Too Close To Call (AFP)

By Patrick Moser

AFP, November 24, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador -- Leftist Rafael Correa gained ground over conservative Alvaro Noboa, but the margin remains too narrow to predict a presidential winner, pollsters said yesterday.

A Cedatos/Gallup Ecuadorean voter intention poll was made public yesterday.

"With such results, it is not possible to predict the final outcome of the November 26 election," the polling institute said of the survey, which has a three-percentage-point margin of error.

But the poll reflected a dramatic surge in support for leftist economist Mr. Correa, who had 41 percent to Mr. Noboa's 59 percent on Oct. 30. Last week the pollsters had Mr. Correa getting 48 percent, trailing his rival by four points.

Over the past days, both candidates have gone all out to attract undecided voters, which Cedatos/Gallup said accounted for 17 percent of the 9.2 million Ecuadoreans eligible to vote.

Each has warned that his rival's victory will have disastrous consequences for the South American country, which has had seven presidents over the past 10 years.

Mr. Noboa claims his leftist rival wants to install a communist dictatorship closely tied to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a fiercely anti-American leader. That, he warned, would lead to a bloody uprising.

"Correa wants an insurrection, a civil war in which the poor will die," Mr. Noboa, 56, told cheering supporters at his final electoral rally on Thursday night.

Mr. Correa for his part claimed that Mr. Noboa, Ecuador's wealthiest man, would run the country as his private estate.

The leftist warned his supporters to be on the lookout for a repetition of the electoral fraud he claims marred the Oct. 15 first round, which was led by Mr. Noboa.

Both have run populist campaigns, vowing to improve the lot of the millions of Ecuadoreans who live on less than $2 a day in a country that pumps out more than half a million barrels of crude daily.

Bible in hand, falling to his knees and invoking the name of God, Mr. Noboa has vowed that if elected he would build 300,000 homes a year for the poor -- an average of almost 1,000 a day.

Portraying himself as a champion of the poor and his rival as "a communist devil," the conservative billionaire handed out wheelchairs and food and openly distributed cash at his rallies.

Mr. Noboa has said he would encourage foreign investment, tighten ties with the United States and distance the country from Venezuela and communist Cuba.

He also said the 400 U.S. troops stationed at a base in the Pacific port of Manta would be welcome to stay when their lease runs out in 2009.

Mr. Correa, on the other hand, said he would not renew the lease, but insisted he wanted to stay on good terms with Washington and continue bilateral trade, as long as it is "just and mutually profitable."

His strong showing in opinion polls has stirred unease in financial markets worried about his promise to revise contracts with foreign oil companies and to renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt.

After trailing Mr. Noboa by four points in the first round, Mr. Correa distanced himself somewhat from Mr. Chavez, but stressed he remained a friend of the Venezuelan president. He also eased up on his criticism of President Bush, after he had called the U.S. president a "dimwit."

Morales Steps Up Pressure For Land Redistribution (WT)

By Martin Arostegui

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

SANTA CRUZ, Bolivia -- Indians, coca farmers and landless peasants are heeding a call by leftist President Evo Morales to surround Congress to press for radical land redistribution that is opposed by landowners and farmers.

From Bolivia's highlands hundreds of miles away, protesters are descending on the capital, La Paz, for a series of demonstrations next week targeting the Senate, which refuses to pass the land measure.

"We have been struggling for years to regain control of our resources and are prepared to apply communal justice against the corrupt senators that stand in our way," said Juan Choque, the leader of a peasant group that started out two weeks ago for La Paz from the eastern town of Yapacani.

The new law is a centerpiece of government plans to redistribute millions of acres to Indian supporters.

It has been approved by the lower house of Congress, but the Senate has refused.

"We will not pass a law that destroys this country's productive system" said Senate Vice President Jose Villavicencio, who represents the northeast province of Pando. He accuses the government of financing the mobilization of 10,000 Qechua and Aymara Indians from around the country.

The measure is strongly opposed by landowners and farmers in Bolivia's fertile eastern lowlands.

Mr. Morales initiated the protest against the Senate, saying it "must be forced to approve this law that revindicates the original indigenous people of Bolivia."

Agriculture Minister Hugo Salvatierra has been giving away tractors donated by Venezuela to peasants rallying at various points along the marching routes stretching about 400 miles.

In the Senate, the rightist Podemos party and smaller centrist parties hold a majority of 15 seats over 12 controlled by Mr. Morales' Movement to Socialism (MAS).

MAS is drafting a new constitution that would abolish the upper chamber. Podemos leader Jorge Quiroga has charged that Mr. Morales is redesigning the system of government to perpetuate himself in power by "following the radical example of Hugo Chavez in Venezuela."

The Senate is also holding up final approval of a military agreement signed with Venezuela last August to build major army bases in eastern Bolivia, where an opposition-led referendum for regional self-rule won with more than 70 percent of the vote in July and separatist sentiment is growing.

"If they close down the Senate, the central government is finished for us, and we will have to fight to defend our own democracy," the Santa Cruz civic committee president, German Antelo, told 8,000 people in an anti-government protest earlier this week.

The rally was also attended by a group of independent miners from the western mountain province of Huanuni, where a revolt against the nationalization of the mines resulted in 17 deaths last month.

Colombian Senator Faces Down Paramilitaries (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA — Some may object to his politics, but few question the courage of leftist Colombian Sen. Gustavo Petro, whose five-year campaign to prod the government into investigating elected officials' links to illegal paramilitary groups finally bore fruit this month.

Colombia's Supreme Court issued arrest orders for three sitting members of Congress and one former member as well as an ex-governor on charges including murder, electoral fraud and diversion of public funds in collusion with right-wing militia leaders. All charged are from the northern state of Sucre and all but the ex-governor, Salvador Arana, are behind bars.

Arrests of as many as 20 more Congress members may take place soon, officials said this week.

From the floor of the legislature, Petro, a former guerrilla, has declared repeatedly that members of Congress are up to their necks in illegal activities with the right-wing militias in Sucre state and has called on President Alvaro Uribe's government to investigate them.

It has come at great personal risk in a country where opposition to the militias often is a death sentence. The Supreme Court also faces retribution for issuing the orders, as does Prosecutor General Mario Iguaran for requesting them.

Petro routinely receives death threats, and doesn't go anywhere without a security escort of as many as 10 police officers. "They can kill me at any time without the least moral or ethical reluctance," Petro said. "My assassin could be sitting next to me in the Senate."

One of those accused, Sen. Alvaro Garcia Romero, was charged with having ordered militia leaders to conduct a massacre in 2000 and murder an election monitor in 1997.

The arrests came at a delicate point in Colombia's demobilization process, after the surrender of about 31,000 paramilitary fighters since 2003 and as the Uribe government is beginning to prosecute their leaders.

The militias were formed in the 1980s by farmers and ranchers to defend against leftist guerrilla attacks. But some of the private armies took over much of the nation's drug traffic; they were labeled terrorist organizations by the United States in the 1990s.

Recent revelations indicate that although militia leaders gave up their arms, many retain control of criminal networks that run illicit businesses with the aid of the local and national politicians they have co-opted.

"What is happening is that a large part of Colombia now feels under attack by the paramilitaries, and business interests feel threatened," said Petro, 46, in an interview at his apartment complex in northern Bogota, as 10 police officers stood guard below. "Maybe this is why the charges are being brought now."

Another factor could be the information contained in a laptop computer, seized in a government raid this year, allegedly documenting the activities of paramilitary leader Rodrigo Tovar, alias "Jorge 40." Data in the laptop were said to chronicle several murders, continued militia activities and politician contacts made after Tovar demobilized, a sign to critics that demobilization has done little to curb the paramilitaries' power.

A Supreme Court official confirmed to The Times in an interview last week that evidence from the computer was considered in the cases. "It was just one element of evidence, but we had no reason to think it was all an invention," the official said.

In exchange for electoral support, politicians help the paramilitaries "accumulate wealth" by easing false documentation of property transfers, diverting or kicking back public works contracts, and putting the local police at the paramilitaries' service, Petro said.

Even fellow legislators who oppose Petro, a former M-19 guerrilla, credit him for bringing the debate over paramilitary ties to the public's attention.

"He brought these cases in Sucre to Congress, mounted the investigations and said publicly, 'This is happening,' " said Sen. Gina Parody, who sits on the opposite side of the aisle but has joined with Petro in denouncing the paramilitaries' cozy relations with some legislators. "Denouncing this illegality is very risky."

All of those charged are allies of President Uribe, whose administration is facing one of its biggest crises because of the political damage that further revelations and arrests could bring.

Much damage has been done. Prosecutor Iguaran told reporters that the crisis confronting the Uribe government was worse than that faced by then-President Ernesto Samper in 1994 when it was alleged that his campaign received money from the Cali drug cartel.

There is no public evidence linking Uribe to paramilitaries, but the arrests have fueled criticism that he has been too easy on militia leaders in the pacification process, promising lenient sentences in exchange for disarmament and confessions. Some wonder why allegations that surfaced five years ago have taken so long to lead to charges.

Back then, before demobilization began, paramilitary leader Salvatore Mancuso boasted that 35% of Congress was loyal to him and other paramilitary chiefs.

"The issue facing Colombia is the nature and reach of paramilitarism," said Cynthia Arnson, head of the Latin American program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington. "It's a military force that has been demobilized, but it's also a mafia-like criminal organization that has penetrated the legal economy and begun to subvert legitimate political institutions."

Petro's detractors say he is inconsistent, and less troubled by infractions by left-wing guerrillas than those by right-wing paramilitaries. One high-ranking Uribe official, while expressing admiration for Petro's outspokenness, said the senator practiced "relative morality," adding, "There are no good deaths and bad deaths."

DOJ_NMG_0098527

A native of Zipaquira radicalized in part by the overthrow of Chilean President Salvador Allende in 1973, Petro joined the urban guerrilla group M-19 at age 17. He was elected to his town's city council at 21, keeping his guerrilla membership a secret until then-President Belisario Betancur and rebels signed a peace accord in 1984.

But the peace was short-lived. Petro survived torture and spent 18 months in jail from 1985 to 1987.

Shortly after he was imprisoned, M-19 rebels seized the Palace of Justice in November 1985, a takeover that Petro says he knew nothing about beforehand. The army's retaking of the building left dozens dead.

Upon his release from prison, Petro spent three years in hiding. "If the army had found me, they would have killed me," he said.

Petro resurfaced in 1990, when President Virgilio Barco Vargas declared another peace accord.

Petro was elected to Congress from Bogota in 1991 on the M-19 ticket. But a series of slayings of his former comrades sent him fleeing again in 1994, this time to Europe.

He returned to Colombia and was elected again to Congress in 1998. He was reelected in 2002 before moving to the Senate this year as a candidate for the Democratic Pole, a party he co-founded. He got the second-most votes of any senatorial candidate.

Petro said his voice is no longer a lonely one. "Now there are many voices and many allies. Half the Congress wants this investigation to continue. The news media fill their pages with the allegations against the paramilitaries."

Uncovering the truth and proceeding with investigations are crucial to Colombia's democratic progress, he said.

"This is a crisis that either can lead us to national fragmentation, a Balkanization as in Yugoslavia, or to the construction of a real republic."

Chile's Student Activists: A Course In Democracy (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile -- When the Class of 2006 graduates in a few weeks, its members will look back at a year in which some of the most important lessons took place outside the classroom.

In their black and white school uniforms, they launched what became known here as the "Penguin Revolution," filling the streets, calling for educational reforms, occupying school buildings and sparking a nationwide debate that was quickly labeled a milestone for the nation's young democracy.

Extracurricular activities for student leaders this year meant negotiating with senior government officials. When they text-messaged friends, at times it was to organize rallies that attracted as many as 800,000 people. A few became nationally known public figures in their own right.

"Graduation will be hard, and there are going to be a lot of emotions that come back from this year," said Karina Delfino, 17, who became one of the voices of the student movement during her senior year. "All the friends made, the difficulties and the successes -- this was one stage in life that has been good, but very tough. The only thing I can do now is to try to end this stage as best I can and get ready for whatever is next."

That's the question many high school-age Chileans face, as the school year winds down with the approach of a Southern Hemisphere summer: How do they follow a year like this one?

The students' actions turned them into the most powerful social movement since the strict military dictatorship of Gen. Augusto Pinochet was replaced by democracy 16 years ago. They forced the government to increase education spending and -- more important for many of the protesters -- prompted it to reexamine the roots of an educational system flawed by vast inequalities between the country's rich and poor populations.

Not everyone has approved of the students' methods at all times, but it's difficult to find anyone who hasn't come to accept them as a significant part of the country's social and political landscape.

"I believe their greatest achievement was to change the way people think of the youth of the country," said Rodrigo Cornejo, with the Chilean Observatory of Educational Policy at the University of Chile. "A lot of people thought the young people were simply individualistic, selfish consumers. But the long-term changes the students were pressing for this year weren't going to directly benefit them -- it was for their younger brothers and sisters."

Many of the students don't think of the past year in such epic terms. As Delfino's school day ended on Wednesday, the 3,000 students at her school poured onto the sidewalks of central Santiago and lingered at bus and subway stops, naturally dividing themselves into the broad cliques that their school uniforms can't erase: jocks, Goths, drama kids, Barbies, hard-cores. Some sat on curbs and lighted cigarettes. Some jammed the headphones of MP3 players into their ears. Most talked, and the conversations did not, as a rule, address weighty matters of social justice.

They are all too young to remember Pinochet's dictatorship, which subdued opposition groups with tactics that ranged from intimidation to murder and torture. All their lives, their teachers, parents and government leaders have emphasized that they live in a hard-won democracy, where everyone has a voice.

Instead of plotting a grand revolution, the students said, they simply decided to take what they'd been taught at face value. If Chile's economy was so good -- as they had been hearing repeatedly during the presidential election campaigns in 2005 -- why did some schools lack essential supplies, like books and desks? Why should public schools be managed at the municipal level when that system encourages disparities between rich and poor neighborhoods? If Chile is a participatory democracy, why not participate?

"As the movement started to grow, we had everyone involved -- hippies, evangelicals, all the groups," said Delfino, who belongs to her school's social circle of organizers, those drawn to student government and academic organizations. "We all wanted the same thing, which was change. So we were trying to respect different opinions while at the same time working for consensus. That's all."

The movement began last year with inconclusive petitions to the government of President Ricardo Lagos. After the January election of Michelle Bachelet, a Socialist who won by campaigning for social justice and compassion for the poor and vulnerable, many student leaders began the new academic year with optimism. They waited for Bachelet to address education reform during a May state of the nation speech; when she didn't, a new sort of protest movement immediately blossomed.

"I'd leave school in the afternoons and go to the national student assembly," Delfino said. "Other days, when I had tests, I'd study at night and sleep three or four hours, then go to class in the morning and do the same thing again. My friends talked about 'The Ghost of Karina.' "

The day after Bachelet's speech, an all-girls public school was taken over by pupils. Thousands of students boycotted classes. Soon private school students joined in the protests, while university students and teachers unions also voiced support. The Education Ministry soon began holding negotiations with student leaders, and Bachelet eventually promised more funding to help the poorest students and created a panel, which included student representatives, to discuss broad reforms of the national educational system.

The strain of juggling all that with academics took a toll on some students, which they are confronting now. MarÃ-a Huerta, a movement leaders who attends a technical school here, isn't sure whether she will be able to get into a university next year.

"My mother was bothered by this, because I was spending so much time with the student organizations and not in class," said Huerta, 19. "We have a very close family, but they're all worried about me. My mom is worried about my future, my cousin is worried about my safety, and my uncle doesn't talk to me anymore -- he doesn't agree at all with what I'm doing."

Students such as Huerta and Delfino, who got a strong taste of civic involvement this year, are trying to figure out whether they want to make a career of social involvement. Both said they are considering studying sociology or public administration, but they still aren't sure how they will apply what they learned outside of class.

"The decision I have to make is whether I want to try to make changes through working directly with the community, or through politics," Huerta said. "If I work in the community, I can change the lives of a small group of people. With politics, you can do it on a macro level. But I don't want to join a political party."

Huerta continued to debate the advantages and disadvantages of each choice, coming to the conclusion that she'll have to give it more thought.

Like most leaders of the Penguin Revolution, she has more time to think about such questions now: Tensions have eased considerably as the end of the year approaches. Some students continue to periodically occupy schools because they believe the government is implementing its promises too slowly.

Public opinion of the students isn't as high as it was a few months ago, when polls indicated that about 75 percent of the country backed them, but it is still generally positive. Huerta said she hopes the movement she helped start will be able to regain its strength next year, as a new class of students takes over leadership posts.

"My age group started it, with the idea that you can be supportive of Chile and democracy without having to agree with everything the government does, that it's okay to be critical," Huerta said. "Now we have to see where the students in the first and second years of the high schools take it. I'm eager to see it."

Canada Arrests "Illegal" Spy From Russian Intelligence (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

Canada's security service recently arrested a deep-cover Russian intelligence officer posing as a Canadian citizen in what officials say is a rare capture of an "illegal" spy.

Court papers identified the man as Paul William Hampel and said he was a member of Russia's foreign intelligence service, or SVR, and an "illegal" spy operating without the protection of diplomatic cover.

A Canadian federal court report made public earlier this week stated that the Canadian Security and Intelligence Services thinks Mr. Hampel "is a danger to the security of Canada" and was thus "inadmissible" to the country.

Mr. Hampel was arrested at Montreal's Pierre Elliot Trudeau Airport on Nov. 14 and found to be carrying three passports that authorities said were obtained fraudulently using a Canadian birth certificate.

He also was found carrying about $6,876 worth of five different currencies, along with several bank and credit cards, index cards containing historical data on Canada, encrypted prepaid cell phone cards and a shortwave radio.

Mr. Hampel is being held on a little-used national security law and faces deportation or prosecution for fraud in a secret trial.

A U.S. official said the capture was a coup for the Canadians, since deep-cover spies are very hard to find.

"Identifying and subsequently catching an Illegal is the creme de la creme of the counterintelligence business," the official said.

The Canadian report noted that in 1996 two Russians were identified as an SVR illegal team and deported.

The FBI has not uncovered any SVR illegals in the United States, despite claims that spying by Russian intelligence in recent years is at Cold War levels.

The CIA identified a KGB illegal in 1989 posing as a Finnish national named Reino Gikman, who was photographed meeting State Department official Felix Bloch, a suspected Russian mole in the department who was never prosecuted.

"Hampel's infiltration into Canada and development of a Canadian legend based on an identity created by the SVR has permitted Hampel to abuse the integrity of the Canadian system, including citizenship and all its inherent privileges," the report said. "As a documented Canadian citizen, Hampel has been operating covertly on behalf of the SVR and, as such, poses a danger to Canada's national security and Canada's interests internationally."

The report said the use of Canadian documents "provided him with the ability to covertly further the interests of the SVR for over a decade both within Canada and abroad."

Georgi Mamedov, Russia's ambassador to Canada, told a Canadian television station that he had no information about the case, and he sought to highlight Russia's cooperation with Canada in the war on terrorism.

In Moscow, SVR spokesman Sergey Ivanov told the Interfax News Agency: "Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service, like any other foreign intelligence service, does not comment on whether an individual is or is not involved in its activities."

Bloc Quebecois Supports Canada PM (BBC)

DOJ_NMG_0098530

The leader of Canada's separatist Bloc Quebecois has said his party will back a government motion that Quebecers form a "nation within a united Canada".

Gilles Duceppe said Prime Minister Stephen Harper's motion was a victory for separatist aspirations in Quebec.

Quebec, mostly Francophone, has held two referendums on separation, in 1980 and 1995, but rejected the idea.

Mr Harper's Conservatives won Canada's general election in January to end 12 years of Liberal rule.

In a parliamentary debate on Friday, Mr Duceppe said the Bloc will join Canada's other opposition parties in supporting the motion that Mr Harper announced on Wednesday.

"We are delighted by the fact that Canada will become the first country to officially recognise the Quebec nation," Mr Duceppe said.

The government motion says that the House of Commons should "recognise that Quebecers constitute a nation within a united Canada".

The Bloc Quebecois is the third-largest party in the national parliament after the Conservatives and Liberals.

The debate over Quebec's status was reopened earlier in the week when the Bloc announced it would table a motion in parliament calling for recognition of Quebecers as a nation.

Gilles Duceppe's Bloc Quebecois is Canada's third-largest party There was no mention of Canada.

Mr Harper then introduced his motion on Wednesday.

"The real question is simple," he said in the House of Commons. "Do Quebecois make up a nation of their own in a united Canada? The answer is yes.

"Do Quebecois make up a nation independent from Canada? The answer is no and will always be no."

On Thursday the Bloc tabled its motion but with an amendment to say that Quebecers should be recognised as a nation that is "currently within Canada".

On Friday, Mr Harper welcomed the Bloc's decision to back the government.

"This is the third position the Bloc has taken on this in three days," Mr Harper said.

"They moved a motion, they made an amendment to a motion and now they're supporting our motion."

He said the motion would not amend the constitution. "This is merely a declaration of recognition and an act of reconciliation."

Constitutional experts say the motion carries no legal weight and would be unlikely to give Quebec separatists a lever to extract more political powers from Ottawa.

The motion is expected to pass easily in parliament next week now that it has the backing of all the major parties.

Rwanda Ends Diplomatic Ties With France (AP)

By Angela Doland, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Rwanda severed diplomatic ties with France on Friday in response to a French judge's decision to issue international arrest warrants for nine ranking Rwandans suspected of plotting the 1994 killing of the African nation's president.

The French Foreign Ministry said it regretted Rwanda's decision and was "taking all necessary arrangements."

France's ambassador in Rwanda, Dominique Decherf, will leave the country Saturday and the 29 other embassy personnel in the capital, Kigali, were leaving by Monday evening, embassy security chief Serge Kulmicht told The Associated Press.

On Wednesday, a French investigating judge issued arrest warrants for nine ranking Rwandans suspected of plotting the downing of then-President Juvenal Habyarimana's airplane on April 6, 1994 — an act that sparked the country's genocide.

Late Thursday, Rwanda withdrew its ambassador, Emmanuel Ndagijimanam, from Paris for consultations, diplomat Parfait Gahamanyi said. The officials targeted by the French judge are close to Rwanda's current president, Paul Kagame, and the decision has enflamed tensions.

Rwandan Justice Minister Tharcisse Karugarama said the move was a response to French "bullying."

"There is no reason why there should be diplomatic relations with a country that is actually attempting to destabilize the institutions of Rwanda's government," Karugarama told The Associated Press.

French anti-terrorism judge Jean-Louis Bruguiere suspects that nine Rwandans were responsible for plotting the assassination or actually shooting down Habyarimana's airplane.

Bruguiere — renowned for tracking down the renowned terrorist Carlos the Jackal — is investigating the case because the crew on the downed plane was French. The families of the pilot, co-pilot and mechanic, who all died in the crash, filed a suit in France in 1998.

After the attack, militants from the Hutu ethnic majority, known as interahamwe, quickly set up roadblocks across the capital, Kigali, and on April 7 began killing Tutsis and moderate Hutus. More than 500,000 people were killed in 100 days.

Kagame's Rwanda Patriotic Front, or RPF, toppled the Hutu extremists and ended the genocide.

The question of who shot down the plane has been a central mystery of the genocide. Speculation has focused on Kagame's largely Tutsi force, or hard-line Hutus hoping to encourage mass violence against Tutsis.

According to Bruguiere's order, Kagame allegedly instructed his group to down the aircraft.

"The final order to attack the presidential plane was given by Paul Kagame himself during a meeting held in Mulindi on March 31, 1994," Bruguiere wrote in the warrant request.

France grants immunity to acting heads of state, preventing judicial authorities from issuing a warrant for Kagame. Those targeted include armed forces chief James Kabarebe and army chief of staff Charles Kayonga. Warrants also were issued for those suspected by the French judge of attacking the plane — Franck Nziza, believed to be a captain in the presidential guard, and Eric Hakizimana, of the secret service.

Kagame called the judge "an impostor, a politician" in an interview Wednesday with France-Culture radio. He also promised that ties between both countries would suffer.

France annulled Rwanda's entire $57 million bilateral debt this year. But relations between France and Rwanda have been strained for years, with Kagame accusing France of doing too little to stop the genocide.

World Court Official Reports Evidence On Darfur Criminals (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

The International Criminal Court has found sufficient evidence to identify the perpetrators of some of the worst atrocities in Sudan's Darfur region, and the probe offers "reasonable grounds to believe" that crimes against humanity were committed, chief prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo told the annual meeting of the court's member states in The Hague.

"We selected incidents during the period in which the gravest crimes occurred," he said Thursday in a report on his activities over the past year. "Based on the evidence collected, we identified those most responsible for the crimes." Moreno-Ocampo did not name the targets of the investigation, which he said is nearly complete.

In a telephone interview before he addressed representatives of the 103 nations that have ratified the 1998 agreement creating the court, he said the atrocities included "rape, torture, willful murder, sexual and inhuman violent acts, extra-judicial killings and the forcible transfer and persecution of civilians."

Moreno-Ocampo's investigators have collected thousands of documents and conducted 70 visits in 17 countries, including Sudan, since June 2005. His teams have interviewed judges, prosecutors and Sudanese investigators, as well as a top Sudanese military official and a senior political official. Sudanese officials shared the outcome of a government inquiry, and the Sudanese army provided its analysis of what had happened, he said.

"To define the truth is important, and to define the responsibility is important, to prevent it from recurring," he said in the interview. He added that court procedures required him to investigate "incriminating and also exonerating circumstances."

Moreno-Ocampo said a priority was reaching victims, although he chose not to go to the Darfur region itself, so as not to endanger victims or witnesses. However, he was able to find them elsewhere, he said, including in neighboring Chad and in Sudan outside Darfur. Investigators screened 600 potential witnesses and conducted in-depth interviews with more than 100 people. The prosecutor must determine whether the Sudan government is carrying out an inquiry into the same incidents and individuals. If there are not "genuine national proceedings," he said, he will present his evidence to the judges.

"We are almost ready," he said.

Moreno-Ocampo added that other challenges involving health, development and security needed to be confronted simultaneously by other world institutions and states.

As many as 450,000 people have died from disease and violence, and 2.5 million have been displaced in the three-year-old conflict, which began when rebels from African tribes rose up against the Arab-led central government in a huge area of western Sudan. The government has been accused of supporting militias of Arab nomads known as Janjaweed in retaliation against civilians in Darfur. Government officials deny arming the militias, which the United Nations and others have accused of carrying out the worst atrocities.

Moreno-Ocampo's comments in The Hague coincided with charges by the top U.N. humanitarian official that Sudan is deliberately hindering relief efforts in Darfur and is arming militias.

The emergency relief coordinator, Jan Egeland, told the Security Council that the coming weeks might "be make or break for our lifeline to more than 3 million people. The situation in Darfur is closer to the abyss than I have witnessed since my first visit in 2004."

"Time is against us," Secretary General Kofi Annan said.

Officials from the United Nations, Europe and the United States have expressed concern about what they describe as a recent shift in Janjaweed tactics, from attacking rebels to targeting people in refugee and displacement camps. Egeland, who recently visited Sudan, said the burning of villages and attacks on women and children reminded him of 2004, when the push to drive Darfur civilians from their homes was at its most violent.

A tentative agreement to boost the 7,000-member African Union force with 10,000 more U.N. troops was reached last week in Ethiopia. Sudan, which has opposed deployment of U.N. troops, has asked for a delay until Wednesday.

A senior U.S. official who spoke on condition of anonymity said the Sudanese government fears that U.N. troops "will discover more evidence. What they don't realize is that there is more than enough evidence now."

Andrew Natsios, the U.S. presidential special envoy to Sudan, said the United States suspects that some Sudanese officials are bent on "a military solution," given three major defeats since August in their push against the rebels. He told a forum at the Brookings Institution this week that the Sudanese military has "now mobilized the Arab militias to attack soft targets, which is to say villages and the displaced camps." If this continues, he warned, no one in the United States would have faith in a negotiating process.

"There is no doubt that the Janjaweed and those who are committing atrocities are an extension of the Sudanese military," Natsios said.

In the interview, Moreno-Ocampo said he was struck that Sudanese witnesses said they were pleased and "honored" to provide testimony. "The hope for justice is one of the few things that the victims of Darfur still have," he said. "It is very important for us to keep this hope alive and show there will be justice for them. We care about that."

Mass Graves Uncovered In Congo (AP)

By Eddy Isango

AP, November 24, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo -- The United Nations said yesterday its investigators had discovered three mass graves at a northeast Congo military camp containing the bodies of 30 persons -- including women and children -- who were thought to have been killed by soldiers.

The dead were found at the camp in eastern Ituri province after witnesses accused troops of killing dozens of people two months ago, U.N. spokesman Kemal Saiki said.

Mr. Saiki said the graves had been opened and the bodies would be exhumed for a team of investigators that includes U.N. human rights officials and Congolese military authorities.

It was not immediately clear what sparked the killings.

DOJ_NMG_0098533

Much of Ituri province, home to dozens of powerful local militia groups, has remained lawless and violent despite peace deals to end the Democratic Republic of the Congo's 1998-2002 civil war. Tens of thousands of people have died as a result of the fighting there.

Congo's army has been accused by rights groups and residents of rape, pillage and forcing civilians into labor.

The government is struggling to rebuild the postwar force into a unified military composed of rebels, militias and soldiers who fought each other for years.

The discovery of the graves came at a time of increased tension in Congo over the results of last month's presidential runoff.

Interim President Joseph Kabila was declared the winner, receiving 58 percent of the vote, compared with nearly 42 percent for former rebel leader Jean-Pierre Bemba, who charged that the election was tainted by fraud.

A hearing on vote fraud charges has been delayed after part of Congo's supreme court was burned Tuesday during gunfire and street fighting among Mr. Bemba's supporters.

Fighters loyal to Mr. Bemba were leaving the capital yesterday after the government ordered those troops to return to barracks outside the city, officials and witnesses said.

A convoy of trucks filled with dozens of fighters could be seen rolling out of Kinshasa toward the nearby town of Maluku. Mr. Bemba's fighters first began leaving Thursday.

Mr. Kabila's government issued the order to leave earlier this week.

Mr. Bemba, whose forces have clashed in Kinshasa twice with those of Mr. Kabila in election-related violence, has hundreds of fighters here, many serving as his personal bodyguards.

Foreign Aid, Revised (NYT)

Like many of its predecessors, the Bush administration wants to reform foreign aid. These programs sorely need better coordination and predictability — and a clear way to measure whether they are working. Randall Tobias, the new director of foreign assistance, is a good manager and could impose much-needed coherence.

But there are worrisome signs that the administration is also planning deep cuts in antipoverty spending as aid is supposedly reoriented to promote democracy and fight terrorism. A little-noticed statement on the Web site of the Agency for International Development says the goal is to “focus all U.S. foreign assistance on helping to build and sustain democratic and well-governed states.”

Of the nearly $24 billion requested by the State Department for foreign aid this year, a little over $1 billion is devoted to democracy programs, including training legislative staffs, helping reform courts, and working with women’s and business organizations. Privately, officials say that number is likely to rise substantially in next year’s budget request, while the roughly $3.7 billion devoted to antipoverty programs — fighting disease, promoting education, providing microcredit loans — is likely to fall to make up the difference.

While foreign aid spending is up over all in the Bush administration, the increase has come almost entirely in four programs: aid to Iraq and Afghanistan, the 15-country global AIDS initiative and the new Millennium Challenge Corporation, which seeks to help well-governed poor countries.

In a worrisome sign, money for programs to address childhood disease and maternal mortality is down by one-third in this year’s budget request. The administration is also cutting antipoverty spending in Latin America and Africa to pay for programs in Islamic countries, considered to be front-line states in the war against terror.

Promoting democracy and fighting terrorism are laudable goals. But such work needs to come on top of — not instead of — financing antipoverty programs, which save hundreds of thousands of lives and earn untold good will for the United States. There is also little indication that America knows how to build democracy. There are too many worrisome reports of programs to encourage privatization turning into boondoggles for contractors, or new anticorruption agencies dissolved or made toothless by those in power.

This is no time to cut off the world's poor, especially for programs with such an uncertain record. If the administration will not restore a sensible balance to foreign aid, the new Congress should.

Intolerance In Europe (WP)

EUROPE'S MUSLIM communities increasingly are portrayed -- especially by European media -- as havens for religious intolerance that flourish thanks to the overly tolerant policies of liberal governments. It's true that until relatively recently, some Western European governments shrank from confronting clerics or others who promoted extremist ideology or encouraged terrorism. It's also true that some European artists and politicians have been threatened or even killed for criticizing or mocking Islam. But another important part of the dangerous increase in tensions between Europeans and Muslims is the blatant bigotry of many mainstream political leaders, journalists and other elites against Islam and its followers.

Sometimes the bigots portray their crude attacks on Muslim beliefs and culture as a defense of freedom of speech -- as when a Danish newspaper last year chose to publish gratuitously offensive cartoons about the prophet Muhammad. Sometimes they claim to be promoting better communication, as when British parliamentarian Jack Straw recently asked Muslim women to remove their veils when visiting his office. Luckily for the enemies of cynicism and disingenuousness, there is also the Dutch government -- which no longer bothers to disguise its ugly prejudice.

On Nov. 17, just five days before Wednesday's hard-fought general election in the Netherlands, the incumbent center-right government promised that, if reelected, it would introduce legislation to ban the wearing of burqas and other facial coverings in most public places, including courts, schools, trains and even streets. The ruling Christian Democratic Appeal party finished first in the voting, but the makeup of the next government remains unclear. If enacted, the prohibition would affect no more than a few dozen of the country's 1 million Muslims, who make up some 6 percent of the population. But the point is symbolic: A country famous for tolerating prostitution, drug use, euthanasia and public nudity considers Muslim veiling beyond the pale.

Rita Verdonk, the immigration minister who is rapidly becoming the face of the new Dutch intolerance, claimed that the measure was needed for "reasons of public order, security and protection of citizens." Nothing subtle in that connection: As far as Ms. Verdonk is concerned, burqas and terrorism are synonymous.

Like other Europeans, the Dutch have reason to worry about terrorism; the country has been traumatized by the assassinations of a prominent right-wing politician and a right-wing filmmaker in the past few years. But attacking Muslim culture -- as opposed to those who practice or promote violent acts -- is no way to diminish the threat. It won't be surprising if more Dutch Muslims respond to their government by putting on burqas -- or by answering intolerance with intolerance.

What's At Stake In Mexico City (WP)

By Enrique Krauze

Mexico is a country that is, all at once, pre-modern, modern, anti-modern and postmodern. This situation can have certain advantages, as those who appreciate the cultural mosaic of Mexico know, but there are times when it can be not just difficult but explosive.

Last Monday (the anniversary of the start of the Mexican Revolution of 1910, which lasted 10 years and cost a million lives) modern politics in Mexico was silenced by an alliance between the pre-modern and the anti-modern in a postmodern spectacle that could lead to widespread social revolt and that has impeded the country's democratic progress. Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador -- the charismatic caudillo who has come to believe himself Mexico's messiah incarnate -- gathered his faithful for his anointment as the "legitimate president" of Mexico.

Even though he has lost much support because of his post-election behavior, Lopez Obrador still controls several organizations that have shown themselves capable of paralyzing a part of Mexico City with demonstrations and sit-ins. They consist of state employee unions, peddlers of the informal economic sector, unofficial taxi drivers and hundreds of radical groups.

Where do they get their money? Until now the budgetary sources of the Federal District of Mexico City have sufficed, managed at the discretion of L?pez Obrador's PRD (Democratic Revolutionary Party), just as it was taught by its elder brother, the old ruling PRI. These groups mingle with anti-modern militant movements, which aren't exactly guerrilla forces but do represent a kind of "soft revolution."

It is a mobilization of salaried contingents that not only will harass incoming President Felipe Calder?n and his cabinet but will also try to disrupt everyday life for inhabitants of the country's most sensitive regions. This will be under the guise of a supposed "peaceful resistance" against the "usurpation" that many people still think took place in July's razor-thin election but that L?pez Obrador and his party (who won impressive victories in the legislature) were unable to prove in the courts.

This soft revolution is an enemy of democratic life and may even make dead letters of laws eventually passed in the National Congress. If the PRI (the third force but the counterbalance on the scales of Congress) decides to support Calderon and his National Action Party (PAN) in the reforms that the country needs to create jobs, Lopez Obrador's militants will still be able to boycott them by taking to the streets to block traffic and disrupt business. In its extreme version, it might try to replicate what's been happening over the past six months in Oaxaca, where a revolutionary group of teachers, infiltrated by the residual guerrilla forces that have always existed in the mountains of southeastern Mexico, has been reenacting on a small scale the scripts of Mao Zedong's Cultural Revolution.

There remains the possibility of the restricted, legitimate use of public force, but this is an extremely delicate point in Mexico because of the trauma of the student massacre of 1968. Thus the goal of L?pez Obrador's movement will be to make the country ungovernable and to achieve the eventual resignation of Felipe Calderon. It's unlikely that he'll succeed, but not impossible.

Part of the solution to this delicate situation lies in the hands of President Calder?n. If he quickly shows himself to be the leader that his predecessor, Vicente Fox, neither could nor wanted to be, Calderon will be able to remove the shadow of illegitimacy and establish the foundation for a stable government. He needs to surround himself with a capable cabinet that will carry out measures in the most sensitive areas (security, employment, corruption). Calder?n seems to be an intelligent politician, has parliamentary experience and has his priorities straight. But I'm convinced that much-needed concord depends on more than him.

In this regard, the left bears the greatest responsibility, especially that part of the left with ties to the PRD in the Federal District government and various state governments, the representatives and senators of Congress, and a multitude of journalists, academics and intellectuals. These people need to distance themselves from the caudillo and modernize their ideological platform along the lines of European social democracy.

There are precedents for this kind of transformation. In Spain, when Felipe Gonz?lez came to power in 1978, he renounced Marxist dogma and embraced the market economy, which was a condition for the country's eventual entry into the European Community and the impressive development that it has since achieved. In Chile, socialism evolved toward modern ideas and has presided over a period of impressive growth and social well-being. These are two very successful reforms, both of them counter to the anachronistic "21st-century socialism" of Hugo Ch?vez and Fidel Castro. But in both Spain and Chile, the process of maturing took place after civil wars and dictatorships. It would be a tragedy if Mexico had to go through that hell for its left to modernize. Unfortunately, at this moment at least, the possibility of such a transformation seems remote. I once said that the last Marxist in history would die at a Latin American university. I still believe it.

The postmodern spectacle that took place in the historical center of Mexico City is bizarre and ominous but also very serious. This is not a British "shadow cabinet," in which individual opposition politicians scrutinize various parts of the party in power. L?pez Obrador has said power belongs to him alone, in the name of the people. He is serious about his plans: to force the resignation of Calder?n and take power by proclamation, that ritual out of the Mexican past. The perfect date would be 2010, the 100th anniversary of the revolution.

If this nightmarish scenario actually happened, the implications for the United States could be ominous too: a stream of refugees that would dwarf the current illegal migration, pushed by the collapsing Mexican economy, capital flight and spreading Oaxaca-style violence.

The United States would do well to remember that there is a country, not on the Persian Gulf but on the Gulf of Mexico, that has taken a giant step toward political maturity by adopting a democratic system in the space of just one generation -- and has done so practically without historical experience. And it would do well to find tangible, direct ways to support Mexico's economy, just as the European Union supported Spain. Build bridges, not walls. Winning Mexico for democracy is the same thing as winning democracy for all of Latin America -- no small triumph in today's world and the world to come.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Despite A Year Of Ire And Angst, Little Has Changed On Wiretaps (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 — When President Bush went on national television one Saturday morning last December to acknowledge the existence of a secret wiretapping program outside the courts, the fallout was fierce and immediate.

Mr. Bush's opponents accused him of breaking the law, with a few even calling for his impeachment. His backers demanded that he be given express legal authority to do what he had done. Law professors talked, civil rights groups sued and a federal judge in Detroit declared the wiretapping program unconstitutional.

But as Democrats prepare to take over on Capitol Hill, not much has really changed. For all the sound and fury in the last year, the National Security Agency's wiretapping program continues uninterrupted, with no definitive action by either Congress or the courts on what, if anything, to do about it, and little chance of a breakthrough in the lame-duck Congress.

While the Democrats have vowed to press for more facts about the operation, they are of mixed minds about additional steps.

Some favor an aggressive strategy that would brand the program illegal and move to ban it even as the courts consider its legality. Others are more cautious, emphasizing the rule of law but not giving Republicans the chance to accuse them of depriving the government of important anti-terrorism tools.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, who will take over as House speaker in January, favors an investigation to determine how the security agency's program actually operated and what its legal framework is under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, a senior aide to Ms. Pelosi said. Administration officials said they were concerned they could have to shut down a program they deemed vital to national security.

The 1978 law requires counterterrorism officials to obtain court orders to eavesdrop on people inside the United States. But the security agency's program involved eavesdropping without warrants on the international telephone and e-mail communications of Americans and others in this country suspected of links to Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

Congressional Republicans, for their part, see a missed opportunity to resolve the many questions hovering over the operation during a year in which they still commanded majorities in the House and Senate.

"We could've fixed this early on," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and a believer that the surveillance program violates the 1978 law.

"For every day that passes," Mr. Specter said in an interview, "there's an invasion of privacy that could be cured."

To understand the helter-skelter nature of the debate over the wiretapping program, one need look no further than Mr. Specter.

After the program was publicly disclosed last Dec. 15, the senator called it an "inappropriate" usurpation of presidential authority that "can't be condoned." He signed onto a bill last summer written by Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, that would effectively ban the program as it is now operated and require a court order for all wiretapping of Americans.

Then, after a series of confidential meetings with the White House, Mr. Specter worked out a compromise to bring the program before a secret intelligence court to test its constitutionality. He was promptly pummeled by Democrats and editorial writers for giving away too much to the White House.

Mr. Specter changed course again last week and submitted yet another proposal that would require warrants for eavesdropping on communications coming out of, but not into, the United States, and would put the whole issue on a fast track to the Supreme Court. Its fate, like its predecessors', is unclear.

Along the way, Mr. Specter has clashed with politicians on the left and the right. He got into a public spat with Vice President Dick Cheney when the latter succeeded in keeping Mr. Specter from subpoenaing telecommunications executives to testify about cooperation with the security agency, and he traded terse words with Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, over Mr. Feingold's efforts to have the Senate vote to censure the president over the wiretapping.

"It's always difficult," Mr. Specter said, "to get legislation on a controversial issue that has such political overtones."

The lack of a resolution has left many shaking their heads. Some officials said the unanswered questions had cast doubt on the public credibility of broader intelligence operations and created occasional confusion among intelligence agents over what was and was not allowed in tracking terrorism suspects.

"There's a lot of uncertainty over this program," said a former senior intelligence official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the wiretapping program is classified.

"We've had a wasted year at this point," the former official said, "and nothing has been done to try to really figure out how or whether we should amend the process."

The program was secretly approved by Mr. Bush weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks. Since then, the security agency, which has historically been restricted from spying within the United States, has monitored thousands of international telephone calls and e-mail messages to and from people in this country, people with knowledge of the operation say. Senior administration officials say it has been critical in helping to identify previously unknown plots, but other government officials involved in the operation have said that it has often led to dead ends and to people with no clear links to terrorism.

The administration has steadfastly defended the program and has warned of a serious threat to national security were it stopped.

In a speech last week, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales labeled as "myth" the idea that the program "is an invasion of privacy and an unlawful eavesdropping tool." The program, he said, "does not invade anyone's privacy, unless you are talking to the enemy in this time of war."

The legal authority, the administration argues, rests on both the president's inherent constitutional authorities as commander in chief as well as a Congressional resolution passed days after Sept. 11 that authorized the use of military force against Al Qaeda.

The only judge to rule directly on the question, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor of Federal District Court in Detroit, rejected the administration's claims to broad executive authority, ruling the program illegal in August and ordering it shut down.

"There are no hereditary kings in America and no powers not created by the Constitution," the judge wrote.

The Justice Department is appealing that decision, as well as a separate ruling in San Francisco allowing lawsuits against telecommunication companies to proceed. In that case, Judge Vaughn Walker of Federal District Court rejected the government's assertion that the lawsuits should be quashed because they touched on "state secrets" and risked harming national security.

Justice Department officials said they were hopeful they would succeed in overturning the Detroit ruling, but they acknowledged they were concerned over where the courts would ultimately come down.

"It would certainly be good to have clarity on this," said a senior Justice Department official, who was given anonymity to discuss the department's internal thinking. "Do people want resolution on a program this important? Sure."

Even after the Democrats won control of Congress this month, Mr. Bush pushed the passage of wiretapping legislation as a priority for the lame-duck session that concludes next month. During that brief window before Democrats take power, administration officials also hope to push through related measures that would effectively insulate telecommunications and government officials from legal liability growing out of the wiretapping.

But Republicans and Democrats alike give the White House virtually no chance of moving substantive wiretapping legislation before January.

An aide to Ms. Pelosi noted that the White House has until now agreed only to limited briefings on the program.

"There is bipartisan interest in seeing whether the administration's claims that the program can't comply with F.I.S.A. are indeed so," the aide said. "We were legislating on an issue where the full parameters were not known or well understood."

Times Seeks To Bar Review Of Phone Data (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

The New York Times asked the Supreme Court yesterday to bar a federal prosecutor from reviewing the phone records of two of its reporters. The records, lawyers for The Times said, would allow the government to learn the identities of many of the reporters' confidential sources.

The case arose from a Chicago grand jury's investigation into who told the two reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government was planning to take in 2001 against two Islamic charities. The United States attorney in Chicago, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, sought the reporters' records directly from their phone companies, and The Times filed suit to stop him.

In August, a divided three-judge panel of the federal appeals court in Manhattan ruled in favor of Mr. Fitzgerald, saying the reporters were not entitled to shield their sources. The needs of law enforcement, the majority said, outweighed any protections the reporters might have in the First Amendment or other areas of law.

Ms. Miller left the paper last year after spending 85 days in jail in connection with a separate leak investigation, also supervised by Mr. Fitzgerald.

The paper's filing yesterday was a limited one, seeking an order from Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg staying the appeals court decision until the Supreme Court has an opportunity to decide whether to hear the case. The deadline for seeking review of the appeals court's decision is in January, but The Times said it would move faster.

In a letter filed in response to yesterday's application, the Justice Department said it "desires to review the records in question as expeditiously as possible" but agreed not to do so until Wednesday. Yesterday afternoon, the court ordered the government to submit a formal response to the stay application by today at 4 p.m.

The press has been on a losing streak of late in the federal courts, with several decisions refusing to recognize protection for confidential sources. The Supreme Court has not weighed in on the question since 1972.

Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for The Times, said the case now before the court could give it an opportunity to clarify the law.

"If the government is permitted to proceed to scrutinize the telephone records of The New York Times and its journalists," Mr. Abrams said, "it will be in a position to identify literally scores of confidential sources, thus imperiling both the ability of the press to gather the news and of the public to learn it."

N.Y. Times Asks Court To Limit Probe (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

The New York Times asked the U.S. Supreme Court yesterday to block the federal government from reviewing the phone records of two reporters in a leak investigation.

The case involved stories written in 2001, by Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, that revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

In a 2 to 1 decision, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit ruled in August that federal prosecutors can see the phone records of Shenon and Miller. Miller retired from the Times a year ago.

The government says phone calls placed by the reporters seeking comment for a story tipped off the charities to planned government raids. A federal judge who ruled in the newspaper's favor said there is no evidence in the record suggesting the reporters even knew of the government's plans to raid either charity.

The Times wants Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg to temporarily block the government from going through the records so that the newspaper can prepare a petition arguing why the justices should step into the case. Ginsburg asked the Justice Department for a response.

U.S. District Judge Robert W. Sweet had ruled that the records were off-limits unless prosecutors could show that they had exhausted all other means of finding out who spoke to the reporters.

But the three-judge appeals court panel said a grand jury investigation of the disclosures would be unlikely to go anywhere without help from the reporters or access to their records.

SEC Quizzes Ford On "terrorist" State Sales (FT)

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has raised concern about the investment risks of US companies doing business in countries deemed to be terrorist-supporting states by asking Ford Motor, and possibly others, about its dealings in Iran, Sudan and Syria.

The enquiries emerged in a series of letters dating back to July between the SEC and Ford's chief financial officer, Don Leclair.

The SEC asked the Detroit-based carmaker to demonstrate that its "reputation and share value" were not at risk as a result of business dealings in the three countries. All three countries are designated as state sponsors of terrorism by the US state Department.

Ford replied that its interests, comprising mainly Ford, Land Rover and Mazda dealerships, were small relative to its worldwide operations. Ford owns 33 per cent of Mazda.

Referring to Syria, the carmaker added that "our limited and lawful business activity is public information, and we have not been able to identify any resulting negative impact on our reputation or share value".

Ford said it had no reason to believe that vehicles sold by its dealerships in recent years had gone to the Syrian government or government-controlled groups.

Referring to Mazda's business in Iran and Syria, it said "we do not believe that this de minimis business activity by Mazda impacts Ford's reputation or share value, or the value of Ford's ownership interest in Mazda".

The SEC specifically asked Ford whether the Syrian government or government officials had an interest in the dealerships that sell its vehicles. It also asked the company to confirm that business volumes had not changed significantly in the past three years.

The SEC declined to comment on Friday whether it was satisfied with Ford's responses, and whether it was asking other companies similar questions.

But an industry source said such queries had been directed to several prominent multinationals. The SEC has reportedly asked European and US oil companies to tell investors about the risks they face from operations in countries that Washington has identified as supporting terrorism.

The US has modest direct trade links with the three countries. According to the Commerce Department, two-way trade with Syria totaled $479m last year, Iran $271m and Sudan $126m.

Cars and trucks were the second biggest export to Syria, after farm products. The US's main export to Iran is tobacco.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Careless Contracting (WP)

THE DEPARTMENT of Homeland Security is an MBA's nightmare. When Congress cobbled DHS together in 2002, it took apart and reassembled elements from disparate federal agencies into an uneasy consolidation, too big and too varied, some say, for even the department's tireless head, Michael Chertoff, to adequately control. Instead of synergy, a fair measure of incompetence followed, including, The Post reported Wednesday, embarrassingly poor oversight of the billions of dollars the department has paid to private contractors.

The Post's Robert O'Harrow Jr. and Scott Higham obtained an internal review of the department's Office of Procurement Operations, one of many agencies that handles contracts within the department. According to the review, which was drafted by outside specialists on government contracting, almost none of the contract files examined met standards of quality or even completeness. The documentation for 33 of 72 contracts the investigators sought to evaluate could not even be located, which makes you wonder how DHS ensures that contractors aren't wasting government money.

Further, many of the files that were available were "not substantive" and offered "little evidence of fair and reasonable pricing or competition," among other problems, the investigators found. An alarming number were "seriously inadequate," with "major policy, regulatory or legal issues." Poor contract management, the report concluded, has led to "the inability to obtain quality goods and services on time and at a fair price." These contracts date from fiscal 2005, during which DHS distributed nearly $17.5 billion to contractors and the federal government ran a deficit of $318 billion.

The story isn't as bad these days, a department spokesman says. The fact that Homeland Security hired consultants to review its contracting indicates that managers want to improve the process, and the spokesman says the procurement office is working to implement each of the report's recommendations, which officials received in March. But according to the department's inspector general, poor contract management persists. Money and security alike are put at risk.

WAR NEWS:

White House Confirms Bush-Maliki To Meet As Iraq Violence Spirals (AFP)

By Laurent Lozano

AFP, November 25, 2006

The White House reiterated that President George W. Bush would meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki in Jordan next week amid a sharp rise in Shiite-Sunni violence.

As Vice President Dick Cheney took off on a trip to Saudi Arabia on Friday, the White House said there would be no change to Bush's planned summit with Maliki even as a top Shiite cleric said he would pull his faction out of the Baghdad government if the meeting takes place.

"Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item when President Bush meets with Prime Minister Maliki in just a few days," said White House spokesperson Scott Stanzel.

The spike in violence in Iraq Friday left at least 202 dead in a wave of bombings in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City, the deadliest attack since the war began in 2003.

Apparent revenge efforts by Shiite militias left dozens more feared dead in attacks on Sunni mosques in Baghdad.

Separately a triple bomb attack in the northern town of Tal Afar killed 23 people and wounded 45 others Friday, according to police.

The White House condemned the attacks by both sides.

"These ruthless acts of violence are deplorable. It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed," said White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

How to quell the violence will likely be the focal topic in talks that Cheney holds with Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah and Crown Prince Sultan bin Abdul Aziz, and the Bush-Maliki meeting on November 29-30 in Amman.

Cheney could ask Abdullah to use his influence to help foster reconciliation between warring factions in Iraq, and also press for Riyadh to come through with its promised reconstruction aid.

But Friday's violent surge has added urgency to both trips. A few hours before the attack on Sunni mosques in Baghdad, the political group of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose base is in Sadr City, threatened to quit the national unity government if Maliki meets Bush.

But Stanzel confirmed that the meeting will take place despite the threats by Sadr's allies. Bush and Maliki are also to see Jordan's King Abdullah II, as pressure mounts for all of of Iraq's neighbors to help contain the daily bloodshed.

With US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also due to visit the region soon, the top-level travel reflects the seriousness of the situation on the ground in Iraq, as does Bush's stated openness to potential policy change there.

The rising violence, a surge in US casualties in Iraq, and the victory of opposition Democrats in Congressional elections on November 7 have piled pressure on Bush to change US policy in Iraq, if not to begin withdrawing troops -- something Bush has steadfastly refused to commit to.

But after an October that was the bloodiest month for Iraqi civilians -- according to the United Nations -- and one of the bloodiest for US troops since the March 2003 invasion, the latest anti-Shiite attack and counterattacks will only elevate the pressure on the president to change course.

Stanzel said Friday that the violence is "clearly aimed at undermining the Iraqi people's hopes for a peaceful and stable Iraq."

He added that "the United States is committed to helping the Iraqis."

It remains unclear, however, what resources Bush and Cheney can marshal to stop the country from plunging into all-out civil war.

Bush has started a comprehensive review of his Iraq policy. Two reports are expected in the coming weeks -- one from the administration and another from a high-powered independent panel -- which could play a big role in decisions on strategy and US troop levels.

The worsening situation in recent months also raises questions about US trust in Maliki and, specifically, his ability to end attacks by militia.

So far, Bush has publicly stood by Maliki, but his confidence seems to be increasingly in doubt.

U.S. Says Violence Is Meant To Topple Iraqi Government (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

The Bush administration charged yesterday that the escalating violence in Iraq committed by both Shiites and Sunnis over the past two days is a "brazen effort" to bring down the fragile government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The White House also said President Bush has no intention of backing out of talks next week with the Iraqi leader, despite threats yesterday from a powerful Shiite militia to pull out of the government if Maliki goes ahead with the meeting. The talks, set for Thursday in Amman, Jordan, have suddenly taken on the air of a crisis summit, as Iraq slides closer to all-out civil war.

The latest attacks, including six car-bomb attacks on Shiite targets in Baghdad on Thursday and retaliatory strikes on Sunni targets yesterday, killed more than 200 people in the deadliest wave of violence since the U.S.-led coalition invaded Iraq in 2003.

Rumors of yesterday's atrocities included one report of six Sunni men who emerged from services at a Baghdad mosque and were doused with kerosene and burned alive. But two Baghdad imams, in an interview, denied that the incident took place.

"These ruthless acts of violence are deplorable," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. "It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed.

"Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item when President Bush meets with Prime Minister al-Maliki in just a few days."

In a major shift, much of the recent violence has come from militias linked to parties in Iraq's government and from death squads with ties to government agencies. The trend is important because a common benchmark in the slide from strife to civil war is the government falling apart and factions within it fighting each other.

"Iraq is breaking down, not breaking up" into pieces, said Patrick Clawson of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

The ferocity of the latest attacks complicates the prospects of major progress at the talks in Amman, U.S. experts warned.

"This summit is an act of desperation. The White House doesn't know what it can do," said David Rothkopf, a Carnegie Endowment for International Peace fellow and the author of "Running the World: The Inside Story of the National Security Council and the Architects of American Power." "The situation is deteriorating more rapidly than anyone anticipated and to an unending depth.

"I don't think, in modern American history, there is another example of such egregious failure of policy and execution. We're really seeing something unprecedented here. Even Vietnam was a slower decline, and the military forces were more in balance. . . . I don't know anyone who thinks there is an outcome in Iraq now that is hopeful."

The crisis atmosphere deepened in Iraq yesterday when followers of radical Shiite militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr pledged to walk out of parliament and Maliki's cabinet if the prime minister attends the Jordan summit. Sadr's powerful political bloc has 30 members in Iraq's new parliament. It was also pivotal in backing Maliki as prime minister during heated months-long debate over the new government.

The Bush administration has been increasingly frustrated by Maliki's leadership, particularly his inability or unwillingness to rein in fellow Shiites, including militias such as Sadr's. But the White House has limited alternatives because the Iraqi leader was democratically selected and the next election is not due until 2009. Maliki is, for now, the only political game in town.

And any U.S. exit strategy will rely on accelerating the transfer of security responsibilities to Iraqi forces under Maliki's control.

Maliki faces his own constraints. He needs to maintain his own power base to bring the Shiites along for reconciliation efforts with the Sunni minority, experts said, adding that, to be credible at home, he also has to keep a certain distance from Bush.

Bush is "in a very tight spot," said Henri Barkey, a Lehigh University professor who was a State Department policy-planning expert on Iraq. "He now has to strike a balance between three conflicting constituencies. He has to show respect for Maliki, that he is an independent actor and not a stooge. But he also has to worry about his own priorities. At the same time, the Democrats are increasingly breathing down his neck about withdrawal.

"The drumroll for withdrawal is only going to get stronger in January."

Syria Appears To Be Summit Wild Card (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Iran and the United States are playing a complicated diplomatic game, jockeying for influence in Iraq as violence there spirals out of control. But there is one major wild-card in dueling summits planned for coming days: Syria.

Vice President Dick Cheney was heading to Saudi Arabia for key talks with King Abdullah on Saturday, apparently looking for its influence and tribal connections help to calm Iraq.

President Bush is due to meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan on Wednesday and Thursday, an unusual succession of trips that reflects U.S. determination to rally allies at a time when Washington is considering overhauling its Iraq policy.

But an especially violent week in Iraq threatened to overshadow the planned Bush-Maliki meeting.

After suspected Sunni insurgents slaughtered 215 people with a series of car bombs in Baghdad's Shiite Sadr City slum the day before, a top Shiite party on which al-Maliki relies for power threatened to walk out of the government if he meets with Bush in Amman.

Iran, meanwhile, was having its own diplomatic troubles.

It has been trying to organize a summit Saturday joining its president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and the presidents of Iraq and Syria, in a bid to assert its role as the top regional powerbroker.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani agreed to attend. But on Friday, he had to postpone his trip until Baghdad's airport — closed in a security clampdown after the violence — reopens, no sooner than Sunday. "The Tehran visit is still on," he said. "The airport will be closed tomorrow but if it opens after tomorrow we will go."

It also appeared unlikely on Friday that Syria's Bashar Assad would participate at all.

A top official at Iran's presidency on Friday said Syria has not responded to Iran's invitation and that "there is no plan for Assad visit to Tehran at least for the next 24 hours." He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the press.

On Thursday, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said there was no agreement yet on a three-way summit. "We will announce such a summit as soon as it is finalized. Of course, this is a good idea and we welcome it," he said.

Syrian officials have been silent for days over whether Assad would attend, apparently to avoid embarrassing Iran with a direct rejection — though the delay in Talabani's arrival could give Syria a chance to reconsider coming.

Iran is Syria's only close ally and a rejection would be an unusual snub, but Damascus may be more worried about angering the United States by joining Iran's overt attempt to assert itself in Iraq. Instead, Syria is likely looking further down the road to potential talks with Washington.

"Syria is after concessions from Washington. Assad wants doesn't want to annoy Washington," said Leila Chamankhah, an Iranian political analyst.

After the Democratic victory in U.S. midterm elections, the Bush administration is under increased pressure at home to approach Iran and Syria for help in Iraq. Such a step is believed to be one of the recommendations by a blue-ribbon panel on Iraq led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton.

On the face of it, an Iranian-Syrian-Iraqi summit would fit into U.S. hopes that Iraq's neighbors will step in to help ease the bloodshed. Iran is believed to back Iraqi Shiite militias blamed in sectarian killings that have killed thousands this year.

But Iran has made clear that the summit aimed to assert its influence in Iraq on Tehran's terms, not Washington's. Iran's conservative Kayhan newspaper boasted on Wednesday that the gathering would "shake the U.S. president."

Syria is accused by the United States of turning a blind eye to Iraqi insurgents that use its territory as a base. Damascus denies this, but it could be looking to trade stronger action in return for concessions from the U.S.

At the top of Syria's concerns are Lebanon and Israel. Syria is seeking to regain influence in Lebanon but has been opposed by the United States and the U.S.-backed Lebanese government.

Syria also wants a resumption of the Arab-Israeli peace process that it hopes would bring the return of the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in 1967.

Wave Of Retaliation Sweeps Iraq (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's civil war worsened Friday as Shiite and Sunni Arabs engaged in retaliatory attacks after coordinated car bombings that killed more than 200 people in a Shiite neighborhood the day before. A main Shiite political faction threatened to quit the government, a move that probably would cause its collapse and plunge the nation deeper into disarray.

The massacre Thursday in Sadr City — a stronghold of Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr and his Al Mahdi militia — sparked attacks around the country, reinforced doubts about the effectiveness of the Iraqi government and U.S. military and emboldened Shiite vigilantes.

In a sermon Friday, Sadr, a strong opponent of the United States, said the Pentagon's refusal to grant full control of Iraqi security forces to the Baghdad government was leaving the populace vulnerable to insurgent attacks.

And as Sadr's militiamen took matters into their own hands in battles with Sunni Arabs, his political representatives demanded that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki signal his displeasure with the U.S. military occupation by canceling a meeting with President Bush next week in Jordan.

Sadr's representatives said they would withdraw from Maliki's government if the prime minister did not meet their demands.

In spite of an emergency curfew, gunfire crackled throughout the day and mortar rounds arced over Baghdad's jagged skyline, smashing into houses of worship, residences and shops.

By Friday night, at least 65 deaths had been reported in the capital and elsewhere.

A dozen or more Sunni mosques around the country were hit by mortar rounds and gunfire or were burned down by Shiite mobs. Masked members of Sadr's militia swept through Sunni areas, setting up checkpoints and threatening to execute families that didn't leave their homes within 48 hours.

Hurriya, a mixed area of the capital, saw some of Friday's fiercest fighting. Uniformed men in police vehicles roared through the streets launching rocket-propelled grenades into houses and raking Sunni mosques with gunfire, said an Iraqi police officer stationed in the area. The attackers killed three security guards at a mosque and injured 10 worshipers inside.

"They proceeded to bombard the building with rocket-propelled grenades and hand grenades, starting a fire that consumed the structure," said the officer, who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisal.

Attackers ambushed

As the uniformed assailants advanced to another area, members of the Battawia tribe, a prominent Sunni clan in the area, fought back.

"They were ready for them and … ambushed the attackers, countering them with RPGs and machine guns," the officer said. The ensuing fight brought casualties on both sides. A nearby hospital reported that it had received 28 dead and 32 injured.

The policeman said he and fellow officers stood alongside Iraqi army units near the battle, watching the bloodshed.

"The army did not interfere," he said. "And we [the police] didn't receive any orders to interfere. We would not have interfered even in the event that we were ordered to do so, because this is the Iraqi army's turf."

By Friday night, police had discovered at least 11 bodies around Baghdad. But the reprisals were not limited to the capital.

In Baqubah, 25 miles to the northeast, Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen exchanged ragged bursts of machine-gun fire in the streets and lobbed thunderous explosives as imams called out "Allahu akbar," or "God is great," from the city's mosques.

Insurgents used bombs to destroy an office of the Sadr movement shortly after U.S. troops raided the building and detained six militiamen. Later in the day, militiamen responded by destroying a Sunni mosque and toppling its minaret.

In the far northern town of Tall Afar, a car bomb blast ripped through a crowded car dealership, killing at least 22 people and injuring 26.

In the northern oil hub of Kirkuk, police found the bulletriddled body of a pipeline security guard, and a bomb damaged the Wahab mosque, one of the largest Sunni mosques in the city.

In the southern port city of Basra, rocket-propelled grenades damaged a mosque, the headquarters of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq and an apartment complex, injuring 15 people.

In Fallouja, a restive Sunni city in western Al Anbar province, a car bomb exploded at an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing at least six soldiers.

Meanwhile, a caravan of grieving Shiites drove casket-laden vehicles from Sadr City to Najaf's ancient necropolis to bury victims of Thursday's attack, the deadliest single incident in Iraq since U.S. forces toppled Saddam Hussein in 2003.

Mourners carried the dead around the shrine of Imam Ali, the most important religious figure for Shiites after Muhammad, before burying them in the "martyr's cemetery," a series of plots festooned with Al Mahdi banners and posters of Muqtada Sadr on the edge of Najaf's tombstone forest. Amid wailing relatives and chanting militiamen, mourners lowered the remains into the earth.

"The reaction [to the bombings] will be huge," said Tahseen Ali Shareef, 28, a Najaf resident who watched the funeral processions. "The families of the victims will not be silent. The streets will be haunted with fear."

As Sunni and Shiite gunmen fought in the streets, Sadr and his followers lobbed rhetorical bombs into Iraq's political arena.

From his pulpit in the southern city of Kufa, Sadr called on Iraq's most prominent Sunni cleric, Harith Dhari — who became a fugitive this month after the government issued a warrant for his arrest for his alleged support of terrorism — to publicly forbid Sunnis to kill Shiites or to join Al Qaeda.

Sadr also demanded that Dhari, who is currently not in Iraq, issue an edict urging Sunnis to fund the reconstruction of a revered shrine in Samarra. Insurgents blew up the shrine in February, launching a similar storm of sectarian battles that left hundreds of people dead.

Sadr also reiterated his demand for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, whom he blamed for the violence.

"I denounce and condemn this incident which targeted the beloved Sadr City," Sadr said. "From this pulpit … I renew my demand for the withdrawal of occupation forces."

Sadr's political representatives in Baghdad, meanwhile, threatened to withdraw from the government if Maliki met with Bush as scheduled on Wednesday and Thursday in Jordan.

"If the situation does not improve, the government does not offer services and the prime minister doesn't cancel his meeting with George Bush in Amman, we shall suspend our membership in the parliament and any participation in the government," the Sadr bloc said in a statement.

White House officials said Maliki had confirmed that he would attend the meeting, and Iraqi officials discounted the Sadr group's demands as empty threats.

"I think this is a red herring," national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie said. "It is more political posturing, but it doesn't mean anything."

But some observers say Sadr's demands could pose a serious challenge to Maliki.

A potential vacuum

If the Sadr bloc carries out its threat of a political walkout, Maliki's government will almost certainly collapse, leaving an even greater authority vacuum that militias and insurgents could exploit.

However, if Maliki backs out of his meeting with Bush, he could be severely weakened, losing any chance of reining in Sadr's paramilitary forces.

Canceling would also signal to other factions that they might be able to run roughshod over Maliki.

"Sadr is basically challenging Maliki's ability to govern," said P.J. Crowley, a retired U.S. Air Force colonel and a fellow at the Center for American Progress, a think tank in Washington. "He has to respond in a way that allows him to survive and actually strengthens his hand."

Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official and a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, another Washington think tank, said Sadr's challenge to Dhari might be even more dangerous than that to Maliki. If the Sunnis fail to satisfy Sadr, Cordesman argued, sectarian violence could grow even worse.

"It's going to take a couple days to know how serious this is," he said. "Will this lead to a large-scale civil war? The worse case is that this leads to enough misunderstanding and anger to drive the country into full-scale civil war. The more likely result is that it will take a week to 10 days to play out and depend on the Sunni response. A lot will also depend on what Maliki does."

Despite frequent complaints about the Iraqi government and the U.S. military, most of Iraq's political and religious leadership called for calm Friday.

In a display of unity, several members of Maliki's Cabinet — Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds among them — held an emergency meeting to discuss the deteriorating situation.

And in mosques around Iraq, clerics preached about unity, intra-sectarian accord and blame for the United States.

"As we denounce the killings of the innocent in Sadr City yesterday, we must also hold the U.S. and British troops as well as the government responsible for what happened," said Abdul Kareem Ghazi, a preacher and supporter of Sadr.

"It is true that the perpetrators of these operations are the terrorists and Saddamists, but their tactics are designed by the occupation forces, and they are the beneficiaries of what is happening."

No One To Lose To (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

Washington

After the Thanksgiving Day Massacre of Shiites by Sunnis, President Bush should go on Rupert Murdoch's Fox News and give an interview headlined: "If I did it, here's how the civil war in Iraq happened."

He could describe, hypothetically, a series of naïve, arrogant and self-defeating blunders, including his team's failure to comprehend that in the Arab world, revenge and religious zealotry can be stronger compulsions than democracy and prosperity.

But W. is not yet able to view his actions in subjunctive terms, much less objective ones. Bush family retainers are working to deprogram him, but the president is loath to strip off his delusions of adequacy.

W. declined to tear himself away from his free-range turkey and pumpkin mousse trifle at Camp David and reassure Americans about the deadliest sectarian attack in Baghdad since the U.S. invaded. More than 200 Shiites were killed and hundreds more wounded by car bombs and a mortar attack in Sadr City. October was the bloodiest month yet for civilians, and in the last four months, some 13,000 men, women and children have died.

American helicopters and Iraqi troops did not arrive for two hours after Sunni gunmen began a siege on the Health Ministry controlled by the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who has a militia that kills Sunnis and is married to the Maliki government.

Continuing the cycle of revenge yesterday, Shiite militiamen threw kerosene on six Sunnis and set them on fire, as Iraqi soldiers watched, and killed 19 more.

The New York Times and other news outlets have been figuring out if it's time to break with the administration's use of euphemisms like "sectarian conflict." How long can you have an ever-descending descent without actually reaching the civil war?

Some analysts are calling it genocide or clash of civilizations, arguing that civil war is too genteel a term for the butchery that is destroying a nation before our very eyes. Anthony Shadid, The Washington Post reporter who won a Pulitzer Prize for his Iraq coverage, went back recently and described "the final, frenzied maturity of once-inchoate forces unleashed more than three years ago by the invasion. There was civil-war-style sectarian killing, its echoes in Lebanon a generation ago. Alongside it were gangland turf battles over money, power and survival; a raft of political parties and their militias fighting a zero-sum game; a raging insurgency; the collapse of authority; social services a chimera; and no way forward for an Iraqi government ordered to act by Americans who themselves are still seen as the final arbiter and, as a result, still depriving that government of legitimacy. Civil war was perhaps too easy a term, a little too tidy."

It will be harder to sell Congress on the idea that America's troops should be in the middle of somebody else's civil war than to convince them that we need to hang tough in the so-called front line of the so-called war on terror against Al Qaeda.

With Iraq splitting, Tony Snow indulges in the ludicrous exercise of hair-splitting. He said that in past civil wars, "people break up into clearly identifiable feuding sides clashing for supremacy." In Iraq, "you do have a lot of different forces that are trying to put pressure on the government and trying to undermine it. But it's not clear that they are operating as a unified force." But Lebanon was a shambles with multiple factions, and everybody called that a civil war.

Mr. Snow has said this is not a civil war because the fighting is not taking place in every province and because Iraqis voted in free elections. But that's like saying that the Battle of Gettysburg only took place in one small corner of the country, so there was no real American Civil War. And there were elections during our civil war too. President Lincoln was re-elected months before the war's end.

The president's comparison to how Vietnam turned out a generation later, his happy talk that Iraq is going to be fine, is preposterous.

As Neil Sheehan, a former Times reporter in Vietnam who wrote the Pulitzer Prize-winning "A Bright Shining Lie," told me: "In Vietnam, there were just two sides to the civil war. You had a government in Hanoi with a structure of command and an army and a guerrilla movement that would obey what they were told to do. So you had law and order in Saigon immediately after the war ended. In Iraq, there's no one like that for us to lose to and then do business with."

The questions are no longer whether there's a civil war or whether we can achieve a military victory. The only question is, who can we turn the country over to?

At the moment, that would be no one.

In Iraq, Reprisals Embolden Militias (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 24 -- In a wave of reprisal killings, Shiite militiamen attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq on Friday, defying a government curfew and propelling the country further toward full-blown civil war.

The exacting of revenge for the deaths of more than 200 Shiites on Thursday came as powerful politicians linked to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr threatened to pull out of Iraq's coalition government if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki attends a scheduled meeting with President Bush next week in Amman, Jordan. A boycott by loyalists of Sadr, on whom Maliki relies for political support, could upend Iraq's fragile unity government.

Friday's attacks illustrated Iraqi security forces' inability to rein in violence, at a time when U.S. leaders want them to take greater responsibility for the country's security, a vital benchmark for any strategy to withdraw U.S. troops.

In the mixed Hurriyah neighborhood, Shiite militiamen torched at least five Sunni mosques on Islam's holiest prayer day, police and residents reported. Other mosques were attacked by gunmen spraying bullets from the rooftops of nearby houses, witnesses said.

In one mosque, militiamen detonated a cooking gas cylinder. In another, they declared that it was now a husseiniya, a Shiite mosque, and posted pictures of Sadr, whose stronghold of Sadr City was attacked Thursday. At least 18 people were killed Friday and 24 injured in the mosque attacks in Hurriyah, said Adil Mahmoud, a physician from al-Nouman Hospital in the nearby Adhamiyah neighborhood.

"They started attacking with grenades and RPGs," said Abu Abdallah, the imam at one of the attacked mosques, referring to rocket-propelled grenades. "Then shooting started from nearby houses. Then they entered and burned the mosque before they left." Abdallah, interviewed by telephone, asked that his mosque not be named. "I might be killed," he said.

In the Ghazaliya neighborhood, at least eight mortar shells hit a mosque run by the Association of Muslim Scholars, one of the most outspoken defenders of Iraq's Sunni Arab minority since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. The house of worship is one of Baghdad's best-known.

Northeast of the capital, Shiite gunmen in Baqubah opened fire at a Sunni mosque during Friday prayers, killing a mosque guard, said imam Osama al-Ani. Near the northern city of Kirkuk, a roadside bomb exploded in front of one of the biggest Sunni mosques in the area, injuring five people and damaging the building, according to police.

Meanwhile, in the northwestern city of Tall Afar, two bombs exploded near a car dealership, killing 22 people and wounding more than 40 others, police said.

The scale of Friday's revenge attacks was smaller than the wave of killings by Shiite militiamen after the bombing of the Shiite shrine in Samarra in February. That bombing triggered cycles of retaliation that further ruptured the bonds between Iraq's two major sects.

U.S. troops bolstered their patrols on Friday, flying helicopters over Sadr City and operating checkpoints. One helicopter destroyed a rocket launcher manned by a Shiite crew that had fired six rockets into the Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiyah, near the Abu Hanifa mosque, one of the most revered Sunni shrines in Baghdad, the military said.

Friday's attacks unfolded in the aftermath of the bombs, mortars and missiles that hit Sadr City on Thursday in the deadliest single assault on Iraqi civilians since the U.S.-led invasion began. The death toll in those attacks rose to more than 200. Thousands of mourners, flanked by minivans carrying wooden coffins, paraded solemnly through Sadr City on Friday, paying last respects before the dead were taken to the southern Shiite holy city of Najaf for burial.

Later, in an address after the midday prayer, members of Sadr's political party denounced the U.S. military, saying its presence was the reason for Iraq's escalating violence. They demanded a U.S. withdrawal or, at least, a timetable for the troops to leave, a demand echoed by Sadr in his Friday sermon at his mosque in the southern city of Kufa.

In previous periods of tension, Sadr loyalists have threatened to walk out of the government. Still, the current climate is unlike anything Iraq has experienced since the invasion. The attacks on Sadr City appeared to embolden Sadr and his followers as they try to capitalize on Thursday's carnage, which Shiite leaders, including Maliki, have blamed on Sunni Arab insurgents.

As long as such attacks continue, and as long as Iraqi security forces are ineffective in providing security, Sadr can justify the existence of his Mahdi Army militia.

"If the prime minister does not give up his intention to meet Bush the criminal in Amman, we will suspend our membership at the council of representatives and the government," Salih al-Ighaeli, head of Sadr's bloc in parliament, told a solemn crowd gathered on the street in front of Sadr's headquarters.

Ali Adeeb, a member of parliament and close Maliki aide, said the Sadr camp was trying to apply pressure tactics, but that the meeting would take place as planned.

The meeting between Bush and Maliki comes at a politically sensitive moment for both leaders. Bush is under pressure from Democrats who have won control of both the House and Senate to come up with a viable strategy to tamp down Iraq's violence and open the way for U.S. troops to come home.

As the sectarian divide within his government widens, Maliki is under U.S. pressure to disarm the Shiite militias, a step the U.S. military believes is needed to tame the violence. But the very people who control the militias, such as Sadr, are key political figures in Maliki's government, capable of causing his downfall.

Friday's reprisal attacks underscore how powerful the Mahdi Army and other militias have become in Iraq, operating above the law, spreading violence even under an indefinite 24-hour lockdown of the capital.

By Friday evening, the attacks were still unfolding. With no other alternative, many Sunnis were hoping for the intervention of U.S. forces.

"Up till now we are waiting for the American forces, and they haven't shown up yet," said Salman al-Zobaye, imam of al-Hashab mosque, in a telephone interview. An attack on the mosque by Shiite militiamen killed four guards.

Throughout Friday, rumors of new atrocities committed against Sunnis floated across Baghdad, including one in which six Sunnis were doused with kerosene and torched to death in Hurriyah. But two local imams, in an interview, denied such an attack took place.

But there was no shortage of confirmed incidents. In Hurriyah, militiamen Friday morning expelled Sunni families who were living near tea warehouses, and more than 90 Sunni families received letters threatening them if they did not leave their houses within 72 hours, authorities said.

In the Amiriyah neighborhood, Sunnis started to form neighborhood militias under the guidance of local clerics to protect themselves. By Friday evening, 25 volunteers signed up, and those without weapons were handed AK-47 rifles, residents said.

By nightfall, the imams of mosques in three Sunni neighborhoods -- Ghazaliya, Amiriyah and Adhamiyah made a joint announcement to their followers.

"We would like to ask you to take care and be careful for the next hours of tonight," they said. "Open fire toward any gunman who enters the city, such as the Mahdi Army, except the Americans, because they will come to protect the people from the death squads and guard the neighborhood."

The imams gave one more piece of advice to their followers: Open fire on any members of the mostly Shiite police forces. What happened in Hurriyah, the imams alleged, was done with their help.

Shiite Militia In Iraq Strike At Sunni Mosques (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 24 — Defying a government curfew, Shiite militiamen stormed Sunni mosques in Baghdad and a nearby city on Friday, shooting guards and burning down buildings in apparent retaliation for the devastating bombings that killed more than 200 people the day before in the capital's largest Shiite district, residents and police officials said.

Militia fighters drove through neighborhoods in Baghdad and the provincial capital of Baquba, firing at mosques with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades on the Muslim day of prayer.

The vengeance attacks unfolded while lawmakers loyal to the virulently anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr threatened to boycott the government if Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki met with President Bush next week in Jordan. Mr. Sadr controls one of the biggest blocs of seats in Parliament, and on Friday he reiterated his claim that the American presence was the root cause of the rising violence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0098550

But it was Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, that Sunni residents blamed for the attacks on Friday. From morning until afternoon, at least four mosques were attacked in Hurriya, a mixed neighborhood in the capital. Two were destroyed, and at least 5 Sunnis were killed and 10 wounded, an Interior Ministry official said. A hard-line Sunni Arab group, the Muslim Scholars Association, said 18 people had been killed when one of the mosques burned down.

Iraqi security forces were absent, unwilling or unable to stop the attackers.

"I live near Akbar al-Mustafa Mosque, which came under attack by gunmen around 7 this morning," said a man who gave his name as Abu Ruqaiya and lives in Hurriya. "Around 3 in the afternoon, those gunmen bombed this mosque and destroyed part of it. They left only after American and Iraqi soldiers arrived."

Some fighting continued into the evening, as gunmen in the neighborhood battled the invading fighters, the Interior Ministry official said.

President Jalal Talabani urged calm at a news conference after an evening meeting of Iraq's top leaders. He also said he was postponing a weekend trip to Iran because the government had shut down Baghdad International Airport.

White House officials ignored the Sadr bloc's threats to withdraw from the government, and said there were no plans to cancel the president's meetings with Mr. Maliki scheduled for Wednesday and Thursday. "Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item when President Bush meets with Prime Minister Maliki in just a few days," said Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman. "These ruthless acts of violence are deplorable. It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocent civilians in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed."

He also repeated the administration's insistence that Iraq was not in a civil war. "We're constantly asked that question, and while the situation is serious, Prime Minister Maliki and President Talabani have said they do not believe it is a civil war," he said.

The bloodletting over the past 24 hours amounted to one of the worst spasms of violence since the Americans toppled Saddam Hussein in 2003, raising fears that vengeance attacks could grow to the level of those after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February. Then, over five days, hundreds of people were killed, with Shiite militiamen shooting Sunni imams, burning down mosques and stalking Sunni Arabs door-to-door in neighborhoods.

The attacks on Friday came despite a traffic ban the Iraqi government imposed across the capital starting Thursday evening. American troops stepped up patrols and operated checkpoints across much of the city, and most of the capital's neighborhoods remained calm as residents heeded the curfew. In the downtown neighborhood of Karada, children could be seen playing soccer in the empty streets.

In the vast Sadr City district, where the Thursday bombings took place, an attack helicopter destroyed a rocket launcher seen firing into the nearby Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiya, the military said. An official from the Sadr office said at least three civilians had been wounded.

In the far north, two suicide bombers, one in a car and the other on foot, attacked an outdoor car market in the insurgent-rife city of Tal Afar, killing at least 20 people and wounding at least 42.

The violence comes at a politically fraught time for Mr. Maliki, particularly since he is preparing to meet Mr. Bush in Amman. Both men face increasing pressure from their publics to come up with a strategy for stemming the carnage in Iraq, and both are navigating rising tensions between their governments.

The announcement of a possible boycott by Mr. Sadr's bloc further endangers Mr. Maliki's political fortunes. Mr. Sadr effectively controls Sadr City, and the attacks on Thursday appeared to have strengthened his standing and emboldened him. Mr. Sadr has used attacks against Shiites as a justification for keeping his militia despite demands by the Iraqi and American governments that he disband it.

"The occupation forces should shoulder the full responsibility for these deeds, and we call for them to end their rule in Iraq by withdrawing or at least setting a timetable for withdrawal," Salih al-Igaili, a Sadr legislator, said. "If the security situation does not improve, as well as basic services, and if the prime minister does not retreat from his intent to meet the criminal Bush in Amman, we will suspend our membership in the Iraqi Parliament and the government."

Mr. Sadr, in a speech delivered at Friday sermons in the southern city of Kufa, did not mention the boycott threat, but did repeat his usual demand of a timetable for withdrawal from the Americans. He also called on a militant Sunni Arab cleric, Sheik Harith al-Dhari, to issue an edict forbidding the murder of Shiites.

Blocs in Parliament, including Mr. Sadr's, have threatened to walk out before. Mr. Maliki, a conservative Shiite, relies on Mr. Sadr for political support against Shiite rivals, and a withdrawal of Mr. Sadr's legislators from the 275-member Parliament could upend the power balance within the main Shiite political coalition. Mr. Sadr controls at least 30 seats in Parliament and three cabinet positions, including that of the Health Ministry, which was besieged for two hours on Thursday by Sunni Arab insurgents armed with mortars and assault rifles.

Some American officials also argue that Mr. Sadr's engagement in politics is necessary for any hope of a peaceful disarmament of his militia, which has thousands of fighters and has twice rebelled against the American military. But at the same time, Mr. Sadr's strong ties to Mr. Maliki make it difficult for the prime minister to crack down on the Mahdi Army. The mosque attacks on Friday underscored the dangers posed by the militias and highlighted the means by which they are ratcheting up, day by day, the violence here.

"My daughter lives near Mishhada mosque in this neighborhood, and she says gunmen killed and wounded some people there," Abu Ruqaiya said in a phone interview. "There were clashes with the guards of the mosque." Another resident of Hurriya said militiamen burned down the empty home of a former member of the Baath Party.

Fanned by fear, rumors spread quickly throughout the day. In the evening, a resident named Imad al-Hashemi said in a telephone interview on Al Jazeera, the Arab news network, that gunmen had doused some people with gasoline and set them on fire. Other residents contacted by telephone denied this.

In Baquba, northeast of Baghdad, gunmen opened fire on a Sunni mosque and battled with guards there, a police official said. Militants also shot at the provincial government center and the police headquarters. Insurgents destroyed the minaret of a Shiite mosque near the market with explosives or projectiles, the police official said.

The police in Baghdad discovered at least 31 bodies across the city on Friday, most showing signs of torture, The Associated Press reported.

The Interior Ministry official in Baghdad updated the death toll from the Sadr City bombings on Thursday to 202. At least 256 others had been wounded. In the morning, hundreds of mourners poured into the streets of the sprawling district to join processions of cars with wooden coffins strapped to their roofs. Women in black robes beat their chests while men waved pistols from car windows to clear the streets.

"I stayed up the entire night talking with friends and neighbors about what happened," said Ghaith Qassim, 35, a clothing vendor at a funeral. "We're so angry and sad over this. The people here blame the leaders of the government."

In one corner of Sadr City, a three-minibus convoy wound its way through fetid streets, bound for the Shiite cemetery in the holy city of Najaf. The first two vehicles each had a single coffin strapped to its roof. The third had three, all with the bodies of victims from the same family.

Sunnis Set On Fire (NSDY)

By Timothy M. Phelps

Newsday, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Militiamen doused six Sunnis with kerosene and burned them alive as they left Friday prayers in Baghdad, sending new shocks through a city that thought it had seen it all.

Despite a total curfew, the capital was a battle zone, complicating major diplomatic initiatives from the Bush administration and the independent Baker commission.

Four mosques and several homes in the neighborhood of Hurriyah were attacked by Shia militiamen in apparent reprisal for a string of car bomb explosions Thursday in Sadr City, Baghdad's Shia heartland. In that violence, Sunni insurgents killed at least 215 people in Iraq's deadliest week in more than three years of destruction since the U.S. invasion.

Friday's gruesome immolations -- a seemingly new method of brutality in the sectarian fighting -- were reported by the Associated Press, quoting an Iraqi police captain, and topped off a day in which at least 87 people were killed or found dead across Iraq.

Imad al-Hasimi, a Sunni elder in Hurriyah, told Al-Arabiya television he saw people who were drenched in kerosene and then set afire, burning to death before his eyes, according to the Associated Press.

Reports from correspondents in Baghdad indicated gun battles continued into the night despite the curfew, a measure that had been effective in past crises.

There also was fighting in Sadr City on Friday between Shia militiamen and a U.S. helicopter. Further north in Tal Afar, an area supposedly pacified by a concentration of U.S. troops, 23 people were killed and 43 wounded by two bomb explosions outside a car dealership, police said.

A major political crisis also loomed, as supporters of Muqtada al-Sadr, the most militant Shia leader in the government, demanded that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki cancel meetings planned in Amman, Jordan, next week with President George W. Bush -- or the al-Sadr faction would "suspend" its participation in Maliki's government.

Such an edict is not easy for Maliki to ignore because al-Sadr is his biggest supporter and his government would likely fall if the cleric fully withdrew his support. On the other hand, Maliki can hardly afford to offend Bush at this precarious moment, either.

There has been a frenzy of diplomatic activity in the region in apparent anticipation of sweeping new recommendations expected next month from the Baker-Hamilton commission that is studying U.S. Iraq policy. Syria and Iran were holding top-level meetings with Iraqi leaders as Vice President Dick Cheney flew to Saudi Arabia for meetings there Saturday.

The White House insisted Friday that Bush's unprecedented two-day meeting with Maliki, starting Wednesday, would continue as scheduled despite the threats from al-Sadr's followers.

Baker's report is expected in mid-December and, because the commission's work already has been embraced by Bush, it could have a major impact on restructuring U.S. policy toward Iraq.

The fighting in Baghdad this week came despite months of effort by U.S. troops brought in from other parts of Iraq to pacify the capital. An estimated 70 percent of the population of the city is Shia; 20 percent is Sunni and 10 percent Kurd. But the Sunnis are hardened fighters who control the western section of the city and if the fighting continues to rage, they are likely to call in reinforcements from Sunni areas to the west, according to Iraq experts.

CNN.com, November 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Enraged Shiites burned people to death, torched mosques and denounced Sunni leaders and the United States a day after a bloody assault on Sadr City, the Iraq capital's Shiite bastion.

That coordinated strike, which killed more than 200 and wounded more 250 Thursday, is considered the worst of the Iraq war, and Sunni militants are widely assumed to have carried it out.

Witnesses said Shiite gunmen on Friday attacked two mosques with rocket-propelled grenades and burned two other Sunni mosques in the largely Shiite area of Hurriya in northwestern Baghdad.

They reported people attacking Sunni houses with hand grenades and rocket-propelled grenades. Shiite militiamen are also said to have doused Sunnis with kerosene and burned them, and shot at other people.

One witness reported at least five people were killed. An official with the Association of Muslim Scholars, a Sunni group, said many more were killed and wounded but could not confirm numbers.

Iraqi Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said clashes erupted between two groups in Hurriya. U.S. and Iraqi troops then arrived at the scene, set up checkpoints and restored control.

The U.S. military said it could not confirm the reports of people and mosques being torched.

In Sadr City itself, two people were hurt when U.S. helicopters fired on tents set up for funerals, police said.

Mourners said they were shooting weapons in the air to commemorate the dead -- not firing at the helicopters.

But the U.S. military said troops destroyed rocket launchers that had fired six rockets.

Two Sunni Arab neighborhoods -- Ghazaliya and Adhamiya -- also withstood a barrage of mortar fire that wounded 10 people earlier.

The new attacks and counterattacks threaten to bring Iraq to the brink of all-out civil war, a process that has escalated since the February bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad. Since then, thousands have fled their homes for other neighborhoods and countries in the face of Sunni-Shiite vendettas.

Thousands more have been slain. Sectarian violence has left its imprint with the daily discovery of tortured bodies around the capital despite U.S. and Iraqi military efforts to stem the brutality.Al-Sadr bloc threatens walkout

The carnage came as anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's bloc threatened to withdraw support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki should he meet President Bush as planned next week.

Such a move could jeopardize the stability of al-Maliki's administration, which has relied on the support of both the United States and fellow Shiites.

In a statement that aired on Iraqi TV, al-Sadr representative Salih al-Akeili blamed U.S.-led forces for fostering conditions that led to the massacre Thursday in Sadr City.

"We announce that if the security situation and the basic services do not improve, and if the prime minister goes ahead and meets with the criminal Bush in Amman, then we will suspend our memberships with the Iraqi parliament and the government," said al-Akeili, a member of al-Sadr's bloc in Iraq's parliament.

Al-Akeili said his bloc -- with 30 seats in the 275-member parliament and six Cabinet ministries -- is demanding an end to the occupation and a withdrawal from Iraq, with a timetable for such a departure.

The White House said the talks in Jordan would go forward.

"It's an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government, and it is not going to work," deputy White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said. "Securing Baghdad and gaining control of the violent situation will be a priority agenda item" when Bush and Maliki meet.

Al-Maliki's office has not responded to the threat.

DOJ_NMG_0098553

U.S. commanders suspect al-Sadr's militia, the Mehdi Army, has been responsible for sectarian violence against Sunnis, although the cleric has denounced such attacks.Al-Sadr challenge to Sunni leader

Meanwhile, al-Sadr challenged a top Sunni leader -- Sheikh Hareth al-Dhari, the head of the Association of Muslim Scholars -- to take steps to end the violence, including the issuance of fatwas, or Islamic decrees.

Speaking in the southern city of Kufa, near Najaf, during prayers Friday, al-Sadr said one fatwa should "prohibit the killing of all Shiite Muslims because this will save the blood of Muslims in Iraq."

Another should prohibit people from joining al Qaeda or any party "harboring hatred against the descendants of the Prophet Mohammed."

"We condemn and denounce the blasts," he said.

Police called the strikes the worst since the war began in 2003. The Iraqi Interior Ministry imposed a curfew for Baghdad on Thursday evening. It's unclear how long the curfew will last. Baghdad International Airport also was closed till further notice.

The bloodshed drew a strong denunciation from the United States.

"We condemn such acts of violence that are clearly aimed at undermining the Iraqi people's hopes for a peaceful and stable Iraq," said deputy White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

Meanwhile, police reported a U.S. raid on al-Sadr's office in Baquba, a provincial capital northeast of Baghdad. Five people were detained, and weapons were seized. The U.S. military said it was checking the report. Other violence

Also Friday, a suicide bomber killed 22 and wounded 30 after detonating explosives strapped to his body and in a car in the northern city of Tal Afar, authorities said.

The attacker parked his vehicle, got out and set off the car bomb in a car lot before detonating himself, police said. Tal Afar, a largely Turkmen city in Nineveh province, is about 250 miles (400 kilometers) north of Baghdad. Tal Afar has endured Sunni-Shiite sectarian fighting in the past, but it isn't clear what the motive was for Friday's attack.

In the southern city of Basra, a British soldier was shot dead Friday during a "search and detention operation," the British Defense Ministry said. The number of British military deaths in the Iraq war stands at 126.

Mosques Hit Amid Baghdad Clashes (BBC)

BBC.com, November 24, 2006

Gunmen have attacked a Sunni Arab area of Baghdad, burning mosques and homes, with at least 30 people reported killed, according to police officials.

The attacks were in apparent revenge for Thursday's bombings that killed more than 200 people in the Shia Sadr City district of the Iraqi capital.

Fleets of vans left Baghdad to take the coffins of those victims for burial in the ancient Shia holy city of Najaf.

The latest violence came despite a city-wide curfew and appeals for calm.

To add to the Iraqi government's woes, a key Shia group threatened to quit parliament and the cabinet if Prime Minister Nouri Maliki goes ahead with a planned meeting with President Bush next week.

It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government

White House spokesman

There is a real feeling that the situation is moving to the brink amid the cycle of attacks, says the BBC's David Loyn in Baghdad.

Thursday's bombing and retaliatory attacks were "deplorable", the White House said.

"It is an outrage that these terrorists are targeting innocents in a brazen effort to topple a democratically elected government. These killers will not succeed," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

Iraqi police said some 30 people had been killed, but a defence ministry officials told the French news agency, AFP, that the clashes were so intense that precise information was difficult to obtain.

Clashes also erupted in Sadr City on Friday, where residents said a US helicopter fired on militiamen who were launching rocket attacks.

Violence was also reported in other parts of Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq, including in the northern town of Talafar where a suspected double suicide bombing killed at least 22 people.

Baghdad has been under an indefinite curfew since Thursday's bombings and the airport remains closed.

The security situation has forced Iraqi President Jalal Talabani to postpone a visit to Tehran on Saturday for talks with his Iranian counterpart Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

During the curfew, the only people and vehicles officially allowed on the streets of Baghdad were the residents of Sadr City who began the journey to bury their dead.

DOJ_NMG_0098554

Thousands of mourners came out onto the streets, walking alongside a seemingly endless fleet of mini-buses, each carrying a coffin on its roof.

The bodies were then driven to an ancient cemetery in the holy city of Najaf, the traditional burial place for Shias, 160km (100 miles) south of Baghdad.

Thursday's multiple car bomb attacks in Sadr City - in which 250 people were also wounded - were the deadliest in Iraq since the US-led invasion of 2003.

Moqtada Sadr's group is calling for US forces to leave

Sadr City is largely controlled by the Mehdi Army, a Shia Iraqi militias accused of carrying out many sectarian attacks on Sunni areas.

Thursday's bombings could have a deep political impact, with the group led by radical cleric Moqtada Sadr calling on Mr Maliki to call off his planned talks with President Bush.

People in Sadr City faced insurgent attacks as well as repeated raids by US forces, the group said in a statement.

Mr Sadr's followers hold six cabinet posts and have 30 members in the 275-seat parliament.

The withdrawal of the group headed by Mr Sadr would be a major blow to an already unstable government, the BBC's Andy Gallacher in Baghdad says.

The meeting with Mr Maliki is due to take place in Jordan, and a White House spokesman said on Friday there had been no changes to Mr Bush's schedule.

The U.S. In Iraq: What's Next? (WSJ)

By Lauren Etter

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

President Bush said last week he won't make any immediate decisions about troop levels in Iraq, despite mounting pressure to change course on the war. * * *

But it is clear the administration is in search of a new strategy. The electoral shake-up in Congress and recent sharp rise in sectarian violence in Iraq have served as a powerful wake-up call. Prominent politicians from both parties are offering up ideas for a change -- ranging from an immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops to a substantial increase.

Meantime, a bipartisan team led by former Secretary of State James Baker is expected to present the president with a report on recommended next steps in Iraq sometime next month. A separate military panel will provide its own strategy recommendations in the coming weeks.

Here's a look at some of the proposals being floated:

Withdrawal: Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) is calling for all troops to withdraw from Iraq "at the earliest practicable date." Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) is proposing a gradual withdrawal over the next four to six months. The Levin proposal has become one of the more popular views among Democrats, and even has the support of some Republicans. Critics say that an abrupt U.S. withdrawal would only open the door to deeper sectarian violence.

Leslie Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations and an adviser to the Baker commission, says any talk about troop withdrawals needs to be coupled with a political settlement. He advocates splitting Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions that divide oil revenue. Some are calling for Iraq's neighbors, Syria and Iran, to be included in any discussion on Iraq's future.

More troops: There are about 141,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) is calling for a boost to stabilize the country and provide Iraqis more security and training. He has informally proposed sending an additional 20,000 troops to Iraq, which he says would entail expanding the Army and Marine Corps by as many as 100,000 people. Analysts say it is unlikely the Pentagon would send that many -- if it increases troop levels at all.

One problem with a sharp troop increase: U.S. ground forces are already stretched thinly around the world. About 40% of the U.S. military's deployable combat brigades are in Iraq and Afghanistan. In theory, a troop increase could come from decreasing the time between deployments and increasing the length of combat time. But that could result in exhaustion among soldiers. Already more soldiers are receiving just one year at home -- instead of two -- for every year deployed.

Unchanged troop levels: The middle-road option is to maintain current troop levels. Central Command leader General John Abizaid told the Senate Armed Forces Committee earlier this month that "the troop levels need to stay where they are." He said a reduction would lead to more sectarian violence, while an increase would further strain the military. However, he would have troops shift their role to more of an advisory one, making sure Iraqi security forces are "more capable in their ability to confront the sectarian problem."

This view is in line with the one voiced by Mr. Bush, who has maintained that U.S. troops need to stay in Iraq until "victory" is achieved -- that is, until Iraq can govern and defend itself. Public opinion polls, however, show that about 52% of Americans want to see the number of troops in Iraq reduced, while 39% of Americans would like to see troop levels maintained.

Draft: Rep. Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.) advocates reviving the military draft, which was ended in 1973. He argues the costs of the current war are falling too heavily on the underprivileged. That proposal, however, is unlikely to generate much support in Congress, and has little support at the Pentagon.

Army Expands Training For Advisers Who Will Try To Improve Iraq's Security Forces (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

FORT RILEY, Kan., Nov. 18 — This wind-swept stretch of Kansas has become the hub of a major new push by the United States Army to overhaul its effort to advise Iraq's fledgling security forces.

Following a disappointing performance by many Iraqi units and complaints that earlier efforts to train American advisers had been handicapped by bureaucratic inertia, the Army has handed the mission to Maj. Gen. Carter F. Ham, who had a previous stint as a commander in Iraq.

Along with nearly 1,000 soldiers from his First Infantry Division, General Ham has sought to improve the training of the advisers as the Army has moved to upgrade the quality of these teams.

The revamped effort began with little fanfare this summer, but has gained prominence in recent weeks as experts inside and outside the government have recommended that the military expand the advisers' ranks as part of a renewed push to strengthen the Iraqi security forces.

The Army is "transitioning from an endeavor that has been less than a high priority to one that is of the highest priority," said Jack Keane, a retired four-star general who served as the Army vice chief of staff during the first months of the war. "And it is long overdue."

Senior American military commanders calculate that strengthening the Iraqi forces, paired with efforts at political reconciliation by the Iraqi government, will enable the Iraqis to take more responsibility for their security and allow the United States to eventually begin withdrawing its forces.

But to date, the Iraqi Army has had trouble providing all the reinforcements American commanders have requested for the stepped-up security operation in Baghdad, even as the level of sectarian violence there soars. At the same time, Iraq's government has yet to confront the country's militias, some of which have significant sway over police units. It remains far from clear whether increasing the number and caliber of American advisers can provide enough of the security gains the United States is seeking.

Still, in recent exercises, the would-be advisers were confronted with an early dose of reality, in training that included some of the vexing scenarios they are likely to face in Iraq: an Iraqi battalion commander quarreling angrily with his Iraqi police counterpart, Iraqi troops who roughed up a detainee and an Iraqi crowd irate at the troops who had conducted a surprise raid.

The American Army has long experience in training and deploying military advisers, most notably in Vietnam. There, the Army began with an active advisory program before the fighting escalated into a major conflict. In Iraq, however, the war began with major combat; American advisers, now called "transition teams," were introduced later, almost as an afterthought. "When we first started this transition-team business in both Iraq and Afghanistan, it was very much a hit-and-miss proposition," said General Ham, who acknowledged that the program faced early problems. "The selection of individuals for duty on transition teams was probably more haphazard than any of us would have liked. The training was not standardized across the various training locations. It does not appear that it was well-resourced across the force.

"I think that was what led to some of the earlier criticisms, and in my view the criticism was fair and justified," General Ham added. "We need to do it better, and this initiative that started the training here at Fort Riley is a part of that."

There are currently more than 4,000 American troops organized into more than 430 teams to advise the Iraqi Army, police forces and border guards. General John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, said recently that the United States planned to increase the size of the teams, which generally have 11 members, so that they can better train Iraqi battalions, which can have more than 700 soldiers. General Abizaid also said that the plan was to attach the advisers not only to Iraqi battalions but also at lower levels, to companies and possibly even platoons. Those ideas, however, have yet to be incorporated in the advisers' training program.

General Ham worked with senior officers from two of his brigades to organize the program, which lasts a jam-packed 60 days. Soldiers practice a variety of combat skills, including how to counter the ever-present roadside bombs. They also receive some cultural training and, for those headed to Iraq, 50 hours of Arabic language instruction — enough to provide only the most rudimentary skills but more training than most advisers had previously received. There is additional training in Kuwait and at the sprawling American military base at Taji, Iraq.

According to General Ham, the advisory teams include more active-duty soldiers than during the early days of the program, when reservists were more commonly used. As a matter of Army policy, staffing the teams is now a higher priority for Army personnel officers than filling the empty slots in units on alert to deploy to Iraq and Afghanistan.

According to current plans, Fort Riley will train the majority of the Army teams that are sent to advise the Iraqi Army, national police and border guards. The rest of the Army teams are to be drawn from units in Iraq. (The Marines train their own advisers separately.)

In the field, the teams are managed by Brig. Gen. Dana Pittard, an assistant division commander, who provides feedback to Fort Riley. The expectation is that American advisers will still be attached to Iraqi military and police units even after the withdrawal of American combat forces is under way.

"I feel like we'll be the last men standing at the end of the U.S. presence here," General Pittard observed in August.

Maj. Andrew Yerkes, who is leading a team that is to advise Iraq's National Police, was thrust in a difficult situation during a recent exercise. A squabble broke out between a person playing the role of an Iraqi battalion commander and another acting as an Iraqi police captain over how to secure the town, a possible situation since Iraq's army is largely Shiite and the police in Sunni areas are recruited from local communities. Within minutes, the Iraqi battalion commander stormed off, leaving Major Yerkes and his soldiers to ponder how they might better defuse tensions in the future.

"It showed my team a different piece of culture we have not been exposed to and forced us to think our way through a problem," he said.

General Ham is still looking for ways to improve the training. For instance, he hopes to arrange for the teams of advisers to do some training with the American combat brigades they will work with in Iraq.

Another constraint is the absence of actual Iraqis, or in the case of teams being trained for Afghan duty, Afghan soldiers.

Qualified Iraqi commanders are needed far more urgently in Iraq, so the roles of commanders, interpreters and townspeople in the exercises are played by American soldiers and contractors who were born in Iraq or are of Arab descent. (The battalion commander in Major Yerkes's exercise lives in San Diego and left Iraq many years ago.)

Even so, the trainees say the exercises are useful. Maj. William Cotty, one of a small number of Special Forces officers who have volunteered to serve as advisers, is leading an advisory team that will be assigned to an Iraqi Army unit. A seasoned officer who served in Colombia and Afghanistan, Major Cotty was put to the test during a raid he conducted with a mock Iraqi battalion commander.

Major Cotty helped the "Iraqis" plan a raid to capture a suspected insurgent in the fictional town of Surdash, speaking through an interpreter to the battalion commander, in this case an Arabic-speaking American soldier who was born in Sudan. In the exercise, the operation led to a firefight in which a suspected insurgent was killed. The "Iraqis" hauled away a captive and began to pummel him as an angry crowd began yelling at the Americans. In an effort to disperse the crowd, Major Cotty fired several blanks into the air.

At a review conducted immediately afterward, the advisers were cautioned to make sure the suspected insurgents they planned to capture had not been picked out by Iraqi units as part of a sectarian or personal vendetta.

Officers observing the exercise also suggested that the major might have taken other steps before firing warning shots, since the shots might encourage Iraqi soldiers to fire wildly. The Americans, for example, might have brought along a loudspeaker and used their interpreter to talk to the townspeople about the point of the raid. Major Cotty said the exercise was helpful.

"According to the book on direct action, I had speed, surprise and violence of action," he said. "The number one thing I probably took away from this was the loudspeaker," he said.

Funerals, Revenge Killings After Iraq Attacks (AP)

Associated Press, November 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- Gunmen raided two Shiite homes in Diyala province, a hotbed of Iraq's Sunni-Arab insurgency, and shot and killed 21 men in front of their relatives, police said Saturday.

The attack by suspected insurgents on Friday night targeted members of the al-Sawed Shiite tribe in the village of Balad Ruz, 45 miles northeast of Baghdad, a police officer said, speaking on condition of anonymity to protect his own security, as officials often do in the increasingly volatile province.

He said police could not reach the remote village to collect the bodies and take them to a morgue until Saturday morning. The province, almost equally divided between Sunnis and Shiites, is the site of many sectarian attacks.

Also Saturday, U.S. and Iraqi forces killed 22 insurgents and an Iraqi civilian, and destroyed a factory being used to make roadside bombs, during several raids north of Baghdad. No coalition casualties were reported.

Baghdad remained under a 24-hour curfew Saturday as coalition forces tried to prevent a surge of revenge attacks for the five bombings and two mortar rounds that killed 215 people in the Shiite slum of Sadr City on Thursday.

Such violence was particularly gruesome on Friday, when suspected Shiite militiamen seized six Sunnis as they left prayer services at mosques and burned them alive with kerosene in an attack in the mostly Shia neighborhood of Hurriyah.

Iraqi soldiers at a nearby army post failed to intervene in the assault by suspected members of the Shiite Mahdi Army militia or subsequent attacks that killed at least 19 other Sunnis, including women and children, in the same neighborhood, said police Capt. Jamil Hussein.

In recent months, most of the thousands of dead bodies that have been found dumped across Baghdad and other cities in central Iraq have been of victims who were tortured and then shot to death, according to police.

The suspected militia killers often have used electric drills on their captives' bodies before killing them. The bodies are frequently decapitated. But burning victims alive introduced a new method of brutality that was likely to be reciprocated by the other sect as the Shiites and Sunnis continue killing one another in unprecedented numbers.

Friday's gruesome attack capped a day during which at least 87 people were killed or found dead in sectarian violence across Iraq. In Hurriyah, the rampaging militiamen also burned and blew up four mosques and torched several homes in the district, Hussein said.

The chaos cast a shadow over the Amman, Jordan, summit next week between Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. President George W. Bush.

Politicians loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr have threatened to boycott parliament and the Cabinet if al-Maliki goes ahead with the meeting. The political bloc, known as Sadrists, is a mainstay of support for al-Maliki. The Mahdi Army is the organization's armed wing.

For a second day Saturday, funeral processions were held in Sadr City for the victims of Thursday's deadly attack by Sunni insurgents there. An official from al-Sadr's main office in Sadr City visited hospitals treating some of the 257 people who were wounded in the attack, and he gave them small donations of cash in envelopes.

Visiting tents that have been set up in Sadr City for families conducting funerals, the official, Ibrahim al-Jabiri, sharply criticized Iraq's government and its forces for failing to stop such attacks.

During three of the coalition raids that took place north of Baghdad on Saturday morning, soldiers killed 10 insurgents near the city of Taji, which is 12 miles north of Baghdad and home to a major U.S. air base. An Iraqi teenage boy also was killed and a pregnant Iraqi woman was wounded in the crossfire, the military said.

U.S. aircraft were called in to destroy a factory being used to make roadside bombs, and soldiers searching the area also found hidden caches of rocket-propelled grenades, machine guns, anti-aircraft weapons and pipe bombs.

Many U.S. soldiers are killed and wounded in Iraq by powerful roadside bombs used by insurgents.

"Coalition forces strive to mitigate risks to civilians while in pursuit of terrorists. It is always a shame when terrorists hide among civilian women and children, putting them in harm's way," the U.S. military said.

In another area north of Baghdad, coalition forces attacked three vehicles carrying 12 insurgents, including one they were searching for because he allegedly was involved in the manufacture of car bombs, the coalition said. The soldiers opened fire on the cars when they ignored warning shots, and all the militants were killed, the military said.

No soldiers or civilians were wounded during that operation. The coalition declined to give its exact location.

More U.S. Troops Dying In Anbar Province (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

In the three months since thousands of U.S. forces poured into Baghdad to quash escalating violence, far more American troops have died in Iraq's volatile western Anbar province than in the capital city.

More than two-thirds of the 245 U.S. casualties between Aug. 7, the start of the Baghdad offensive, and Nov. 7 occurred outside Baghdad — which military leaders have called the "center of gravity" of Iraq, and the key to success in the war. Four in 10 deaths over those three months have been in Anbar province, a Sunni insurgency stronghold where U.S. Marines have largely taken the lead.

Marines, who comprise only about 15 percent of the 141,000 U.S. forces currently in Iraq, accounted for nearly 28 percent of the fatalities over the three-month period.

The Baghdad assault, dubbed Operation Together Forward, started slowly in June. It escalated in early August when about 7,200 additional U.S. troops, including an agile Stryker brigade, were brought into enforce a broad array of checkpoints, curfews and house-to-house searches.

As total U.S. war casualties mounted through this summer and into the fall — from a total of about 2,500 by mid-June to more than 2,870 now — military officials blamed the rise on the Baghdad offensive, as well as the holy observance of Ramadan. The escalating violence made October the fourth deadliest month since the war began.

"Baghdad is the center of gravity for Iraq. We must get it right in Baghdad," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said at the time. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld added, "Most of the violence occurs within 30 kilometers of Baghdad."

In terms of actual U.S. casualties, the opposite was true.

Most of the 245 deaths during the first three months of Operation Together Forward occurred beyond Baghdad's boundaries. According to an analysis by The Associated Press, there were 73 casualties in Baghdad between Aug. 7 and Nov. 7, while there were 103 in Anbar.

In comparison, during the first three months of 2006, there were 148 U.S. military deaths in Iraq — nearly 100 fewer than the August-November timeframe.

The death count in Anbar, combined with the deadly spike in sectarian attacks in Baghdad this week, paints a picture of an Iraq still teetering on the brink of civil war, battered by religious divisions, al-Qaida terrorists and a stubborn and diverse insurgency.

The unabated violence comes as the Bush administration and the U.S. military are conducting several wide-ranging reviews of Iraq war policy under the critical eyes of Democrats who are poised to take control of both houses of Congress early next year. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Congressman Lee Hamilton, is expected to issue its report soon.

Little more than a week ago, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, Gen. John Abizaid, acknowledged that the Sunni-dominated Anbar province was still not under control. Yet, military officials and Rumsfeld have often asserted that most of the violence in Iraq has been near Baghdad, and that the military effort must be centered there.

The problems in Anbar prompted U.S. military officials last week to move more than 2,200 additional Marines to the western province in a short-term effort to shore up U.S. combat power there.

Such troop shifts have drawn criticism from Congress in the past. In August, as the Pentagon prepared for the Baghdad operation, Republican Senator John McCain likened the positioning of forces in Iraq to a game of "whack-a-mole," where generals try to curb violence in one area only to see it pop up somewhere else.

Overall, the U.S. Army — which has roughly 108,000 soldiers in Iraq — has borne the brunt of the deaths throughout the war, including 163 of the 245 deaths the AP looked at during the three-month period. There were 68 Marines killed during that time, along with seven Navy members and six in the Air Force, and one was unknown.

The most prevalent cause of death has remained the same across the country. Roadside bombs and other improvised explosive devices caused about 40 percent of the casualties, while another 13 percent were caused by small arms fire or snipers and 33 percent by unspecified combat incidents. Other causes of death included vehicle and helicopter crashes and non-combat incidents.

The high rate of Marine deaths is due in part to the fact that most are performing combat duties in the dangerous Anbar region. While the Army has a much larger presence in Iraq, some soldiers are serving in support roles or working in the headquarters units and are not doing combat duty.

Gen. James T. Conway, commandant of the U.S. Marine Corps, said this week that the decision to send more troops to Anbar is an effort to take advantage of "some of the momentum that is taking place. ... It is reinforcing success based on what we see the tribes doing."

Brzezinski Calls Idea To Boost U.S. Forces In Iraq A `Gimmick' (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson

Bloomberg, November 25, 2006

Nov. 24 (Bloomberg) -- Zbigniew Brzezinski, a former U.S. national security adviser, said it would be ``a gimmick" for the Defense Department to increase the number of troops in Iraq temporarily before beginning to withdraw them.

``I wouldn't be at all surprised if that actually happens," Brzezinski said on ``Political Capital with Al Hunt," to air on Bloomberg Television this weekend.

``It's a gimmick because it satisfies McCain, it satisfies the hardliners," Brzezinski said, referring to Senator John McCain. The Arizona Republican, who is exploring a run for the presidency in 2008, said Nov. 19 that U.S. troops are ``fighting and dying for a failed policy" in Iraq unless they get enough reinforcements to ensure a military victory.

A Defense Department review of Iraq options is likely to advocate an immediate increase of as many as 30,000 American troops, followed by a reduction to perhaps less than half the 140,000 now there, the Washington Post reported Nov. 20. President George W. Bush is also expecting advice from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group on stabilizing Iraq for an eventual pullout.

Brzezinski said U.S. and Iraqi officials should jointly announce a withdrawal date for American troops that comes before the end of 2007. Even in the best possible outcome, though, Iraq isn't likely to be secular or democratic, he said.

``Obviously it's not going to be what we have previously described as a victory," he said.

Advising Democrats

With Democrats set to take control of the U.S. Congress, Bush is under pressure to address concerns about how long U.S. military personnel will be in Iraq. Brzezinski is scheduled to discuss the issue with House Democrats at a Dec. 5 meeting.

Brzezinski, 78, advised President Jimmy Carter from 1977 to 1981 and is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. During his White House tenure, the U.S. normalized relations with China and reached an agreement with the former Soviet Union to curtail nuclear weapons.

His prediction about Iraq coincides with assessments by other former policy makers. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who negotiated the Paris Peace Accords in 1973 that led to the U.S. pullout from Vietnam, said Nov. 19 that a ``clear" military victory in Iraq isn't ``possible."

Vietnam Worry

Brzezinski, addressing whether U.S. officials will temporarily boost the number of troops and then cut them, said:

``My concern is that they'll do it slowly and then, in the end, inadvertently, they will imitate our bug-out from Vietnam," he said. ``Namely, we'll blame the Iraqis and leave, thereby creating the worst of all situations."

Brzezinski said the U.S. should talk to Iraqi leaders about a date for a U.S. departure from the country to ``flush out those Iraqi leaders who have staying power," and then make sure to announce the pullout jointly.

The Iraqis should then invite their Muslim neighbors, along with Pakistan, Morocco and Algeria, to an international conference to discuss ways to stabilize the country after the Americans leave, Brzezinski said.

Lastly, the U.S. should organize an international effort to help the economic recovery of Iraq after the U.S. withdrawal, Brzezinski said.

``With the passage of time, the chances of implementing that advice effectively are being reduced," he said. ``That's a tragedy."

`Basis for Power'

After a U.S. withdrawal, Iraq isn't likely to be stable, and the ``basis for power" will be a coalition between the Shiites and Kurds, Brzezinski said.

Brzezinski also questioned the Bush administration's policy on Iran, calling it ``self-defeating." Asked whether the U.S. should have to accept the reality of the Iranians obtaining nuclear weapons, he said, ``I'm not entirely convinced they are really seeking them."

The Iranian leadership is ``seeking a comprehensive nuclear program" that would put the country in a position to produce nuclear weapons, Brzezinski said.

``Japan can produce nuclear weapons very quickly, but they haven't done it, and I think that's where Iran wants to end up," he said.

Uncle Charlie Wants You! (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Harlem Congressman Charles Rangel created a stir once again this week with his call for renewing the military draft. His own party leaders quickly disavowed any such plan, suggesting just how unpopular the idea is among most Americans. Yet the proposal deserves some further inspection before it vanishes, if only to expose its false assumptions about the current U.S. military.

A vocal Iraq war critic, Mr. Rangel told CBS News recently, "There's no question in my mind that this President and this Administration would never have invaded Iraq, especially on the flimsy evidence that was presented to the Congress, if indeed we had a draft and members of Congress and the Administration thought that their kids from their communities would be placed in harm's way."

In other words, Mr. Rangel's real argument is about class in America, not over the best way to fight Islamic terrorism overseas. He's suggesting that somehow only the poor serve in Uncle Sam's Army. But his views are both out of date and condescending to those who do serve. Alas, they are shared by many on the political left, who think that the military places an unfair burden on the working class. * * *

In this mythology, the military is overly reliant on uneducated dupes from poor communities because those from more affluent backgrounds don't want to serve. But the truth is closer to the opposite, according to a recent Heritage Foundation report on the demographic characteristics of the military. It's titled "Who Are the Recruits?" and Mr. Rangel, a Korean War veteran, might want to read it before implying that the military doesn't look like America.

According to the report, which analyzed the most recent Pentagon enlistee data, "the only group that is lowering its participation in the military is the poor. The percentage of recruits from the poorest American neighborhoods (with one-fifth of the U.S. population) declined from 18 percent in 1999 to 14.6 percent in 2003, 14.1 percent in 2004, and 13.7 percent in 2005." Put another way, if military burdens aren't spread more evenly among socio-economic groups in the U.S., it's because the poor are underrepresented.

Or consider education levels. In the general U.S. population, the high school graduation rate is a little under 80%. But among military recruits from 2003-2005, nearly 97% had high school diplomas. The academic quality of recruits has also been rising this decade. According to Heritage, the military defines a "high quality" recruit as someone who scores above the 50th percentile on the Armed Forces Qualifying Test and has a high school degree. The percentage of high quality recruits had climbed to 67% in 2004 and 64% in 2005, up from 57% in 2001.

And what about race? In 2004, about 76% of the U.S. population was white, which was only slightly above the 73% of military recruits (and 72% of Army recruits) who were white. Blacks made up 12.17% of the population in 2004, and made up 14.54% of recruits in 2004 and 13% in 2005. Hispanic Americans are also slightly overrepresented in the military compared to their share of the population, but also not to a degree that suggests some worrisome cultural chasm among the races.

The overall truth is that today's recruits come primarily from the middle class, and, more importantly, they come willingly. This makes them more amenable to training and more likely to adapt to the rigors of military culture. An Army of draftees would so expand the number of recruits that training resources would inevitably be stretched and standards watered down. Meanwhile, scarce resources would be devoted to tens of thousands of temporary soldiers who planned to leave as soon as their year or two of forced service was up.

It's true that such training would help to shape up more young Americans who could use a few weeks of Marine discipline at Parris Island, and if this is what Mr. Rangel has in mind he should say so. But the price would be a less effective fighting force, and precisely at a time when experience and technological mastery are more important than ever in a fighting force.

"The military doesn't want a draft," says Tim Kane, an Air Force veteran and author of the Heritage study. "What the military wants is the most effective fighting force they can field. They want to win wars and minimize casualties. And you don't do that when you're forced to take less-educated, unmotivated people."

What about Mr. Rangel's point that conscription would have made intervention in Iraq less likely? It's impossible to know, but this is a dangerous argument for the future in any case. The main reason for having an effective Army is to deter enemies by making them believe we have the will to fight if we must. Mr. Rangel is saying the U.S. needs a conscript Army precisely to show an adversary we'll never use it. This is a good way to tempt Iran, say, into provocations that could lead to larger conflicts in which we would have no choice but to fight. * * *

Mr. Rangel insists he will reintroduce a draft bill "as soon as we start the new session," but for all of these reasons it isn't likely to go anywhere. In 2004 GOP House leaders scheduled a floor vote on Mr. Rangel's Universal National Service Act, which would have required "all persons" to perform military or civilian service "in furtherance of national defense." The bill lost 402-2, and even Mr. Rangel opposed it.

Inspect Baluchistan (WSJ)

By Ashley Bommer

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Hamid Karzai and Pervez Musharraf are arguing about the Pakistani province of Baluchistan. Intelligence sources -- and President Karzai -- say that the Taliban's kingpin, Mullah Omar, is operating out of Quetta, Baluchistan's capital. And he is sending arms and fighters into southwest Afghanistan. No wonder President Karzai is upset. The frontline of the Taliban and al Qaeda insurgency has a backline in Pakistan. But U.S. troops cannot go into Pakistan -- precisely where al Qaeda and the Taliban are. So there is a simple next step: Gen. Musharraf should agree to U.N. inspectors.

DOJ_NMG_0098561

Pakistan continues to challenge the facts. Last month, Gen. Musharraf said, "So, let's nail these people, like President Karzai, who think they are coming from Pakistan. And I am suggesting we will mine the borders. Let anyone who's going from here get into the mines. We will fence the borders. Let's fence the borders."

An independent evaluation of the facts is necessary. The only system in the world that can do this is the U.N.'s Monitoring, Verification, and Inspection Committee (Unmovic). With over 300 experts, it can conduct a comprehensive fact-finding mission in Baluchistan immediately. Their experts, ready to be dispatched, include weapons specialists, scientists, engineers and analysts. They can determine if the Taliban command hubs do exist. They will report back to the international community truthfully. Unmovic's record of independence speaks for itself. At no time, for instance, did it find WMD or the continuation of such programs in Iraq.

Unmovic's mission in Baluchistan will be dangerous. But we cannot continue to sit by idly while al Qaeda and the Taliban gain more control in Afghanistan. International observers will not only deter efforts by al Qaeda and the Taliban, they will verify if Taliban hubs are providing military, financial and propaganda to operatives in Afghanistan. Gen. Musharraf should prove he does not want terrorism to destroy Afghanistan. To do this, he should invite U.N. inspectors to Baluchistan immediately.

Ms. Bommer worked at the U.S. Mission to the U.N. during the Clinton administration.

Gonzales Defends Detainee Policy In Academy Speech (AFT)

Air Force Times, November 24, 2006

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Air Force Academy cadets recently that terrorists will not rise to the example of the U.S. when it comes to treatment of prisoners.

In a lecture on civil liberties and the war on terrorism to about 700 cadets, Gonzales said the U.S. has “rightfully positioned itself in this conflict and other conflicts throughout history as a mature and moral leader — an example to follow,” according to an Air Force press release.

“Yet we know that the fair and humane treatment of the detainees at [the U.S. military’s detention facility in] Guantanamo [Bay, Cuba] will have absolutely no effect on how their confederates treat our soldiers and civilians,” he said.

Gonzales is one of a dozen Bush administration officials named Nov. 14 in a lawsuit brought in Germany by civil rights groups for abuses of prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and at Guantanamo.

The release did not say whether Gonzales addressed the charges made against him and others, including departing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Calls placed Friday to the academy press office were not immediately returned.

During his lecture, Gonzales defended the domestic surveillance program that the Bush administration began in secret, saying it is not damaging the civil rights of American citizens.

“It protects citizens from terrorist attacks,” he said. “Critics who say otherwise are perpetuating myths.”

Gonzales was an enlisted airman from 1973 to 1975 before being accepted at the Air Force Academy. He was a cadet from 1975 to 1977 before transferring to Rice University in Houston.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Have A Few Options For Pursuing Barge Case (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, November 25, 2006

They could take it to high court or choose retrial

Federal prosecutors are pondering their next step after an appeals panel last August threw out fraud and conspiracy convictions against several ex-Merrill Lynch & Co. executives in a 2004 Enron case.

They have asked a judge to waive the men's right to a speedy trial so the government can decide whether to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court to reinstate their convictions or move forward with a retrial.

Otherwise, a retrial would have to start a few days after Christmas.

"As long as the possibility exists that the government may seek Supreme Court review, it would be impractical to begin trial or hold pretrial proceedings," prosecutors said in a recent court filing.

They want U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein, who presided over the original case, to schedule a status conference in the case for February next year. The judge has yet to rule.

The trial of four former Merrill Lynch & Co. executives and two former Enron executives centered on a year-end 1999 sale of power barges moored off the coast of Nigeria to the brokerage so the energy company could appear to have met earnings targets.

The case was the only Enron-related criminal trial to ensnare a chunk of Wall Street, accusing the Merrill executives of participating in a crime to curry favor and gain more lucrative investment banking business from the energy company.

The barge deal was a disguised loan because it went through after ex-Enron finance chief Andrew Fastow assured Daniel Bayly, former head of investment banking at Merrill, that Enron would buy back or resell the barges within six months.

Fastow testified during the criminal trial of former Enron Chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling earlier this year that he made that promise to Bayly.

Fastow is serving a six-year prison term for orchestrating schemes to cook Enron's books while enriching himself.

Jurors in the barge trial convicted five of the defendants and acquitted one of the Enron executives.

The Merrill defendants appealed, and last August a three-judge panel from the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 to throw out fraud and conspiracy convictions against Bayly, James Brown and Robert Furst because prosecutors used a flawed theory.

Specifically, the panel said the Merrill defendants could not have deprived Enron of their honest services because they didn't rob the company of money or property.

The panel also tossed out fraud and conspiracy convictions against the fourth Merrill defendant, William Fuhs, for lack of evidence.

Perjury and obstruction of justice convictions against Brown were upheld.

The Enron felon, Dan Boyle, didn't appeal and is in prison. The four Merrill defendants each spent a year or less in prison before they were released on bond before or after the August ruling.

The Justice Department has until mid-January to appeal to the Supreme Court. The government also can retry Bayly, Brown and Furst or walk away. Werlein has wiped Fuhs' record clean.

Gary Brown, former special counsel for the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs in its Enron investigation after the company imploded in December 2001, said it was worth the government's effort to retry the trio for aiding and abetting fraud.

He said banks and brokerages are more likely to refuse to participate in fraudulent deals to please clients if they know they face possible prosecution and prison.

"The thing that gets the attention of corporate executives is watching people go to jail for securities fraud and other kinds of frauds," he said. "All these guys have gone to jail for some period of time, but I can see a lot of merit for going back and retrying it."

A Long Wall Street Fight, Unfinished (WP)

By Alec Klein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

Antagonist of Allied Capital Now Accuses Local Company of 'Pretexting'

They call it the Hundred Years' War.

Not because it involves brutish medieval unpleasantries like the battle axe. It involves only the sharp edge of cutting words between a Washington area company and a New York investor in a war of Wall Street that merely feels like it has lasted a century.

In the latest salvo, hedge fund manager David Einhorn has accused Allied Capital Corp., a company that lends money to and invests in private businesses, of fraud. He also suspects that Allied may have broken into his personal records in a mode of corporate espionage called "pretexting." Some unknown party, Einhorn said, illegally gained access to his telephone records and those of other Allied critics. "The only group of individuals with any motive to access my phone records and the records of four other prominent Allied critics is Allied management," Einhorn wrote in a Sept. 15 letter to Allied's board of directors.

Allied denied authorizing someone to use pretexting to access Einhorn's phone records. Rather, it continued its long-standing position that Einhorn has malevolent intent, saying he is trying to spread false information in an attempt to drive down the company's stock price. Einhorn is a well-known short seller of Allied, meaning that he's betting that the company's stock will fall. Short sellers borrow shares and sell them in anticipation of buying the shares later at a lower price, hoping to pocket the profit.

"David's motives are simple. He makes money if he can drive down the price of Allied Capital stock," said William L. Walton, Allied's chairman and chief executive, according to a transcript of the company's earnings conference call with Wall Street analysts on Nov. 8.

The basic plot of this battle begins in May 2002, when Einhorn told a conference in New York that he was shorting Allied's stock because he believed the company had overvalued some of its assets. Allied's stock price plunged, but then recovered when the company denied wrongdoing and continued paying high dividends to shareholders.

Einhorn and others who questioned Allied's accounting for some of its loans did not go away. They were joined in 2004 by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department, which opened inquiries that neither will comment on but appear to be ongoing. Allied disclosed in its latest federal filing that the Small Business Administration's Office of the Inspector General has begun its own investigation into Business Loan Express, the same Allied unit that has drawn the attention of just about everyone else. BLX, as it is known, makes loans backed by the SBA to other businesses.

The SBA and Allied declined comment on the investigations. But Allied did disclose this: It has spent about $4 million this year and $36 million last year in legal and other fees dealing with these investigations.

Einhorn's allegations of pretexting are not the first that have emerged in this long-running feud.

Herb Greenberg, a senior columnist for MarketWatch.com, said that he, too, was a victim of pretexting. Greenberg wrote stories critical of Allied, including a piece that ran on Street.com in 2003 in which he questioned why Allied's BLX unit employed a convicted felon who had served time in prison in 1996 for securities fraud. Allied confirmed that the individual still works in its Richmond office helping borrowers through the lending process, but noted that the company received permission from the SBA to retain him as long as he didn't hold a position where he would be involved in the company's financial affairs.

After his 2003 story, Greenberg said that someone unknown to him opened an online telephone account using his name. "I felt violated," Greenberg said. "It felt like the house had been broken into." This happened long before pretexting emerged as a flashpoint at Hewlett-Packard Co. during revelations that the technology company had conducted a spy operation to ferret out media leaks.

In 2004, someone sought to examine the bank records of retired real estate developer James Brickman, another frequent critic of Allied. "Someone was asking about my deposit history," he said. Charles Gunther, a financial analyst who had written a negative report on Allied before retiring, was also a victim of pretexting but declined to comment.

Allied officials have denied any wrongdoing.

In Einhorn's case, the hedge fund manager first wrote to Allied's board in 2005 that someone pretending to be his wife opened an online account for his long-distance telephone service and "directed the phone company to send copies of our bills to an AOL account." He also accused Allied of inflating the value of its assets and violating other SBA rules.

Einhorn, 38, co-founded Greenlight Capital Inc. about five years after graduating from Cornell University, after being rejected from every PhD program in economics to which he applied. He started with $1 million, including contributions from his parents back home in Milwaukee. Ten years later, he oversees a hedge fund believed to possess more than $4 billion in assets.

A few years ago, Einhorn donated about a quarter-million dollars to a homeless charity as part of a winning auction bid to eat lunch with Warren Buffett. And earlier this year, Einhorn entered the World Series of Poker, winning more than $600,000 against, and then donating the proceeds to the Michael J. Fox Foundation.

His is mostly a private world. Hedge funds, a largely unregulated sector of finance, are commonly misunderstood but rapidly growing. They are private pools of capital, primarily from wealthy individuals and institutions, like endowments, that invest in various securities. Hedge funds often try to produce a profit regardless of market conditions, and they will frequently employ aggressive strategies, like short selling, that are only permitted on a limited basis to more regulated entities like mutual funds.

In its most recent letter to Einhorn on Sept. 29, Allied said it remains skeptical of his motives, given what it described as his "apparent financial motive to depress Allied's stock price." The company underscored that its investments have netted strong returns and its stock is hovering near its 52-week high of $32.26. "Allied Capital's performance over the past five years speaks for itself," said Walton, the company's chief. "Since the beginning of 2002, we have paid almost $11 per share in dividends and the stock has performed accordingly."

Einhorn remains skeptical as well. "We are short because there are problems here; we're not saying there are problems because we're short."

Litigation Nation (WSJ)

By Stephen C. Dillard

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

For the past three years our law firm has surveyed U.S. corporate law departments to better understand which kinds of disputes keep general counsels awake at night, and which ones are most likely to lead to all-out litigation. We also ask companies how many lawsuits they face and how much of their overall legal budgets they spend on disputes.

The latest Litigation Trends Survey makes it plain that litigation is now a major feature of the business landscape -- even we were surprised by the volume and scope of legal actions across all major industries and regardless of company size. Consider a few key findings based on reporting by 310 in-house counsel, more than half of whom work for public companies with revenues over $1 billion:

Some 89% of companies report being hit with at least one new lawsuit in the past year, compared with only two-thirds in the 2005 survey. Meanwhile, U.S. companies face an average of 305 lawsuits pending world-wide. For companies with sales of $1 billion or more, the average number of cases jumps to 556, with 50 fresh suits emerging each year for nearly half of these firms. While the majority of actions are in U.S. courts, a third of the respondents said that at least 20% of their litigation now originates in foreign venues.

Some industries are clearly tagged more than others, none more so than insurance, where participants reported a whopping average of more than 1,600 pending cases (although representing a small pool of the survey, insurers are frequently drawn into disputes with policyholders over claims that run from environmental clean-up and hurricane damage to directors and officers liability and more recently, losses due to terrorist acts). Energy companies averaged 364 cases, retail 333, financial services 300, manufacturers 206, and so on across 13 separate sectors. At the lower end, facing fewer than 25 cases per company, were education providers, nonprofits and trade associations -- but even the latter reported an average of four pending lawsuits.

Half of the in-house counsel reported that their companies also faced at least one new arbitration and one new regulatory proceeding in 2005-06. Biggest government instigators? The SEC and OSHA. But state attorneys general are also regular players, as are the FTC, EPA, the FDA and multiple other federal agencies with the power to subpoena. Pharmaceutical companies reported the highest incidence of regulatory scrutiny, followed by energy firms, insurers, retailers and manufacturers. A number of companies faced more than 50 regulatory proceedings.

One byproduct of America's litigation and enforcement culture is the internal investigation. Some 63% of the law departments surveyed said their companies had launched at least one internal probe requiring outside counsel in the past year alone -- more than a quarter of the billion-dollar companies undertook three or more investigations. And our survey was completed before the recent rash of investigations into stock options backdating.

Of course, every lawsuit has at least two sides and our survey reveals how active U.S. business is in playing offense: More than 70% of companies commenced at least one action as plaintiff in 2005-06, and nearly half filed up to five new cases. Manufacturers and retailers were the most frequent plaintiffs: 90% of the companies in both industries initiated at least one suit in the past year. Next in line were real estate and insurance firms. Even a full third of nonprofits filed at least one lawsuit, as did half of the companies with under $100 million in revenue.

Are these statistics a confirmation of America's vicious, tail-chasing lawsuit crisis? Or are they a vote of high confidence in the judicial system as a means of enforcing contracts, safeguarding intellectual property and brand assets, and stopping fraud? It's worth thinking about.

So what is tops on the corporate lawyer worry-list? Securities-related cases may grab the headlines, but more than half of the in-house counsel cited employment as their top litigation concern. The workplace has become a legal minefield over issues ranging from pay and promotion to harassment and discrimination, and claims of wrongful termination. Disgruntled workers are a fact of life, with aggrieved employees quicker to sue than almost any other group -- and disputes over wages and hours can be brought as class actions in many jurisdictions, creating more waves of litigation.

Contract disputes were the second most-cited litigation concern -- old-fashioned, not very sexy, but a time-honored source of business disagreements. From there followed the litany of modern litigation anxieties: IP/patent disputes; personal injury filings; regulatory actions; product liability; toxic torts; and securities and antitrust issues. Only a small percentage of counsel reported dwelling on bankruptcy, real estate or tax problems, although litigation on these issues could increase in the next economic cycle.

What about financial exposure? Many cases on company dockets are mere bagatelles, disputes valued in thousands of dollars. But nearly four in 10 of our respondents were hit with least one $20 million suit in the past year; and for billion-dollar firms, it was almost seven in 10. A number of companies admitted they were looking at least 50 new lawsuits involving at least $20 million, representing more than $1 billion in claims.

Meanwhile, companies report spending an average of $12 million on litigation annually, apart from any judgments or settlements. That compares with only $8 million a year ago, reflecting in part the growth of our sample but also, we think, bigger-stakes cases and better tracking of litigation costs. For some industries -- engineering and insurance -- spending on litigation exceeded $35 million. Especially striking was the portion of overall company legal budgets taken up by lawsuits -- an average of 71%.

Nevertheless, one of the more curious survey findings is that 94% of U.S. companies reporting said they had at least one legal action currently pending in an American court. To which we feel compelled to inquire, "Who are the other 6%?" Something to explore for next year.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Court To Probe 'Improper Communications' With Reporter (AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, Associated Press

AP, November 25, 2006

LOS ANGELES – A federal court plans to investigate whether government officials illegally supplied grand jury information in a U.S. military secrets case to a Washington Times reporter.

Court papers show the investigation seeks to uncover a possible source and content of "improper communications" with Times reporter William Gertz for a story he wrote in May.

The order, entered Wednesday by a federal judge in Orange County, comes at the request of a defense attorney for Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, one of five family members indicted in an alleged scheme to send sensitive information about Navy warships to China. The request was joined by the other defendants.

The defense argued Gertz received information about a then-pending grand jury indictment of Chiu and the others on additional charges in violation of grand jury secrecy rules. Some of the charges cited in Gertz's May 16 story are contained in an indictment returned last month.

The story was sourced to "senior Justice Department officials (who) have approved the new charges," court papers said.

U.S. District Judge Cormac Carney said in court papers the alleged violation "triggers the duty of the court to investigate further."

Carney ordered the government to submit a status report by early January on "the investigation it has undertaken to determine whether any government official had improper communications with Mr. Gertz," according to court papers.

The government was also told to report measures it's taking to prevent such communications with the public.

A Justice Department spokesman for the Central District of California did not immediately return a phone message left late Friday. A message left with a The Washington Times communications manager also was not immediately returned.

Chiu is married to Chi Mak, who allegedly took computer disks from an Anaheim defense contractor where he was lead engineer on a sensitive research project involving propulsion systems for Navy warships. Also charged in the case are Mak's brother, Tai Wang Mak, his wife, Fuk Heung Li, and their son, Yui "Billy" Mak.

A federal indictment alleges counts of conspiracy to export U.S. defense articles to China; possession of property in aid of a foreign government; making false statements to federal investigators; and acting as agents of a foreign government, namely China, without prior notification to the U.S. attorney general.

Not all five face the same charges. All have entered not-guilty pleas.

Chiu's attorney, Stanley Greenberg, said he was "pleased to see the court recognizes its duty to investigate." At the same time, he questioned the court's reliance on the government in the investigation.

"I don't think the government has the same motivation that the court should," he said.

The government claims that Chi Mak passed information about U.S. naval technology from his employer to his brother and that his nephew, Billy Mak, then helped encrypt the files onto a CD-ROM computer disk. That disk was found hidden the luggage of Tai Mak and his wife after they were arrested in October 2005 at Los Angeles International Airport as they prepared to travel to Hong Kong and Guangzhou, China, authorities said.

According to the FBI, Chi Mak told investigators his brother was giving the information to a researcher at a Chinese university center that conducts operations research for and receives funding from the People's Liberation Army.

Prosecutors have said previously that authorities recovered from the disk restricted documents on the DDX Destroyer, an advanced technology warship. They also allege that they found lists in Chinese asking Chi Mak to get documents about submarine torpedo technology, electromagnetic artillery systems, weapon standardization, early warning technology used to detect incoming missiles, and defenses used against nuclear attack.

Federal Law No Minor Concern (LVS)

Las Vegas Sun, November 25, 2006

Justice Department does public, Rep. Jon Porter no favors by turning away investigation

The Justice Department has declined to pursue an investigation into allegations that Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., made fundraising calls from his office, a serious charge.

All a Justice Department spokesman would say is that the FBI referred the investigation to the department and it was "declined."

Unfortunately, that doesn't give any indication as to whether there's any truth to the allegation. Former Republican National Committee general counsel Jan Witold Baran told reporter Tony Cook in Wednesday's Las Vegas Sun that the Justice Department "doesn't devote its limited resources to something that is relatively very minor and that is unlikely to occur again."

If those are the reasons for dropping the investigation, that's a shame. We don't consider violations of federal law "minor" - the law carries a penalty of up to three years in prison and a fine of $5,000 - and it shouldn't ever be an issue. Members of Congress know this law well. They are taught to leave federal buildings to make fundraising calls.

The FBI investigation still leaves questions. Jim Shepard, Porter's former scheduler who made the claims, said no one interviewed him about the allegations.

Shepherd says he has a sponsor to take the complaint to the bipartisan House Ethics Committee, which we believe should conduct a full and fair investigation into the matter and release its findings. If he has done nothing wrong, Porter should welcome such action that would clear his name, as the Justice Department probe did not.

Cartoonist Charged After Siege Ends Peacefully (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

MIAMI, Florida (AP) -- A cartoonist carrying a toy gun that looked real surrendered to police at The Miami Herald's building Friday, more than two hours after arriving and demanding to see an editor of the newspaper's Spanish-language sister paper, police said.

Jose Varela, 50, carried a knife and a black plastic toy gun that resembled a real semiautomatic weapon, police said. He was charged with three counts of aggravated assault with a firearm. He was being held on $22,500 bond, jail officials said.

Varela had problems with El Nuevo Herald, where he worked as a contractor, including its position on Cuban emigres, said Police Chief John Timoney.

He had routine access to the building, officials said.

A police negotiator talked Varela into surrendering peacefully about 2:45 p.m., Timoney said. No injuries were reported.

"Once he calmed down and he realized what he was doing was not appropriate, he decided we would work to bring him out," said police negotiator Serafin Ordonez, who spoke with Varela for 30 to 40 minutes in Spanish. "No one was in danger. He kept repeating that he didn't want to hurt nobody, that he's not a violent person, that he's not a criminal."

Varela told a reporter for The Miami Herald during the incident that he was "the new director of the newspaper."

"I'm here to unmask the true conflicts in the newspaper," Varela told The Miami Herald. "They laugh at exiles here. There are problems with payment."

Varela called attorney Joe Garcia a couple of times from inside the building, Garcia told The Associated Press. Garcia said Varela was concerned about a conflict of interest at El Nuevo Herald.

"All that he wants people to know is that he wants the truth to come out," Garcia said. "I think he needs some time to work some things out."

Varela isolated himself in an editor's office on the sixth floor of the downtown Miami building that houses The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald, police said.

Dressed all in black with the letters "FBI" across the back of his polo shirt, he pointed the plastic gun at three El Nuevo Herald employees and demanded to see the newspaper's executive editor, Humberto Castello, police said.

The floor was evacuated, and officers carrying weapons and wearing protective gear set up a perimeter around the building, where evacuees gathered.

News staff remained on the fifth floor to cover the story.

Varela landed on Key West during the Mariel boatlift, in which more than 125,000 Cubans fled the island in 1980. In a December 2004 El Nuevo Herald article, he recalled how drawing got him into trouble as a child.

"I remember that I was always a bad student in school because I would draw cartoons of the teacher. For that, they would remove me from class," he told the newspaper.

It was the second situation involving a gun at the newspaper in the past year and a half. In July 2005, former City Commissioner Arthur E. Teele Jr. fatally shot himself in the Herald lobby after asking to speak with columnist Jim DeFede. Teele had been under investigation for corruption and had just been indicted by a federal grand jury on fraud charges.

DeFede was fired for recording his telephone conversations with Teele just before the incident without the politician's permission.

News broke in September that eight of El Nuevo Herald's reporters and 29 of its freelancers were paid to work for the U.S. government's Radio and TV Marti networks. The government beams programming into Cuba aimed at undermining the communist government of Fidel Castro.

The Miami Herald and El Nuevo Herald are separate newspapers, but they share an office and are both published by The Miami Herald Media Co. El Nuevo Herald is one of the nation's largest Spanish-language newspapers.

Police Negotiator Helps End Standoff After 31/2 Hours; Gun Turns Out to Be Toy

MIAMI, Nov. 24 -- Dressed in camouflage and brandishing what looked like a submachine gun, the cartoonist for this city's leading Spanish-language newspaper strode into the office of the top editor Friday morning and told startled staff, "I am the new executive editor, and that is my new office."

It was not a joke.

The demands of El Nuevo Herald cartoonist JosÃ© Varela to see the editor, with whom he had unspecified grievances over ethics and what he told police were censorship issues, set off a tense 3 1/2 -hour standoff at the offices of the Spanish newspaper and the Miami Herald, which share a six-story building on the northern outskirts of downtown. Executive Editor Humberto CastellÃ³ was not in.

"He said, 'Just bring me the editor,' " said Gus Perez, director of operations for the newspapers, who confronted Varela on the sixth floor. "He said, 'I have 30 rounds.' I said, 'I'm really asking you to point that at the floor,' and he did."

Perez said he had been told that Varela was carrying a "toy gun," and police corroborated that later, saying it resembled a MAC-11. Authorities added that Varela was also carrying a knife.

As Perez spoke to Varela, about a dozen Nuevo Herald staffers were directed to leave the building, Perez said. Scores of other employees had already made it outside.

"When I came back to my office from the cafeteria, I just saw a crowd of people coming toward me saying, 'Get out, get out,' " said Tanya Byng, 43, an accounts manager.

As helicopters hovered, knots of spectators and evacuated employees formed outside the building, though there was some fear that anyone in the vicinity could have become a target.

"If he turns into a sniper suddenly, then we've got a problem," said Detective Delrish Moss, a police spokesman.

Eventually, a police negotiator reached Varela by phone and coaxed him into giving up. No one was injured.

"I just calmed him to the point to where he realized this was inappropriate behavior," said police negotiator Serafin Ordonez.

Varela, 50, was charged with three counts of aggravated assault with a firearm and was being held on $22,500 bond, jail officials told the Associated Press.

He apparently was disgruntled by some ethics issues and the "way the newspaper was being run," Ordonez said. "He's an intelligent man, and he realized this was not appropriate behavior."

According to the Miami Herald, Varela spoke disjointedly. "You are speaking with the new director of the newspaper, and I'm here to unmask the true conflicts in the newspaper," the newspaper quoted Varela as saying. "They laugh at exiles here. There are problems with payment."

The exact nature of his complaints could not be immediately determined.

El Nuevo Herald has undergone repeated upheavals in recent months, most of them involving Cuban American politics and the relationship between El Nuevo Herald and the Miami Herald.

Earlier this fall, El Nuevo Herald fired two writers and a freelancer amid a controversy over reporters working for Radio Marti and TV Marti, which are run by the U.S. government. But then the publisher of the two newspapers resigned, and the three were hired back.

During the standoff, Varela demanded the resignations of CastellÃ³ and Miami Herald Executive Editor Tom Fiedler, according to the Miami Herald.

The Miami Herald building was the scene of gunfire last year, when, in July, former city commissioner Arthur E. Teele Jr. fatally shot himself in the lobby after asking to speak with a Herald columnist. Teele had been under investigation, suspected of corruption and fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0098568

Varela, who was born in Cuba, has been the newspaper's cartoonist for several years. His most recent work appeared Friday. Titled, in Spanish, "The Biggest Sale of the Year," it showed shoe prints going in, presumably to a store, and prints of bare feet coming out.

Standoff At Miami Papers Ends In Cartoonist's Arrest (NYT)

By Andy Newman

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 24 — A political cartoonist for the Spanish-language counterpart of The Miami Herald stormed the newspaper building on Friday morning dressed in an F.B.I. shirt and armed with a fake semiautomatic weapon, issued threats against the paper's editor and others and held officers at bay for three hours before surrendering, the police said.

The cartoonist, José Varela, 50, was charged with three counts of aggravated assault, the police said. No one was hurt.

Mr. Varela, a Cuban-born freelancer who until February had worked as a staff cartoonist at the paper, El Nuevo Herald, claimed to be upset about biased coverage of Cuban-Americans in both El Nuevo Herald and its sister paper, The Miami Herald, said the Miami police chief, John F. Timoney.

"One of his demands was he wanted that the truth be told," he said.

The newspapers, which are owned by the McClatchy Company and published in the same building, have been engulfed in Cuban-American politics and intrigue of late.

Last month, The Miami Herald broke the story that some reporters for El Nuevo Herald were also working for and being paid by Radio and TV Martí, the Bush administration's anti-Castro propaganda radio station broadcast to Cuba. Relations between the two papers, often tense, became outright hostile, and the publisher of both papers resigned.

According to The Herald's Web site, Mr. Varela, a Cuban immigrant, demanded the resignations of its executive editor, Tom Fiedler, and El Nuevo Herald's executive editor, Humberto Castelló, accusing him of backing Mr. Fiedler.

This week, Mr. Fiedler accused an op-ed contributor for El Nuevo Herald of "blood libel" for suggesting that a Herald reporter who broke the Martí story had ties to Cuba's spy agency. In an editor's note, Mr. Castelló called the spy claim unfounded.

Mr. Varela was also apparently having personal problems. El Nuevo Herald's Web site said he had recently divorced and told colleagues last week that he had gotten a submachine gun and a sawed-off shotgun because he felt unsafe in his new home in Jupiter, a wealthy town near West Palm Beach.

It was not the first time that a gunman caused havoc at The Herald's boxy tan headquarters on Biscayne Bay. Last year, a former city commissioner facing corruption charges killed himself in the building's lobby after an anguished phone call to a Herald columnist. The columnist was later fired after it was revealed he had taped the conversation.

Around 11 a.m. Friday, the police said, Mr. Varela came to the building, was allowed in by the security desk since he was a frequent visitor, and, once at El Nuevo Herald's offices on the sixth floor, demanded to speak to Mr. Castelló.

"He threw a bunch of papers in the air," said Alejandra Chaparro, a reporter for El Nuevo Herald. "He was demanding that the editor has to take responsibility."

Told that Mr. Castelló was not in the building, Mr. Varela declared, "I am the publisher until Humberto Castelló gets here," The Herald reported on its Web site.

A building security manager, Arturo Le Fleur, told The Herald that Mr. Varela had pointed the gun at him.

Police officers quickly evacuated the building and isolated Mr. Varela on the sixth floor. Two hours of negotiations ensued. Detective Serafin Ordoñez, a police negotiator, said he talked with Mr. Varela about his art, his family and a shoulder injury to try to calm him down.

Mr. Varela also gave a rambling interview to a Nuevo Herald reporter during the standoff. "Somebody has to pay," he said. "Somebody has to do it because this is going be like cleaning excrement. Enough time has passed now that they are mocking the people. So somebody has to pay, and that will be Castelló."

He continued, "How long will I put up with this nonsense of drawing cartoons on Bush and a Fidel Castro dum-dum? The newspaper is much more than that."

Ivette Diaz, a spokeswoman for the paper, declined to say what had precipitated Mr. Varela's change in employment status from staff cartoonist to freelancer in February. She described him as "a jokester."

In a profile on El Nuevo Herald's Web site, Mr. Varela wrote: "I'm a happy man. In spite of that, I cry when I see a movie like the Titanic. Because I don't like sinkings."

Search Underway For Two Boys From Minnesota Reservation (WP/AP)

Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0098569

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

RED LAKE, Minn., Nov. 24 -- Dozens of trained searchers took to the woods, lakes and air Friday to continue searching for two preschool-age brothers, missing for two days in the remote Red Lake Indian Reservation in northern Minnesota.

Tristan Anthony White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, disappeared Wednesday from a yard in a heavily wooded area in the town of Red Lake.

"They were just playing outside the last time I seen them, just playing outside," Alicia White, the boys' mother, told reporters.

She appealed for anyone who knows or has seen anything to come forward.

FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said authorities are trying to determine whether the boys wandered off or whether foul play was involved.

"We don't have any information that would lead us either way," he said.

Family members said they were preparing for the worst because it has been cold and searchers have found nothing since the boys disappeared. Temperatures were expected to drop below freezing overnight, weather forecasters said.

Hundreds of volunteers on foot, on horseback and in four-wheel-drive vehicles have joined in the search.

In March 2005, the Red Lake reservation was in the news when Jeff Weise, 16, shot and killed nine people before killing himself.

Friday: FBI Offers $20,000 Reward (MINNST)

By Chuck Haga, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 25, 2006

As a third day of intensive searching yields no sign of two missing boys on the Red Lake Reservation, their mother pleads for help and the FBI offers a $20,000 reward.

RED LAKE, MINN. -- As the third day of intensive but so-far fruitless searching for her young sons wore on Friday, Alicia White said that she is "prepared for the worst" but still hopeful that Tristan A. White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, will be found alive and unharmed.

"I'm trying not to think the worst, but it's been so cold out there and people have been searching all over and can't find them," she said.

Flanked by other family members, White pleaded for help from anyone who "knows anything or has seen anything about the whereabouts of my babies," who have been missing since Wednesday morning.

"They were just playing outside," she said. "That's the last I saw them."

The FBI announced a $20,000 reward Friday for information that might help them determine what happened to the boys, last seen about 9:30 a.m. as they played outside their home in the remote, wooded Walking Shield area of Red Lake.

The FBI also brought in more high-tech equipment, including unmanned aerial vehicles that flew over the search area with video cameras rolling to supplement ground searchers, dog teams and members of the Marshall County Mounted Posse.

Also, an airplane with specialized heat-sensing equipment was to do flyovers Friday night, and divers from St. Louis County used radar and underwater cameras to examine a series of small lakes and ponds in the search area.

Despite all those efforts, "As of now, I have no reports of finding anything," FBI special agent Paul McCabe said late Friday.

He said investigators continued to press a two-pronged investigation, trying to determine whether the boys wandered off or whether foul play was involved.

"We don't have any information that would lead us either way," he said. Nobody has reported seeing anything unusual, and searchers have found no clothing, no breaks in pond ice or other signs of what might have happened to the two youngsters.

'Sweetest little boy'

In her first public comments on the disappearance of her boys, Alicia White said that Tristan "loves water, and Avery, he just follows his brother." Smiling, she described Avery as "the sweetest little boy, just lovey-dovey."

She said that Tristan is adventurous and sometimes wandered off when the family lived in Redby, another town on the Red Lake Reservation.

"But we always found him," she said. "This is the first time we didn't find him."

She feels "lost," she said. "My babies are gone out there in the cold by themselves."

Tristan has a medical condition, she said, and he did not take his prescribed medication the morning he disappeared.

The boys' grandfather, Myron Jones, thanked volunteers, law enforcement officers and others who have been searching for the boys.

"I'm praying for the best," he said. "Hopefully, they're safe and will show up."

But he acknowledged a growing fear that the boys were taken.

DOJ_NMG_0098570

"We probably would have found them by now" if they were still in the area, he said.

Lamont White, 8, the boys' older brother, stood with his mother. The boys also have twin 1-year-old sisters. Jeff Stately, Avery's father, and Lisa White, the boys' grandmother, also attended the late afternoon news conference.

"We're holding it together for each other," Alicia White said.

She also thanked the volunteers and other searchers. "It tells us we're not in this by ourselves," she said.

Time a concern

McCabe said that dog teams worked the woods surrounding the boys' neighborhood from 9 p.m. Thursday until about 2:30 a.m. Friday and likely would return to the woods late Friday night.

Temperatures were expected to fall into the upper teens Friday night.

"Time is always a concern whenever you have missing children," McCabe said, especially under such conditions. But searchers' focus continues to be "that the children are alive," he said.

Red Lake police and other officials continued to maintain a roadblock on Walking Shield Road where it joins Hwy. 89 near the main entrance to the reservation. Authorities allowed only registered searchers and neighborhood residents through, and were checking car interiors and trunks. A Red Lake ambulance stood by throughout the day.

The searching Friday was done primarily by professionals, including five dog teams from the Minnesota Search Dog Network and several members of Team Adam, part of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

"They are retired law enforcement professionals, and many are search experts," McCabe said. "One flew in from Alaska. He is the former head of the Alaska state police search team. They also have access to databases."

Also on the scene were 30 members of the Civil Air Patrol, who joined in the ground search. Civilian volunteers included about 45 members of the missing boys' extended family.

"The response of volunteers and the Red Lake Nation as a whole has been overwhelming," McCabe said.

Crying for the babies

The continuing uncertainty over what happened to the boys gnaws at the people of Red Lake.

"People are crying," said Judy Roy, a former tribal secretary. "They're reporting they can't sleep, thinking about those babies.

"As a grandmother myself, I'm crying. Everyone feels like it's their children or grandchildren, and it goes right to the heart."

Temps Cool As Searchers Look For Missing Boys (MINNST)

By Terry Collins And Chuck Haga, Star Tribune Staff Writers

Minneapolis Star Tribune, November 25, 2006

About 100 trained searchers and law enforcement officers continued to look for the two brothers missing from the Red Lake Indian Reservation, but authorities grew more concerned after temperatures dipped below freezing.

RED LAKE, MINN. -- The search expanded today for two young brothers who went missing Wednesday on the Red Lake Indian Reservation in northern Minnesota.

Additional ground crews and dog teams have joined the effort, which has included personnel from Beltrami, Cass, Itasca, Marshall and St. Louis counties, along with federal and tribal authorities. Searching has done on the ground, by divers and from the air.

More than 100 searchers, a combination of professionals and volunteers, continued to scour the remote Walking Shield area of the reservation, where Tristan A. White, 4, and Avery Lee Stately, 2, were last seen about 9:30 a.m. Wednesday as they played outside their home.

A procession of vehicles went into and out of the search area.

Searchers were dealing with cooler conditions, as temperatures dropped into the 20s, compared with the 40s the day before.

"The weather had been mild, but last night with those kinds of temps that does concern us, if there were children in the woods going into a third night," FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said.

On Friday, the FBI announced a $20,000 reward for information that might help them determine what happened to the boys.

The agency also brought in more high-tech equipment, including unmanned aerial vehicles with video cameras and an airplane with specialized heat-sensing equipment.

Authorities are taking a two-pronged approach to the investigation, trying to determine whether the boys wandered off or whether foul play was involved.

FBI special agent Paul McCabe said dozens of tips have come into a hotline set up by the FBI on Friday.

FBI Sifts Claims For Phillips Reward (BUFFNEWS)

By T.J. PIGNATARO, News Staff Reporter
Buffalo News, November 25, 2006
One couple has also sued State Police union to collect $225,000 for capture of fugitive

FBI officials in Washington are reviewing "several claims" made by individuals who say their help led to Ralph "Bucky" Phillips' capture Sept. 8 in Akeley, Pa.

Determining the merit of claims for the FBI's portion of the Phillips' reward - $100,000 - is a "multitiered, multifaceted process," said local FBI spokesman Paul Moskal.

"This is the public's money, so the FBI wants to make sure . . . these claims are meritorious and not frivolous," Moskal said. "Several people have come forward to make claims for the reward money. They all have different roles, some seem to be more meritorious than others."

Those claimants include Jack and Gloria Young of Warren, Pa., who filed a federal lawsuit against the New York State Police Benevolent Association seeking its $225,000 reward, Moskal confirmed. He did not elaborate on the merits of the Youngs' claim.

Moskal did say, however, that there doesn't appear to be any one claim that directly led to Phillips' capture.

"We haven't encountered a single piece from a single source we'd deem as critical to his apprehension," he said.

Phillips - wanted in connection with the shootings of three state troopers, including one who died - was added to the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted List" Sept. 7. He was captured the next day. His addition to the list made those providing law enforcement with useful information leading to his arrest eligible for a $100,000 reward from the FBI.

Attorneys for the Youngs suggested late last week that they may also pursue action against the FBI, although the federal agency was not named in the lawsuit against the State Police PBA.

The Youngs' lawyers say if not for a phone call placed by their clients reporting a suspicious person on their property late Sept. 7, Phillips would not have been captured the next day.

Troopers PBA President Daniel M. De Federicis said last week that State Police are investigating a few claims for their reward money - including from the Youngs. He suggested the PBA would be looking to the FBI for guidance on its reward disbursements.

Moskal said that FBI officials will share their findings with the PBA to ensure that information received by each agency is consistent.

FBI Unveils Corruption Tip Line (DESERET)

Deseret Morning News, November 23, 2006

On the day that the indictments of three Davis County School District employees were announced, federal agents also unveiled a special toll-free tip line where the public can report suspected corruption by public officials.

"Currently, there are more than 2,000 public corruption investigations pending" nationwide, FBI Special Agent in Charge Tim Fuhrman said.

The FBI's Public Corruption Tip Line, 1-866-50-BRIBE (2-7423), will be made available for residents in Utah, Idaho and Montana who believe public employees or public officials may be involved in corruption. Tips can also be reported via the FBI Salt Lake City Field Office Web site (go to www.fbi.gov and click on the link to the Salt Lake City Field Office).

Davis Parents, Administrators, Seek More Info On Theft Allegations (SLT)

By Nicole Stricker And Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune
Salt Lake Tribune, November 25, 2006

Why did it take so long to detect a problem, and what needs to happen to prevent such infractions in the future? Davis County parents and administrators face numerous unanswered questions about Wednesday's allegations that a Layton couple stole $4.3 million over five years from Davis County schools that receive federal funding for disadvantaged students - and possibly much more.

"If the allegations are true, it is just sad to me," said Cheryl Werven, a Davis School Board member from Clearfield who represents some of the affected schools. "So much of it was on the front page [Thursday] and I just thought 'Happy Thanksgiving.' " Because the board learned Wednesday of the indictment charging Susan G. Ross, 62, and her husband John

Ross, 64, with 47 counts of theft, fraud, copyright infringement and other crimes, members haven't yet met to evaluate what they might be able to do to provide more safeguards against fraud. Those discussions, however, are "absolutely" forthcoming, board member William P. Moore of Bountiful said.

Parents seek assurances that the district will act swiftly.

"Holy cow, that's a lot of money. I'm just floored," said Vonnie Dayton, president-elect of PTA South Clearfield Elementary, a school that receives Title 1 funds for schools that serve disadvantaged students. "How could they do that, especially to schools and our children?" The Davis district first detected something was amiss with its Title 1 programs in spring 2005 after implementing a new review system. Authorities were contacted immediately, said Timothy Fuhrman, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office, which investigated the matter along with the U.S. Attorney's Office, the U.S. Department of Education Office of Inspector General, the IRS and the Farmington Police Department.

The delay in recognizing a problem may be a result of misplaced trust in employees who came up with explanations for discrepancies, Fuhrman said.

U.S. Attorney for Utah Brett Tolman said that trust and a sophisticated scheme helped the defendants cover their tracks over the years. "With that combination, you have the ability to hide" what you're doing, he said.

Susan Ross, who was employed by the district beginning in the 1970s, was director of federal programs before she retired in spring 2005. John Ross is the former Title I specialist for the Utah State Office of Education and worked as a grant specialist for the Davis district from March 2000 to February 2005.

The indictment accuses the pair of selling photocopies of books to schools that receive federal Title 1 funding at vastly inflated prices through an intermediary company, which kept a small percentage of the profit and paid the rest to a company allegedly owned by Susan and John Ross. The $4.3 million represents money allegedly taken from 2000 to 2005, but authorities allege the scam may have begun as early as 1985.

"I feel bad this situation has gone on for so long and just been awful," said Davis School Board Vice President Tamara Lowe of West Point. "It's just a sad, sad situation where money should have been going to student materials and activities rather than someone's pockets." A representative of the largest union representing Davis teachers declined to comment on Friday.

"I didn't know anything about it. I really don't have anything to say," said Susan Firmage, Davis Education Association president. "I don't have any reaction to it at all." nstricker@sltrib.com pmanson@sltrib.com

Sensing You're Too Drunk To Drive (NYT)

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

There aren't many social problems that can be solved with a "technical fix," but drunken driving may be one of the most amenable. Technologies that are already in limited use can lock the ignitions of cars whose drivers have high alcohol levels in their breath, thus preventing them from turning their vehicles into lethal unguided weapons.

These existing technologies and more futuristic devices still under development are the cornerstones of a new phase in the campaign that was announced this week by Mothers Against Drunk Driving. The initial goal, which is backed by associations of state highway officials and car manufacturers, is to have all states do what New Mexico has already done: require that all convicted drunken drivers, even first-time offenders, have devices installed in their cars that measure alcohol in the breath and immobilize the car if levels exceed set limits.

Currently, 45 states, the District of Columbia and most Canadian provinces have laws that require or allow some offenders — mostly those convicted more than once — to install alcohol interlocks on their cars if they wish to drive. Some 100,000 interlocks are in service in the United States.

Restaurant groups are complaining that wider use of the devices would eliminate wine at dinner, beer at ballgames, and other forms of "responsible drinking." But it is hardly responsible for a driver to drink so heavily that the interlock kicks in. Driving is a privilege, not a right. If those convicted of drunken driving want the privilege, they ought to take extra steps to protect the rest of us.

For the future, safety advocates hope to develop passive devices that unobtrusively test all drivers for alcohol, without requiring every soccer mom to blow into a tube every time she gets into a car. Even better would be devices that flash warnings and slow cars at any sign of erratic driving, whether the cause be drink, distraction, fatigue, recklessness or sheer incompetence.

CIVIL LAW:

Case Tests Federal Supremacy Over Banks (WP)

By Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

The federal government and the banking industry will square off next week in the Supreme Court against all 50 states and the District of Columbia in a mortgage-lending case that could have broad implications for business regulation.

The case, Watters v. Wachovia Bank, focuses on the lending industry. But the broader question it addresses is whether federal regulators can essentially tell state regulators to go away. It's a debate over what is called "preemption." How the court resolves the dispute could affect many other industries.

For more than two decades, states have regulated the mortgage-lending practices of state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks. The parent national banks are regulated by a federal agency, the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. In 2001, the OCC ruled that state regulation was improper, saying that under federal law those lenders should be overseen by the federal government.

Some states regulate lending matters not covered by OCC rules. For example, Maryland is among the states that set limits on mortgage prepayment penalties.

In 2003, Charlotte-based Wachovia Bank decided that it wanted to be regulated solely by the OCC. It told the states where it runs mortgage lending companies that those firms would no longer register with state officials or abide by local rules.

Many national banks have criticized the patchwork of local regulation intended to stop predatory lending. Other banks have also announced their intention to seek regulation by the OCC alone. They say the proliferation of state and local regulations makes it almost impossible to standardize business practices to maximize efficiency, driving up the cost of mortgage loans and making the banks wary of entering communities with strict lending rules.

Linda A. Watters, Michigan's insurance and financial services commissioner, protested Wachovia's decision. Michigan and the other states say they provide consumers with better protection against predatory home mortgage practices than does the OCC. They say the banks prefer OCC regulation because it is friendlier to them and because the federal agency focuses on whether the banks are protecting investors and depositors instead of borrowers.

Wachovia sued Michigan, asserting that the National Banking Act of 1864 gives federal regulators supremacy over state laws. Wachovia won on the District and Circuit Court levels. Other banks similarly prevailed against state regulators in lower and appellate courts. Michigan appealed.

The Supreme Court took the unusual step of agreeing to hear the case, although the lower courts had agreed to grant control to the OCC. The high court seldom hears cases in which lower-court judges have been unanimous in their rulings. Now both sides wonder what the justices' decision to take the case may mean: Will they approve the preemption practice or overturn it?

The first clues are likely to emerge Wednesday, when oral arguments in the case are scheduled. Both sides have mustered support for their viewpoints.

The brief on behalf of all the major banking trade groups, including the American Bankers Association and the Mortgage Bankers Association, was co-written by John D. Hawke Jr., who was comptroller of the currency when the 2001 rules were drafted, and Theodore B. Olson, U.S. solicitor general from 2001 to 2004.

"We hope it's a signal to the court that the banking industry is unified in where we think this case should come out," said Gregory F. Taylor, associate general counsel for the American Bankers Association.

Other businesses say the issue affects them, too. "The power of Congress (either directly or through administrative agencies) to preempt state and local law is vitally important to business and to the national economy," the U.S. Chamber of Commerce wrote in its brief. "Accordingly, the Chamber and its members have a substantial interest in ensuring that this Court properly resolves the issues raised in this case."

Another brief in Wachovia's support, co-written by libertarian law professor Richard A. Epstein, asserts that tighter rules on mortgage lending can make loans more expensive and less available, as lenders leave markets or adjust rates to reflect higher costs.

The preemption issue has attracted the attention of many prominent jurists and legal scholars. At an American Enterprise Institute conference in April attended by former special prosecutor Kenneth W. Starr and appellate court judges Douglas H. Ginsburg and Stephen F. Williams, Epstein and other scholars proposed that other industries could also eek federal preemption from state and local laws.

Many states set their own rules on such issues as auto emissions and safety, workplace standards and product safety.

Michigan's side also has many supporters. Michelle Aronowitz, deputy solicitor general in the office of New York State Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer, wrote the brief that was co-sponsored by the 49 other states, the District and Puerto Rico. It is rare for so many states to support a particular legal position, but they were eager to do so, said Dan Schweitzer, Supreme Court counsel of the National Association of Attorneys General.

"One of the roles of state AGs is protecting their consumers, and what the OCC has been trying to do is prevent state AGs from doing that with respect to a very important [group] -- state-chartered mortgage lenders that happen to be owned by banks," Schweitzer said.

The OCC "has a long history of siding with the industry," said John Ryan, executive vice president of the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, which supports Michigan. Sharing that view are a dozen consumer advocacy groups, which wrote in their brief that the banks are seeking to shelter themselves under the OCC, which they say "has shown little interest in ensuring fairness to consumers." Lenders say the OCC handles consumer complaints quietly, without prosecution, often solving the problems more quickly.

The case comes to a head in a changed political landscape. Last year, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit ruled in Wachovia's favor. Judge Boyce F. Martin Jr. wrote for the unanimous panel that federal law gave the OCC power to regulate banks, but he noted that "Congress has not spoken precisely to the issue."

The Democratic victories in the midterm elections, however, may bring the issue to the fore in Congress. Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who is expected to become chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, which oversees banks, has sponsored legislation that would limit the OCC's reach over state consumer protections.

FBI Will Investigate Polk County Shooting (CFNEWS13)

Central Florida News 13, November 25, 2006

The FBI will investigate whether authorities used excessive force when they shot a fugitive 68 times after he fatally shot a Polk County sheriff's deputy.The Justice Department made the request to the FBI on Friday, after the Florida Civil Rights Association filed a complaint alleging authorities showed disregard for human life when they shot Angilo Freeland after an all-night manhunt. A total of more than 100 shots were fired at Freeland, with 68 finding their target.

David Allred, deputy chief of the Justice Department's criminal section, said in a letter to the civil rights group that action will be taken if events occurred that violated federal law.

The FBI would be the sixth agency to investigate the shooting.

Police say Angilo Freeland shot and killed Deputy Vernon Matthew Williams, a 39-year-old father of three, and his K-9 partner, Diogi, during a routine traffic stop in September. He also shot Deputy Doug Speirs in the leg and tried to shoot two other officers.

FBI To Investigate Manhunt Shooting (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

ORLANDO -- The FBI will investigate whether authorities used excessive force when they shot a fugitive 68 times after he fatally shot a Polk County sheriff's deputy, a spokesman for the bureau said.

The Justice Department made the request to the FBI after the Florida Civil Rights Association filed a complaint alleging authorities showed disregard for human life when they shot Angilo Freeland after an all-night manhunt.

“In cases where the DOJ refers a case to the FBI, we will conduct the appropriate investigation,” FBI spokesman Richard Kolko wrote in an e-mail. “The results will then be provided back to DOJ for their review and further action if warranted.”

A spokeswoman in the FBI’s Tampa office, which would handle the investigation, did not immediately return a phone call for comment Friday.

David Allred, deputy chief of the Justice Department’s criminal section, said in a letter to the civil rights group that action will be taken if events occurred that violated federal law.

Allred said the letter was a standard response to civil-rights complaints.

“We are determined to see an objective review of this matter,” J. Willie David III, president of the civil-rights group, said. “Shooting anyone 110 times is more than a little extreme. We live in America, and that kind of atrocity cannot be condoned here.” cm-bd

The FBI would be the sixth agency to investigate the shooting, which is already being reviewed by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the Polk State Attorney's Office.

Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said Thursday he was "completely comfortable" with the scrutiny.

"Freeland had every opportunity to turn himself in and would have been taken into custody without a single bullet fired, even after he ambushed my deputy . . . He's the one who chose to end that situation, not us," Judd said.

Police say Freeland shot and killed Deputy Vernon Matthew Williams, a 39-year-old father of three, and his K-9 partner, Diogi, during a routine traffic stop Sept. 28. He also

Justice Dept. Probes Shooting Of Suspected Cop Killer (WESH)

WESH-TV, NBC 2, Orlando, FL, November 25, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. -- The U.S. Department of Justice is investigating the shooting death of a man accused of killing a local deputy.

Polk County Deputy Matt Williams was shot to death on Sept. 28, and officers from around Central Florida spent 22 hours looking for his killer, causing schools and neighborhoods to be locked down.

When officers found the suspected shooter hiding in the woods the next morning, he was hit with nearly 70 bullets, WESH 2 News reported.

The sheriff said they stopped shooting when they ran out of bullets.

The Justice Department will investigate whether the Polk County Sheriff's Office SWAT team used excessive force when it fired 110 rounds at Angilo Freeland, hitting him 68 times.

The probe comes at the request of the Orlando-based Florida Civil Rights Association.

"There could have been a possibility that this person could have surrendered without any unnecessary force," said the group's president J. Willie David.

After the shooting, Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said the force was necessary to make sure the suspected drug dealer accused of shooting and killing Williams and his police dog Diogi wouldn't harm anyone else.

"We weren't going to take any chance," Judd said.

They said Freeland was armed with Williams' gun when they found him hiding in the woods.

"Ladies and gentlemen, God will be the judge and the jury this time," Judd said.

After the shooting, Freeland's mother also called for an investigation.

"All we want is for all the questions surrounding why this happened to be answered," Joyce Freeland said.

The FCRA said it in no way condones the killing of the deputy, but the organization wants the FBI to determine whether the SWAT team's use of force was possibly criminal overkill.

"Out of the 10 SWAT team members out there, only nine fired. We got one here that made a decision not to fire. One of the things hopefully the Justice Department and FBI can get that answered (is) why he didn't fire," David said.

A Justice Department spokesman said if a violation of criminal civil rights statutes occurred, appropriate action will be taken.

A spokeswoman for the sheriff's office said they've done their own investigation and turned it over to the state attorney's office. She said they have no comment about the pending federal probe.

Feds Want FBI To Study Shooting By Polk Deputies (ORS)

By Rebecca Mahoney, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, November 25, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice is asking federal investigators to determine whether Polk County deputy sheriffs violated Angilo Freeland's civil rights when they shot him 68 times after Freeland gunned down a deputy and wounded another.

The request came in response to a complaint filed by the Florida Civil Rights Association, an Orlando-based organization that alleges the deputies used excessive force and showed disregard for human life when they fired 110 rounds at Freeland during a Lakeland-area standoff in September.

In a letter sent to J. Willie David III, president of the civil-rights group, the Justice Department agreed to forward the case to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and pledged a thorough review of the incident.

"You can be assured that if the evidence indicates a prosecutable violation of federal criminal rights statutes occurred, appropriate action will be taken," wrote David Allred, deputy chief of the Justice Department's criminal section.

It is not clear whether the FBI has the authority to decline to investigate. Reached at his Maryland home Thursday afternoon, Allred could not immediately recall the Freeland case and said the letter was part of the Justice Department's standard response to civil-rights complaints.

"I probably write 20 of those letters a day," he said.

The FBI would be the sixth agency to investigate the shooting. Among others, the case also is being reviewed by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and the State Attorney's Office in Polk, standard procedure in police-involved shootings in Polk County.

But the possibility that the nation's highest law-enforcement agency may get involved didn't faze Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd, who said Thursday that he was "completely comfortable" with the scrutiny and that his deputies had nothing to apologize for.

"Freeland had every opportunity to turn himself in and would have been taken into custody without a single bullet fired, even after he ambushed my deputy. . . . He's the one who chose to end that situation, not us," Judd said. "There are those that want to be critical, but they weren't there that morning. They weren't facing the armed killer that my deputies faced that day."

Police say Freeland shot and killed Deputy Vernon Matthew Williams, a 39-year-old father of three, and his K-9 partner, Diogi, during a routine traffic stop Sept. 28. He also shot Deputy Doug Speirs in the leg and tried to shoot two Lakeland police officers, Judd said.

Freeland was shot and killed 22 hours later during a massive manhunt after he waved a gun and refused to surrender to nine SWAT team members.

David, who tipped off the media to the development Thursday, called the Justice Department's request a "victory for transparency."

"We are determined to see an objective review of this matter," David said. "Shooting anyone 110 times is more than a little extreme. We live in America, and that kind of atrocity cannot be condoned here."

But Judd criticized David for releasing the document on Thanksgiving, saying it was a slap in the face to the families of the slain and wounded deputies.

"On a day when my Deputy Williams should be celebrating Thanksgiving with his family, they send letters out like this," he said. "It's a real low blow."

Probe Sought In Police Shooting Of Woman (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 25, 2006

An Atlanta civil rights activist is calling for a federal investigation into the fatal shooting by Atlanta police of a 92-year-old woman during a drug raid at the woman's home.

Police contend they wanted to search Kathryn Johnston's house because an undercover drug purchase had been made there earlier on Tuesday, the day of the shooting. Johnston wounded three officers, emptying a six-shot revolver before being shot to death, police said.

The Rev. Markell Hutchins, the civil rights activist, said he will deliver a letter to the Justice Department on Monday urging the agency to investigate "what we believe are at worst, gross violations of this woman's life, and at best, poor judgment on the part of the police officers."

Hutchins said he talked Friday morning with police Chief Richard Pennington, who was out of town when the shootout occurred.

"His officers should have known at a minimum who was living in that residence before they went in there with guns blazing," Markell said.

Johnston was a frail woman who lived behind burglar bars at a home owned by her niece.

Police contend they obtained a no-knock search warrant for the Neal Street house after buying drugs Tuesday afternoon from a man inside the home.

The no-knock warrant is frequently used in suspected drug cases because police believe their surprise entry into a home prevents drug dealers from flushing or destroying the evidence. In this case, the warrant did not name a person, referring only to a "John Doe, aka Sam," the standard reference when a person's name is not known, police said.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution has been unable to independently confirm the police account about the need for the no-knock warrant because it has not been able to view the sworn statement that police provided to a judge to obtain the warrant.

State Court Administrator Stefani Searcy refused again Friday to release the documents, even though they are public records subject to immediate disclosure under Georgia law. Searcy has cited "office policy" as her reason for withholding the information.

Assistant Chief Alan Dreher has maintained police seized drugs from Johnston's home, but he has not said what the drugs were or where they were found.

Police said they knocked on Johnston's door about 7 p.m. before pulling off the burglar bars and knocking down the front door.

Dreher said Johnston should have recognized the men as officers even though they were not wearing uniforms. He said all three wore bulletproof vests that had the word "police" across the front and back. He said they shouted they were police as they burst through the door.

Johnston met the narcotics investigators with gunfire, police said. Medical examiners said she was shot twice in the chest and in extremities.

The three officers are recovering from their wounds and are on leave with pay until the investigation is complete. The police department said its internal affairs unit would investigate the shooting. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation also is reviewing the incident.

Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard also has vowed to investigate. He said a preliminary review of the Johnston shooting indicated that the officers "had a legal right" to search the home.

Hutchins wants more.

"Clearly, the police had a right to exercise a search warrant. I intend to ask the Justice Department to determine, did they have sufficient evidence for a no-knock warrant. What evidence did they have? That's what the community needs to know."

On Friday on Johnston's block, which is just off Joseph P. Lowery Boulevard, residents still buzzed about what had happened. Police have described their suspect as 6 feet tall and 250 to 260 pounds.

Nobody seemed to know a man by that description from the neighborhood. Some expressed doubts about the police account of what happened. "I think that's just something they made up," said Curtis Mitchell, Johnston's longtime neighbor.

Four days after the shooting, yellow police tape still surrounds Johnston's home, where a memorial of flowers and stuffed animals rests at the edge of her lawn.

Johnston's home is attracting visitors -- those who want to see the location of what has become a national story in hopes of making the senseless somehow make sense.

"Is this the house?" Willie Stone, 74, asked from his car. He said he hadn't been in the neighborhood in 50 years. The last time was to visit a woman he was dating.

"I was just coming to see it," said Stone, who lives in the city's Collier Heights neighborhood. "I've got my doubts about what happened."

Tabitha Crowder, who lives nearby, also came over to catch a glimpse. "We just walked past just to see," Crowder said. "It's so sad and hurtful."

U.S. Inquiry Is Sought In Killing Of Woman, 92 (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

ATLANTA — A civil rights activist representing the family of an elderly woman killed in a gunfight with police is calling for a federal investigation into her death.

The Rev. Markel Hutchins will go to Washington on Monday to deliver a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales requesting that the Justice Department and FBI review the shootout, Hutchins said in a news release Thursday.

Kathryn Johnston, who police said was 92, was killed Tuesday evening by narcotics agents. Authorities said the agents got a search warrant for her home after buying drugs from a man there that afternoon.

Police said the plainclothes agents identified themselves, but when they knocked down Johnston's door, she opened fire and injured three of the officers.

All are expected to recover.

"This horrific incident has all the signs of an egregious violation of Ms. Johnston's civil and human rights at worst and police officers using poor judgment and unnecessary force at best," Hutchins said.

Johnston's neighbors and relatives have called the raid a case of mistaken identity. Her niece said there were no drugs in the home.

Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard said his office has begun its own investigation but said a preliminary review of the case shows the officers had a legal right to search the home.

State Has Yet To Test Slavery Statute (LAT)

By Garrett Therolf, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098578

No human trafficking cases have been tried since the law went into effect nearly a year ago. It's too difficult to prove the crime, police say.

When Westminster police raided the apartment, they were convinced they were freeing the eight women inside from modern-day slavery.

Police said the women had agreed to come to the United States from villages in Malaysia and Singapore on vague promises of a better life, but instead found themselves forced into prostitution.

Their pimps seized their passports and kept the women locked in a series of bleak apartments, with video cameras monitoring their movements and furniture barricading the doors. On the rare occasions the women were allowed outside, police said, it was with an escort.

Cases like this one prompted California last year to become the first state to enact a federally drafted law cracking down on human trafficking. Despite some well-publicized cases, authorities said existing law did not provide the legal tools to fight the crime, instead forcing them to use other charges, which often carry little or no jail time.

When Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed the bill into law amid much fanfare and with the hope that it would become a national model, he said it would help put an end to "a horrific crime that our society cannot abide."

But in the 11 months since the law went into effect, not a single human trafficking case has been prosecuted, according to the law's sponsor, Assemblywoman Sally Lieber (D-Mountain View). Police complain the law makes it too difficult to prove that human trafficking has taken place.

The problem is that seldom is the evidence black and white. Were the workers being kept against their will, or were they enduring their hardships willingly as a step up the economic pecking order?

Another problem is persuading people to tell their stories of involuntary servitude. Authorities said victims often fear police because of bad experiences in their homelands and because their captors have told them their families would suffer retaliation if they talked.

"We certainly can see that the fear [on the part] of immigrants particularly has been even deeper than we expected," said San Francisco Dist. Atty. Kamala D. Harris, a co-sponsor of the law. "We can't get around the fact that the new law is being underused, but there is great promise."

On the other hand, Sally Thomas, a Los Angeles County deputy district attorney who helped draft the law, doubts it will be used extensively. "We often find it's more appropriate to bring kidnapping, false imprisonment or extortion in these cases," she said. "The statute is a very narrow statute…. Our expectations should not be extremely high."

Lawmakers believed the law was particularly important in California's immigrant communities, the sites of several well-publicized cases over the last decade. The U.S. Justice Department estimates that 17,500 people are enslaved in the nation's fields, factories and brothels, with a disproportionately large share in California, although the department acknowledges the figure may not be completely reliable.

This year, an Irvine couple were convicted in federal court of keeping a young Egyptian girl as their domestic slave. In 1995, authorities freed 71 Thai workers held behind razor wire in an El Monte sweatshop. The problems there had been reported to police two years earlier by Win Chuai Ngan, a worker who had escaped, but authorities found his story hard to believe.

A Justice Department report said the criminal rings that bring these workers to the United States have a more lucrative business than drug traffickers because of the low cost of slave labor and the small risk of getting caught.

When the state law passed — providing penalties of three to five years in prison and four to eight years if the victim is a minor — detectives dramatically stepped up their investigations, helped by federal grants aimed at fighting the trafficking rings.

The LAPD received more than $450,000, and an Orange County task force received $200,000, some of which it used to hire a liaison to teach local government and nonprofit agencies how to spot signs of trafficking.

The money also went to pay for investigations involving sophisticated surveillance equipment and informants and to pay detectives.

Westminster Police Lt. Derek Marsh leads the city's detective squad in Orange County's Little Saigon, a community believed to be a landing strip for human traffickers. In February, detectives were told by informants that a massage parlor advertising young Asian masseuses on Vietnamese and Chinese websites was a front for a brothel that enslaved prostitutes.

The detectives followed leads to Monterey Park and Rosemead, and learned that it was a sophisticated operation that moved almost monthly to avoid detection.

The women spoke no English and never saw anyone but pimps and johns, Marsh said. They often didn't use condoms.

By the time police raided the San Gabriel Valley operation in August, the eight women had worked in the two cities for as long as three years. They were paid $130 per john, and they split the money with their pimps, police said.

Five men were arrested as alleged brothel operators. A sixth suspect was believed to be recruiting additional women in Malaysia, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0098579

Police said only one woman would speak to them. Marsh said she told a chilling story of forced labor and abuse.

"This is the best, most convincing case we have found," he said.

The Los Angeles district attorney's office felt otherwise.

"They really weren't being held against their will," prosecutor Marcia Daniel said. "Only one woman was willing to be truthful, and she made it abundantly clear that she did the work willingly. I don't think anybody enjoys it, but there's so much money involved."

Prosecutors charged the five men with pimping and pandering. They are awaiting trial. The women were not charged, and they are being held as potential witnesses and for review of their immigration status.

The Los Angeles district attorney has come close to prosecuting only one other trafficking case, involving a woman accused of forcing a homeless teenage girl into prostitution. The district attorney initially filed human trafficking and pimping and pandering charges but later dropped the trafficking charge.

Even the bill's author is surprised about the unexpected roadblock.

"We went through a lot of difficulty to get this bill passed, so it's obviously difficult to hear that the law is not being used more," said Lieber, who hopes to find ways to improve the law, the first felony added to the California penal code since 1999.

An important part of the trafficking law, its supporters said, can help persuade victims to cooperate. If there is a conviction, it allows victims to sue their captors for back wages, receive housing and medical assistance, obtain legal residency and receive job training and small-business loans.

Federal authorities are struggling with their law as well. The federal statute was passed in 2000, but there have been few convictions. Federal authorities say local authorities have more people to root out these cases and encouraged passage of the state law.

The Justice Department has expressed disappointment with its own progress, reporting in September that only 122 laborers and prostitutes qualified for victim benefits, 14 fewer than in the previous year.

Those benefits can provide a happy ending to workers' hardships.

Two examples are Win Chuai Ngan and his wife, Sokanya Sutthiprapha, who were among those freed from the El Monte sweatshop. With loans and training from the nonprofit Thai Community Development Center, they opened two Thai restaurants and a spa.

In the meantime, the women in the Westminster police case will be deported once the pimping and pandering trial is over.

Marsh predicted that some of their families will reject them, and that they will go back to working as prostitutes, perhaps for the same organization.

Officials: New Calif. Law Toothless Against Human Trafficking (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

A law passed nearly a year ago to help curb human trafficking in the state still has never been used to prosecute those suspected of enslaving immigrants, proponents of the bill said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said he hoped the bill would be a national model in countering modern day slavery when he signed it into law last year. The bill, he said, would end "a horrific crime that our society cannot abide."

But authorities say the law makes it too difficult to prove immigrant workers were being held against their will, one of the criteria for classifying victims of human trafficking. Investigators also said victims often are reluctant to testify against their captors for fear of retaliation against family abroad, making it difficult to build a case.

"We certainly can see that the fear (on the part) of immigrants particularly has been even deeper than we expected," said San Francisco District Attorney Kamala D. Harris, a co-sponsor of the law.

Some 17,500 immigrants are enslaved in U.S. brothels, farms and factories - with a large share in California, according to rough estimates by the U.S. Justice Department.

Harris maintains the state law will be a valuable tool in cutting down on human trafficking in the future. It provides penalties of three to five years in prison for traffickers - four to eight if the victim is a minor. And an increase in California investigations after the law passed has led to tens of thousands in federal grants for local authorities.

Los Angeles County deputy district attorney Sally Thomas, however, is less confident the new law will be used often.

"We often find it's more appropriate to bring kidnapping, false imprisonment or extortion in these cases," said Thomas, who also helped draft the law.

Local detectives who in August uncovered a brothel staffed by Asian immigrants in Orange County's Little Saigon - an area believed to be a center of human trafficking - hit a wall when they tried to present a case to the Los Angeles district attorney's office, Police Lt. Derek Marsh said.

DOJ_NMG_0098580

Prosecutors were unwilling to try the case under the state law despite suspicions that one suspect was recruiting women from Malaysia and a prostitute's statements about forced labor and abuse, Marsh said.

"This is the best, most convincing case we have found," he said.

Prosecutor Marcia Daniel said, however, there was no evidence the women had been enslaved.

"I don't think anybody enjoys it, but there's so much money involved," Daniel said.

Five men were charged with pimping and pandering, but not human trafficking.

Assemblywoman Sally Lieber, a Democrat from Mountain View and author of the bill, said she was disappointed it has not been used.

"We went through a lot of difficulty to get this bill passed, so it's obviously difficult to hear that the law is not being used more," she said.

A federal law against human trafficking passed six years ago also has reaped few convictions. Federal officials hoped local authorities would be better equipped to investigate trafficking and encouraged passage of the state law.

Massachusetts Governor Sues To Compel Vote On Same-Sex Marriage Amendment (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

BOSTON, Nov. 24 — Gov. Mitt Romney filed a lawsuit Friday asking the state's highest court to order the legislature to vote on a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage or to place it on the 2008 ballot if lawmakers do not take up the provision.

The legislature voted 109 to 87 on Nov. 9 to recess a constitutional convention before the measure was taken up, which appeared to kill it. The convention was recessed until Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session.

More than 170,000 people have signed a petition asking the legislature to amend the state's Constitution to prohibit same-sex marriage. Massachusetts is the only state that permits it.

Mr. Romney, a Republican who did not seek re-election but is considering running for president, announced plans to file the lawsuit at a rally of same-sex marriage opponents on Sunday. The next day he sent a letter to the 109 lawmakers who had voted to recess, saying they were "frustrating the democratic process and subverting the plain meaning of the Constitution" by refusing to vote.

The lawsuit, filed by Mr. Romney, acting as a private citizen, and 10 other opponents of same-sex marriage, said the legislature had a "legal duty to act" on citizen petitions but had relied on procedural devices to "avoid a vote and evade its constitutional duties." The legislature recessed before voting on the measure two other times this session.

The suit named the Senate president, Robert E. Travaglini, saying he had "failed to carry out his ministerial duty to require final action" on the petition. A spokeswoman for Mr. Travaglini, a Democrat, could not be reached for comment.

The suit asks the Supreme Judicial Court to "step into the constitutional breach" and direct Secretary of State William F. Galvin, also named in the suit, to place the amendment on the 2008 ballot if the legislature does not act.

Fifty of 200 legislators must vote in favor of the constitutional amendment in this session and in the next one for it to appear as a referendum on the 2008 ballot. Both sides have said the amendment has enough support to advance to the next session.

In a statement, Kris Mineau, the president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which circulated petitions for the amendment, applauded the lawsuit. Mr. Mineau said that the recess was a "deliberate effort by those in the legislature to kill the marriage amendment" and that the legislature had failed to "afford the citizens a fair up or down vote."

Gary Buseck, legal director for Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, which won the lawsuit that led to the legalization of same-sex marriage before the same court, called the lawsuit frivolous.

"I can't see any way in which this lawsuit has any merit whatsoever," Mr. Buseck said. "The bottom line is, the legislature acted in accordance with its rules and the Constitution and did the right thing to protect the now-declared constitutional rights of same-sex couples to marry. There's no getting around that."

Lawrence M. Friedman, a specialist on Massachusetts constitutional law at the New England School of Law, said the court must decide if the State Constitution requires the legislature to vote. Professor Friedman signed a brief supporting same-sex marriage in 2003 but has not been involved in the issue since then.

"This case is not about same-sex marriage," he said. "This is a case, first, about what the legislature is required to do, and second, if there is anything the court can do about it.

"It's not at all clear to me how this is something the court can remedy. It doesn't seem likely to me the court will order the legislature to take a vote or subvert constitutional procedures and just put it on the ballot."

Mass. Gov. Romney Asks Court To Force Gay Marriage Question Onto 2008 Ballot (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0098581

AP, November 24, 2006

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney asked Massachusetts' highest court Friday to force a proposed anti-gay marriage constitutional amendment onto the state's 2008 ballot if the Legislature fails to vote on it.

The Republican governor, a fierce opponent of gay marriage and a possible presidential contender, filed the request with the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court after lawmakers put off acting on the question until January. The high court ruled 4-3 in 2003 that the state could no longer deny marriage licenses to gay couples.

Romney has said the state Constitution requires legislators to vote on whether the measure should go on the ballot. If they don't vote when they return Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session, the court can order the secretary of state to put it on the 2008 ballot, Romney argues.

The postponement of legislative action was widely seen by supporters and opponents of gay marriage as a way to kill the measure.

Backers of the question, which would define marriage in Massachusetts as the union of a man and a woman, gathered more than 170,000 signatures of people.

Opponents of the question, including powerful House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi, feared they didn't have the 151 votes needed to kill the measure and instead called for a vote to recess the joint House-Senate session until Jan. 2. Lawmakers approved the recess vote by 109-87.

Since gay marriage became legal, more than 8,000 same-sex couples have tied the knot in Massachusetts, the only state to allow gay marriage. The ballot measure would ban future gay marriages in Massachusetts but leave existing ones intact.

Romney, who opted not to run for a second term as governor this year, is nearing a decision on whether to seek the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

Bishops Stand Firm On Birth Control (WP)

By Tim Townsend

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

ST. LOUIS -- It has been so long since most U.S. Catholics have even debated the moral implications of contraception that statisticians no longer regularly ask them what they think of birth control.

Recent poll numbers are scarce, but those that exist suggest that about 90 percent of U.S. Roman Catholics ignore their church's teaching on contraception.

"When it comes to that particular tenet of faith, it's a lost cause in America," said Tom Smith, a senior research scientist with the National Organization for Research at the University of Chicago.

But Catholic Church teaching doesn't change based on statistics, even if that teaching is ignored for a couple of generations.

"The Catholic Church articulates what we believe to be true, and we don't stop believing what's true because it's statistically unpopular," Bishop Edward Braxton of Belleville, Ill., said recently at the fall meeting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Baltimore. "We are countercultural in that sense."

Somewhat lost in reports from the meeting was the approval of a new document from the U.S. church's anti-abortion committee aimed at young Catholics who are engaged or recently married. Called "Married Love and the Gift of Life," the document reaffirms the church's stance that artificial contraception is immoral, even between husband and wife.

The document passed with 95 percent of bishops voting in its favor and no debate on the floor. The bishops were as unified behind their teaching on contraception as their flock and the dominant culture are against it. The expression "countercultural" came up repeatedly in conversations with bishops.

There is no question that church teaching on contraception has remained the same for centuries or that U.S. Catholics have largely ignored it for the last 50 years. The real question about "Married Love and the Gift of Life" is: Why now?

Bishops in Baltimore answered that question by pointing to what they see as a trend: Young Catholics are increasingly seeking out the church's ancient teachings. In this sense, the bishops' repeated use of "countercultural" has additional meaning.

The idea that a new generation of Catholics will reject the perceived sexual freedoms gained by their parents and grandparents over the last half-century and align with a theology that teaches sex for procreation is truly, as they see it, revolutionary.

"The real radical idea is not 'don't use contraception,' " said Christopher West, a research fellow and faculty member of the Theology of the Body Institute in West Chester, Pa. "The real radical idea is connecting sex and God -- that sex is meant to express divine love."

The new document is the first about birth control from the collective body of U.S. bishops since 1968's "Human Life in Our Day."

DOJ_NMG_0098582

Archbishop Joseph Naumann of Kansas City, Kan., a member of the bishops' anti-abortion committee, said that was too long. U.S bishops, he said, have failed to properly educate Catholics about the church's teaching on contraception. "We haven't been clear enough or effective enough as teachers," Naumann said.

Not everyone thinks U.S. Catholics will be persuaded by the bishops' renewed focus on contraception.

"It seems to me extremely unlikely it will make much difference to most people," said James P. Hanigan, a professor of moral theology at Duquesne University in Pittsburgh who has studied the church's teaching on birth control. "For most people, this issue's been resolved."

The church's ancient view on contraception (the roots of its opposition can be traced to the second century) was most famously reaffirmed by Pope Paul VI in his 1968 encyclical, "Humanae Vitae," or "of human life." Most other Christian churches accept contraception as a responsible method of family planning. The Catholic Church teaches that because contraception suppresses the possibility of procreation, and therefore violates the natural law, it is always wrong.

"Suppressing fertility by using contraception denies part of the inherent meaning of married sexuality and does harm the couple's unity," according to "Married Love and the Gift of Life." "The total giving of oneself, body and soul, to one's beloved is no time to say: 'I give you everything I am -- except.' "

The new document sets the church's teaching within the context Pope John Paul II's "Theology of the Body," a set of 129 short talks he gave from 1979 to 1984 that reflected on sexuality and divinity. West said the message of "Theology of the Body" is that eros, or erotic love, is meant to express agape, or divine love.

"When a married couple cuts off the eros from the agape," said West, they "render the sexual act sterile . . . they won't find the sexual happiness they went in search of. Instead they will find disillusionment, despair and societal chaos."

Carlyle Group Broaches Buyout Of Taiwanese Chip Maker ASE (WSJ)

By Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The Carlyle Group is in talks with the management of Advanced Semiconductor Engineering Inc. of Taiwan to make an offer for the publicly listed company in what would be a buyout valued at between $5 and $6 billion.

A deal of that size would mean Asia is joining the private-equity wave that has hit the U.S. and Europe. ASE, a chip-testing and packaging company, is listed both in Taiwan and on the New York Stock Exchange.

"A Carlyle-led consortium acknowledges that it has submitted an indication of interest to the Board of Directors regarding a potential acquisition." Carlyle, a firm that specializes in the buyout of public companies, said in a prepared statement.

The Carlyle announcement added that the investment firm had signed an agreement with Jason Chang, the chairman of ASE and its largest shareholder, with 18.4% of the outstanding shares, to buy out other shareholders at NT$39 (US$1.19) a share. That price represents a 24% premium above the 30-day average closing price of the stock.

The success of the deal depends on the willingness of shareholders to tender shares. This type of public-to-private offer with the support of management has been a feature of recent deals in the U.S., including those involving Kinder Morgan Inc. and HCA Inc.

Semiconductor companies have been a focus of private-equity firms. Carlyle was recently part of a consortium led by the Blackstone Group, along with Texas Pacific Group and Permira Funds which bought Freescale Semiconductor Inc. in a $17.6 billion deal. In the past, private-equity firms were reluctant to buy semiconductor operations but their appetite has grown as the stocks have become less volatile, making it possible to support heavy debt loads.

In recent months, Taiwan, along with Australia, has been among the most promising markets for international private-equity firms. Carlyle has been particularly active in the media sector in Taiwan, having recently bought Taiwan Broadband Communications and Eastern Multimedia Corp. Its presence in Taiwan indicates it has extensive relationships with local banks, which are expected to provide attractive terms on the debt for the potential buyout.

Carlyle's interest in the Taiwanese technology sector has been moving the market the past few days, with speculation that it is also looking at other firms.

Carlyle Set For $6.4bn ASE Deal (FT)

By Katrin Hille In Taipei

DOJ_NMG_0098583

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

The Carlyle Group is poised to acquire Taiwan's Advanced Semiconductor Engineering, the world's largest chip packaging and testing company, in a $6.4bn buyout that would set a new landmark in private equity deals in the technology industry.

The acquisition, which is expected to close early next year, could help ASE win new orders from semiconductor companies recently acquired by private equity firms.

Carlyle and ASE said on Friday that the US private equity group had submitted an indication of interest to ASE regarding a potential acquisition at T$39 a share, and that Jason Chang, ASE's single largest shareholder and chairman, had already agreed to roll his 18.4 per cent stake into a Carlyle-controlled holding company that would own ASE.

At T$39, the offer price represents a 10 per cent premium to ASE's closing share price of T$35.50 on Friday, before news of Carlyle's interest emerged.

Carlyle said the deal could greatly enhance ASE's market position, because other semiconductor firms in the group's portfolio and even those owned by other private equity firms were likely to increase outsourcing volumes.

ASE, which is also listed on the New York Stock Exchange, performs packaging and testing services for other chipmakers who do not want to run the capacity for these relatively labour-intensive final steps in the semiconductor manufacturing chain.

Greg Zeluck, Carlyle's managing director of Asia buyouts, said ASE was likely to win new outsourcing orders from Freescale, Motorola's former chipmaking unit, which Carlyle is also acquiring.

Freescale is already one of ASE's five largest customers, but also works with Amkor, its smaller rival.

"There are more outsourcing opportunities from other semiconductor firms in the Carlyle portfolio," said Mr Zeluck. "I also think that there are additional opportunities from Philips even though we are not an investor there."

Netherlands-based Philips sold its semiconductor arm to a consortium led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts earlier this year.

"The private equity industry's growing presence in the semiconductor industry will push these companies more in the direction of assets-light," said Mr Zeluck.

Freddy Liu, ASE vice-president, said: "As consolidation is taking place upstream, consolidation is also due downstream in the semiconductor industry. This is a sign of confidence in ASE."

People close to the situation said an open tender offer would be submitted over the next two months. "With Mr Chang's agreement to take part, this is pretty much a done deal," said one person close to the talks.

Based on ASE's outstanding shares, the offer is worth US$5.5bn. Bankers said including debt, the deal would be valued at US$6.4bn.

Carlyle plans to delist ASE once the deal closes and retain Mr Chang and his brother as chairman and chief executive of the company.

ASE reported T$4.2bn net earnings for the third quarter on T$26.7bn in revenues. Behind US-based Amkor, the company's biggest rivals are Stats ChipPac of Singapore and Taiwan-based Siliconware.

Carlyle In Talks To Buy Chip Company (WP/BLOOM)

By Cathy Chan, Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

Carlyle Group of the District is in talks to buy Advanced Semiconductor Engineering, the world's largest computer chip packager, for $5.7 billion, as demand for computer and mobile-phone components increases.

Carlyle and Advanced Semiconductors Chairman Jason Chang, who holds 18.4 percent of the Taiwan company, offered to pay 9.9 percent more than the company's closing price yesterday in Taipei, Carlyle said in a written statement. Carlyle said talks with the group have not concluded and a formal offer may not be made.

Carlyle's proposed purchase would add to recent acquisitions the firm has made in the semiconductor business. In September, it was part of a group that agreed to buy Freescale Semiconductor for $17.6 billion, in the biggest technology buyout ever. Global chip sales could increase 9.4 percent this year, the Semiconductor Industry Association said.

"The outlook for the electronics industry is good, as the introduction of Microsoft's Vista should boost demand for PCs," said Michael On, who oversees the equivalent of $60 million as managing director at Beyond Asset Management in Taipei.

The spot price of benchmark 512-megabyte memory chips, used in personal computers and other devices, has risen 62 percent this year, according to Dramexchange.com in Taiwan.

Advanced Semiconductor, which was founded in 1984, packages chips in plastic or ceramic housings and adds connectors so they can be assembled as part of computers, game consoles, cellphones and other electronic instruments. The company employs more than 30,000 people.

Advanced Semiconductor confirmed the Carlyle offer and Chang's participation in the bid.

DOJ_NMG_0098584

"We have received the indication of the offer from Carlyle, and our chairman has agreed with the offer," spokesman Freddie Liu said in a telephone interview yesterday. "We still need to seek approval from other shareholders."

Liu declined to comment on whether the company's vice chairman and president, Richard Chang, who helped found the company with his brother Jason, would also participate in the bid.

The company's shares rose 2.6 percent before the announcement, which came after the close of trading. The offer represents a 23.5 percent premium on the stock's 30-day average closing price, Carlyle said.

Goldman Sachs Group is advising Carlyle on the takeover bid. Carlyle has been investing in Taiwan since 1999, the company said.

Advanced Semiconductor could "take advantage of accelerating global outsourcing trends for semiconductor assembly and testing services," said Greg Zeluck, Carlyle's managing director. The firm could also tap the "global networks of Carlyle and its portfolio companies."

Buyout firms have announced offers totaling $57 billion in the Asia Pacific region this year, more than triple the amount for all of 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg News.

Carlyle said in July that it raised $1.8 billion for its second Asia buyout fund, which will focus on investment in Asia outside of Japan. That would make $4.8 billion it has attracted for investment in the region in the past year, including its second Japan fund.

Smithfield Is Pushing Into The Beef And Turkey Industries (VP)

By Jeremiah Mcwilliams

Virginian-Pilot, November 25, 2006

"Y'all know Smithfield," drawls Southern food personality Paula Deen in a radio commercial. "They're the ham people."

True: Smithfield Foods Inc., which recently hired Deen to push its spiral-sliced hams and other signature products, is the world's largest hog-raiser and pork processor. And it plans to further fatten its pork portfolio. But the company, with sales of $11.4 billion in its fiscal year ended April 30, also is growing aggressively beyond its roots in hogs and ham.

A recent deal gave Smithfield a 49 percent stake in Butterball LLC, the nation's largest turkey producer. And a planned Oklahoma beef plant will make the Smithfield-based company the fourth-largest beef processor in the United States.

Smithfield, which appears to be testing antitrust limits with growth in its core pig and pork business, is trying to buy or build its way into bigger positions in nearly every type of meat except chicken, which it has avoided so far.

"This is the most active period in Smithfield's history," chief executive C. Larry Pope told analysts at a Boston conference in September. "In virtually every segment of our business today, something very significant is going on.... Smithfield is not just in the pork business."

Smithfield is betting that the vertically integrated model it honed in pork - controlling production from animal-raising to meat-packing - will translate well to beef.

Smithfield has just 6 percent of the U.S. beef-processing market. But the company is dwarfed by the top four players, which together control 83 percent, according to its estimates.

"We need to get bigger - we're still too small in beef," Pope said Monday as Smithfield donated turkeys to a Norfolk food bank. "Our customers, like Farm Fresh... want to deal with fewer and fewer suppliers."

For example, Tyson Foods Inc. is more than twice Smithfield's size. "We need to be of size to match," Pope said.

U.S. beef packers have struggled in recent years, largely because of high cattle prices and restrictions on exported U.S. beef in Asian nations such as Japan and South Korea, which blocked such imports after a case of mad cow disease was discovered in Washington state in December 2003. At Smithfield, for instance, beef yielded about 23 percent of its sales last year, but the division lost $2.8 million.

Several analysts believe that U.S. beef plants don't stay busy enough to make a profit.

Smithfield's new plant, announced Oct. 18, could further weaken the industry and hurt Smithfield's earnings per share, said JPMorgan analyst Pablo Zuanic.

Construction on the $200 million plant in Texas County, Okla., is scheduled to begin in January. A 50-50 joint venture with ContiGroup Companies Inc., the plant will be able to slaughter as many as 5,000 cattle daily.

Zuanic suggested last month that Smithfield might be using "gamemanship" - the threat of tougher competition in an already battered industry - to force private equity firm HM Capital Partners to sell Swift & Co., a major beef and pork processor and longtime Smithfield target.

Pope denied that.

Because the Japanese market reopened this summer and Korea is loosening restrictions, "those markets will be alive and well" in two years, Pope said. The Oklahoma plant could help Smithfield target the export markets.

DOJ_NMG_0098585

"There's a real opportunity to grow on the beef side," said Bill Chappell, an equity analyst in Atlanta with SunTrust Robinson Humphrey. Although beef is a secondary project for Smithfield, "they want to make a go of it."

The new plant will draw from Smithfield's cattle-feeding joint venture with ContiGroup, which can feed 811,000 cattle at its 10 feed lots in Colorado, Kansas, Idaho, Texas and Oklahoma. It is the largest cattle-feeding operation in the country.

"We do have the cattle," Pope said at Smithfield's annual meeting in Richmond three months ago. "We could put together an integrated model that would be pretty compelling."

Smithfield's ability to trace cattle from feed lots to meat-packing lines - similar to its "traceability" in hog slaughtering, which the company touts as a safety benefit - could pay dividends, said Andrew Wolf, a managing director in Richmond with BB&T Capital Markets, which is seeking investment banking work from Smithfield Foods.

"They'll have control of the animal the whole time," Wolf said. So Smithfield will be able to get "a deserved premium on the export market."

The Butterball purchase, at least in name recognition, is one of Smithfield's most eye-catching moves.

Pope has said Butterball is "the national brand - it is almost synonymous with the word 'turkey.' "

This fall, Carolina Turkeys, of which Smithfield already owned 49 percent, shelled out $325 million for ConAgra Foods Inc.'s Butterball turkey operations. Renamed Butterball LLC, the Mount Olive, N.C.-based turkey producer is a joint venture with Maxwell Farms Inc.

Butterball gives the former Carolina Turkeys, and its owners, a stronger cache among consumers. Butterball's products command premium prices, Pope said. That matches a key Smithfield strategy - shifting the business into more profitable products such as pre-cooked sausages and bacon, and capitalizing on the higher prices consumers will pay for convenience.

In addition to the Butterball acquisition, Smithfield paid $246 million in cash for the rest of ConAgra's branded meats business, which included Armour and LunchMakers.

Convenience products such as precooked ribs can command prices eight or 10 times higher than unprocessed, fresh meat, Pope said in September.

It's "a gigantic move up the value chain," Pope said. "You can do the simple math on this, and the math is pretty darn explosive."

While it expands in beef and turkey, Smithfield is running into opposition as it tries to complete a strategic buy in its core business: the planned $810 million deal for Premium Standard Farms, a Kansas City-based hog raiser and processor.

The proposal, announced in September, sparked protests from farming groups and Midwest politicians who argued that the merger of the nation's top two hog-raisers would give Smithfield too much power over small hog farmers.

"It makes no anti trust sense to allow Smithfield to buy Premium Standard Farms," said Michael Stumo, an attorney for the Lincoln, Neb.-based Organization for Competitive Markets. "It is a 100 percent power grab."

The Department of Justice this month asked Smithfield and Premium Standard for more information on the merger - a move that will delay the deal until the companies comply. Such requests occurred in only 3.1 percent of transactions in fiscal 2005, according to a Department of Justice report.

"It indicates that you're much higher on the radar of the Justice Department than you'd like," said Thane Scott, co-chair of the antitrust practice group at Edwards Angell Palmer & Dodge in Boston. "If you get a second request, you're in the danger zone."

Smithfield expected the additional scrutiny and would clear anti trust hurdles, Pope said. "We not trying to dominate the industry. We're trying to secure our future."

Still, if the deal goes through, Smithfield will have "probably grown as big as it can in the U.S. pork business," said SunTrust analyst Chappell, who added that it can still expand its European pork business.

Pope, who was promoted to chief executive on Sept. 1, seems to relish adding new brands and looking for new opportunities. Smithfield makes no apology for being one of the most opportunistic companies in the meat industry.

"We are committed to global expansion," Pope said.

FTC Backs Merger Of Real Estate Companies (AP)

AP, November 25, 2006

CB Richard Ellis needs only shareholder approval to complete Trammell Crow acquisition.

DALLAS — CB Richard Ellis Group Inc., the world's largest commercial real estate services company, has been cleared by federal regulators to acquire rival Trammell Crow Co. for nearly $1.8 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0098586

Dallas-based Trammell Crow announced Friday that the final regulatory step was completed when the Federal Trade Commission approved early termination of a waiting period required under antitrust law. The deal is expected to close next month.

El Segundo, Calif.-based CB Richard Ellis agreed in October to buy Trammell Crow for about $1.79 billion, or $49.51 a share.

The deal will create a company with about $4.4 billion in annual revenue, more than 10 percent of the commercial real estate market, and let CB Richard Ellis tap Trammell Crow's list of corporate clients.

Trammell Crow shareholders must still approve the deal at a special meeting Dec. 18.

Analysts say U.S. office markets have rebounded from a slump earlier this decade, and foreign pension funds are pouring money into buildings, then hiring firms to manage their property.

The trends have helped raise the value of firms such as Trammell Crow, whose shares more than quadrupled since early 2003.

With nearly 50 offices in the United States, Trammell Crow employs about 6,200 people and posted 2005 earnings of $59 million on $896 million in sales.

CB Richard Ellis employs about 14,500 people and posted 2005 net income of $217 million on sales of $2.9 billion. Chairman Richard Blum owns 14 percent of the company through his Blum Capital Partners.

Trammell Crow's shares closed Friday at $49.27, up 4 cents and within 12 cents of their 52-week high. CB Richard Ellis' shares fell 20 cents to $32.61.

Microsoft Gives Europe Antitrust Documents (NYT)

By Paul Meller

The New York Times, November 24, 2006

BRUSSELS, Nov. 23 — Microsoft submitted a new batch of technical information about its Windows operating system to the European Commission on Thursday, meeting the latest deadline to provide information on whether it is complying with a 2004 antitrust ruling.

“This is an important milestone,” Microsoft said in a statement. Final edits and technical review of the information already submitted in July have now been completed, it added, insisting that it had not broken the summer deadline.

The commission, which fined Microsoft $357 million in July for failing to comply with the antitrust order, disagrees. Last week, the European competition commissioner, Neelie Kroes, expressed growing impatience with Microsoft when she imposed the latest deadline. She described the dossier submitted in July as incomplete and warned Microsoft that it faced daily fines of 3 million euros ($3.9 million) if it did not hand over all the technical information about Windows that the commission had requested.

Her department welcomed the company’s submission. “Now the dossier from Microsoft is worth testing,” her spokesman, Jonathan Todd, said in a telephone interview on Thursday. “Potential licensees of the technical information will be invited to Microsoft’s headquarters in Redmond to look at it.”

In the meantime, the commission and the trustee chosen by Microsoft to oversee the process of compliance with the 2004 ruling will examine the newly submitted information, Mr. Todd said.

In 2004, Microsoft was found guilty of abusing the dominant strength of Windows to muscle in on other separate software markets, including the market for server operating systems.

The 2004 ruling ordered Microsoft to disclose enough information about Windows to allow rival server software manufacturers, including Sun Microsystems and open-source companies like Red Hat, to design server operating systems that worked as well with computers that run Windows as Microsoft’s own server operating system.

If the information provided by Microsoft does not satisfy the order, the company will face a fine of 3 million euros a day, backdated to July, Mr. Todd said.

Microsoft said Thursday that it had met the July deadline. “The trustee and Microsoft have now completed the technical review and edits to the more than 100 documents, totaling 8,500 pages, that we submitted in July of this year, in accordance with the deadline established by the commission,” it said.

It described the submission of technical documentation in July, and the revision process since then, as “an unprecedented undertaking involving over 300 engineers and technical writers at Microsoft.”

Even if the information submitted Thursday is satisfactory, Microsoft may still face fines for the period between the July deadline and Thursday. “We’ll take a decision about this period of time in due course,” Mr. Todd said.

Microsoft Meets EC Deadline For Disclosing Software Data (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0098587

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

The information will be tested before it goes to rivals in the European antitrust action.

European Union regulators said Microsoft Corp. met a Thursday deadline for turning over information about its Windows operating software that should help other software companies.

The data will be tested to confirm that the company has finally complied with a 2004 antitrust ruling.

The European Commission, which fined Microsoft 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July for not providing "complete and accurate" data to allow server software to interface with Windows, said the technical manual could now be reviewed by "potential licensees" — companies that compete with Microsoft in software for work-group servers, such as Sun Microsystems Inc., Novell Inc. and IBM Corp.

"In parallel, the monitoring trustee will test the documentation in order to verify its accuracy," the EC said. "The commission will decide in due course whether or not Microsoft is in compliance with the obligation to provide complete and accurate technical documentation, taking into account comments from the potential licensees and advice from the trustee."

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said this was likely to take "months rather than weeks."

Regulators threatened new fines of 3 million euros a day last week if Microsoft did not patch up "the remaining omissions and deficiencies." They said the company should have handed over a good set of documents explaining how server protocols work by an original July 2004 deadline.

The software maker was ordered to provide the information after the EU found it guilty of abusing its monopoly by deliberately withholding technical data from rivals, who alleged that Microsoft ended cooperation when it started making its own server software.

Microsoft challenged the immediate sanctions, but a judge ordered it to comply in December 2004. It also said the commission's request was unclear and it had received a useful set of guidelines only when independent monitor Neil Barrett set out a work program earlier this year.

The company said Thursday's decision was an important milestone.

"The trustee and Microsoft have now completed the technical review and edits to the more than 100 documents, totaling 8,500 pages, that we submitted in July of this year, in accordance with the deadline established by the commission," Microsoft said in a statement. "We will continue to work closely with the commission and the trustee to ensure that we are in full compliance with every aspect of the commission's decision."

The EU fined Microsoft a record 497 million euros in March 2004 and told it to share interoperability information with rivals and put on sale a copy of Windows without Media Player software.

These conditions will apply to all future versions of Windows — including the upcoming Vista operating system.

Regulators also highlighted other possible antitrust problems with Vista's wide range of functions, fueled by comments from other information technology companies.

Google Reaches Copyright Deal With Belgians (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 25, 2006

Google, the world's most-used Internet search engine, reached a settlement with Belgian photographers and journalists yesterday in a copyright dispute over how Google's news service links to newspaper content.

The agreement was made with the Belgian copyright groups Sofam, representing about 3,700 photographers, and Scam, on behalf of journalists. In September, Google lost a copyright suit initially filed by Copiepresse, a group representing French- and German-language newspapers in Belgium. That case is being reheard, but the company has removed links to 17 papers from its Google News page.

Copyright disputes with Google compelled Microsoft to remove Web site links to Belgian newspapers last month and highlighted the global issue of whether traditional copyright protections apply to Internet search services.

"We reached an agreement with Sofam and Scam that will help us make extensive use of their content," Jessica Powell, a spokeswoman for Google, said in a phone interview yesterday. She declined to give details of the agreement or say whether it involved paying the groups for the content, and declined to say whether Google, based in Mountain View, Calif., was considering similar accords with the newspapers.

The company has a similar case with Agence France-Presse, which protested Google's linking to the news agency's articles and pictures in the United States and in France last year.

A Brussels court heard arguments yesterday from groups that remain in the lawsuit. Copiepresse sued in February, and a court ruling Sept. 5 forced Google to remove Google News links to the newspapers or face a fine of a million euros daily. Google complied on Sept. 18.

DOJ_NMG_0098588

Google, which was not represented in court the first time in the Copiepresse case, asked the court for a new hearing. “Today was a reconsideration of the case,” Ms. Powell said.

A ruling is expected by early January, the court said.

Tied Up In Cable (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

With mergers to rule on, multibillion-dollar bets on fiber-optic cable being laid and obscenity on broadcast television to babysit, you'd think the Federal Communications Commission would have better things to do than micromanage the market for cable boxes -- a market that mostly doesn't exist anyway. No such luck.

Like much of the trouble in telecom these days, this problem goes back to the supposedly de-regulatory 1996 Telecommunications Act. Tucked in there alongside its better-known goofs was Section 304: "Competitive Availability of Navigation Devices." This section required the FCC to open up the market for third-party "navigation devices" -- which basically meant cable boxes.

This idea encapsulates in a nutshell what was wrong with the 1996 Act. Rather than lifting regulations and letting market forces prevail, the Act is riddled with attempts to generate competition by government fiat. So it is with Section 304. Without really asking whether it made sense to require competition in cable boxes, our Solons simply decreed that the FCC should make it happen.

It hasn't happened, in part because Section 304 has never been enforced and in part because it's unclear just how big a market there is for consumer-purchased set-top boxes when the boxes can be leased from the cable company at regulated rates for a couple of dollars a month. The regulatory machine nonetheless marches on. And unless the FCC takes action on a number of waivers requested by the cable companies, the industry faces a $600 million annual bill to comply with a regulation with no real purpose. That's right: $600 million, which will of course be passed along in higher rates for consumers.

In order to facilitate competition, the FCC required the cable companies to come up with a way to provide their security codes to third-party devices, whether they are set-top boxes or cable-ready televisions. The method settled upon was a device called a cablecard. Users who didn't want the set-top box could instead get a cablecard from the cable provider and plug that into their TV, for example. This has been done, and there are some people out there using these cablecards, although most people don't bother.

The trouble with the FCC has come because the cable companies themselves don't use the cablecards in their own boxes -- the theory is that if everyone had to use the cards, the cable companies might somehow make the cards more attractive to consumers. So the FCC wants the cable companies to use cable boxes that need a cablecard, too -- never mind that the cost is high and the benefits to anyone are dubious.

The FCC could make this go away by granting a waiver from the rule, as the 1996 Act allows when the FCC determines it is in the public interest to do so. But so far there's been little sign that the FCC is inclined to do the industry any favors. The National Cable and Telecommunication Association -- a cable industry lobbying group -- put in a waiver request back in July. The FCC is supposed to rule on waivers within 90 days, but it didn't even put the application out for public comment until a week after we first called the FCC about the issue late last month.

The cable industry has had run-ins with FCC Chairman Kevin Martin over "a la carte" pricing and the expansion of obscenity rules to cable channels. This lends the cablecard shakedown a flavor of political payback -- especially coming from what is supposed to be a deregulatory, free-market-oriented FCC. Mr. Martin, who long bemoaned the absence of a Republican majority on the Commission, now has one, but there's still too little evidence of the Commission acting like it.

Concern about Mr. Martin's commitment to free markets had led Senators to hold up his renomination as Chairman for six months, turning what should have been a no-brainer into a last-minute confirmation earlier this month. The Commission, and Mr. Martin, could do the economy a favor by worrying less about political gamesmanship and more about getting on with the deregulation the telecom industry needs.

ENVIRONMENT:

Environment An Inconvenient Case For Supreme Court (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Things are bound to heat up at the Supreme Court Wednesday, when justices weigh whether the Clean Air Act requires the Bush administration to do something about global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0098589

In the late 1990s, the Clinton administration determined that greenhouse gasses -- such as auto emissions, which contribute to global climate change -- fell under the Environmental Protection Agency's jurisdiction. Challenged by then-Rep. Tom DeLay (R., Texas) at a 1998 congressional hearing, the EPA produced a legal opinion concluding that carbon dioxide could be regulated if the agency determined it contributed to "adverse effects on public health, welfare or the environment."

Environmental groups asked the EPA to act. But the agency, moving at its glacial pace, didn't respond until 2003, when a different regulatory climate prevailed in Washington. The Bush administration rejected the petition, along with the Clinton EPA's legal opinion. Carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gasses aren't "air pollutants" as defined by the Clean Air Act and, even if they were, Congress hadn't authorized the EPA to do anything about them, the administration concluded.

But even if greenhouse gases were pollutants and Congress had authorized the EPA to regulate them, the agency said it had no obligation to act. It cited "uncertainty" over the way global warming worked and the best way to remedy it, particularly in light of diplomatic disputes over the Kyoto Protocol and other international approaches to the problem.

That upset not only ecology groups, but also environmentally conscious states, which argued that federal law required EPA action, particularly since they couldn't individually regulate emissions to a degree that would affect global warming. Massachusetts took the lead, backed eventually by 17 other states and big cities, including Baltimore, New York and Washington. The Bush administration, along with such auto- and oil-producing states as Michigan, Alaska and Texas, defended the EPA position. The administration prevailed at the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The D.C. Circuit, however, coughed up a fractured opinion with plenty for the high court to consider. Judge A. Raymond Randolph ruled that it was up to the administration to decide whether or not to act on greenhouse gases. Judge David Sentelle found that the states lacked standing to sue over such a generalized phenomenon as global warming. And in dissent, Judge David Tatel wrote that the EPA had no legal grounds to refuse to begin the rule-making process.

The case has attracted interest well beyond environmental-law regulars. A Colorado ski resort filed a friend-of-court brief for Massachusetts, fearful that its prized snow could melt away without federal action. Clinton Secretary of State Madeleine Albright submitted an argument that diplomatic disputes over environmental issues shouldn't interfere with domestic rule making.

The Supreme Court is expected to decide by June, but the justices, like the EPA, aren't always successful in clearing the air.

States Will Tell Supreme Court Feds Must Act On Warming (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The polar icecaps are melting, summers growing hotter and hurricanes becoming more powerful, but the Bush administration has insisted it cannot regulate the gases that many believe are responsible.

On Wednesday, a coalition of 12 states, led by California and Massachusetts, will try to persuade the Supreme Court that the nation's environmental regulators have the legal authority and responsibility to control greenhouse gas emissions linked to global warming — which many scientists describe as the biggest environmental threat to the planet.

It is a rare day when state lawyers travel to Washington hoping to win new powers for the federal government. As David Bookbinder, a Sierra Club lawyer, noted, "How often do federal authorities insist they lack the authority to do something?"

The administration's approach to another global issue — terrorism — has been to assert broad powers to act at home and abroad. On the environmental front, the administration says, it is studying the problem and "seeking a cooperative international approach to addressing global climate change," Solicitor General Paul Clement wrote in his brief to the court.

Putting new limits on motor vehicles and power plants is out of the question, at least for now, he added, saying, "the Environmental Protection Agency lacks authority under the Clean Air Act … to regulate greenhouse gas emissions."

The case before the Supreme Court tests that conclusion. It begins with a simple question: Is carbon dioxide an "air pollutant" under the Clean Air Act? The answer may determine not only whether federal regulators must tackle global warming, but also whether California and other states may do so on their own.

Four years ago, California adopted stricter rules. The state Legislature declared its intent to "achieve the maximum feasible and cost-effective reduction of greenhouse gas emissions" from motor vehicles. These standards for new cars and trucks are to take effect in 2009.

The California way

Because of California's notorious smog problem, Congress permitted the Golden State to adopt stricter exhaust standards for cars and trucks under a special provision in the federal air pollution laws of the 1970s. Other states are allowed to follow California's lead, and 10 — from New England to the Pacific Northwest — have plans to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0098590

"Global warming is a national and international crisis. And even if the federal government won't do anything, many states will," said California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, who filed one of several lawsuits challenging the Bush administration's decision not to act on greenhouse gases.

The legality of California's new vehicle emission standards remains in doubt. They must be approved by the EPA. But the agency has yet to do so, mostly because of its view that carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases are not air pollutants under the Clean Air Act.

The automakers have sued to block California's rules, citing the EPA's stand.

Humans and animals exhale carbon dioxide, and plants absorb it. It is also emitted from tailpipes and smokestacks when fossil fuels are burned. Once in the atmosphere, carbon dioxide absorbs the sun's radiation and traps heat in the atmosphere. This is known as the greenhouse effect.

As these greenhouse gases — including methane, nitrous oxide and fluorocarbons — have become more concentrated in the atmosphere, temperatures have increased slowly but steadily. Though some scientists and politicians once dismissed this link, most now acknowledge it.

Bush administration lawyers do not discount the importance of global warming, but they argue it is not covered by the Clean Air Act. That measure, they say, targets pollutants, such as ozone, that are dangerous to breathe — not ones that occur in nature and are essentially harmless to breathe, such as carbon dioxide.

Disagreeing, the states' lawyers point to the language of the law. It says an air pollutant is "any physical, chemical (or) biological … substance or matter which is emitted … into the ambient air."

In their brief to the court, they point out, "Motor vehicles emit the physical and chemical matter carbon dioxide, methane, nitrous oxide and hydro-fluorocarbons into the ambient air." Motor vehicles are the source of about 25% of the nation's greenhouse gas emissions.

It says 'shall'

Another provision appears to require regulation of such gases. It says the EPA "shall" regulate any pollutant from cars or trucks "which may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The law defines the public's welfare to include effects on "climate" and "weather."

The state lawyers argue that because it is now apparent that greenhouse gases are endangering the public welfare, the EPA must regulate them.

Administration and auto industry lawyers say the high court should dismiss the states' lawsuit. They argue that the nation's global warming policy is a political issue to be decided by Congress and the president, not a legal issue to be decided in court.

This argument may well appeal to Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who has said the court should adopt a more modest role and allow politicians to set policies.

But environmental activists and the state lawyers were pleasantly surprised in June when the Supreme Court voted to take up the case, Massachusetts vs. EPA, despite the objections of the Bush administration.

If the court rules squarely on the question of whether the Clean Air Act regulates greenhouse gases, the stakes will be high for environmentalists, California's regulators and the auto industry.

"If we win, it will free California and other states from a legal threat," said Bookbinder, the Sierra Club lawyer. "But if the Supreme Court says the Clean Air Act does not cover climate change, it would be hard for California to say it has the authority to regulate greenhouse gases."

If the court rejects the Bush administration's stand, the automakers will be under pressure to produce vehicles that get better gas mileage.

The court could also issue a split decision.

It could rule that carbon dioxide is an air pollutant under the Clean Air Act, but that the EPA's administrator is free to decide whether to issue new emissions standards for it. In the past, the court has been very reluctant to require an agency to issue new regulations.

A split decision would not force the federal agency to regulate greenhouse gases, but it could clear the way for California and the states to do so on their own.

Besides Massachusetts and California, the states challenging the Bush administration's policy are Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

They were joined by the cities of New York, Washington and Baltimore, and several environmental groups.

Energy Firms Come To Terms With Climate Change (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098591

While the political debate over global warming continues, top executives at many of the nation's largest energy companies have accepted the scientific consensus about climate change and see federal regulation to cut greenhouse gas emissions as inevitable.

The Democratic takeover of Congress makes it more likely that the federal government will attempt to regulate emissions. The companies have been hiring new lobbyists who they hope can help fashion a national approach that would avert a patchwork of state plans now in the works. They are also working to change some company practices in anticipation of the regulation.

"We have to deal with greenhouse gases," John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil Co., said in a recent speech at the National Press Club. "From Shell's point of view, the debate is over. When 98 percent of scientists agree, who is Shell to say, 'Let's debate the science'?"

Hofmeister and other top energy company leaders, such as Duke Energy Corp.'s chief executive, James E. Rogers, back a proposal that would cap greenhouse gas emissions and allow firms to trade their quotas.

Paul M. Anderson, Duke Energy's chairman and a member of the president's Council of Advisors on Science and Technology, favors a tax on emissions of carbon dioxide, the most prevalent greenhouse gas. His firm is the nation's third-largest burner of coal.

Exxon Mobil Corp., the highest-profile corporate skeptic about global warming, said in September that it was considering ending its funding of a think tank that has sought to cast doubts on climate change. And on Nov. 2, the company announced that it will contribute more than $1.25 million to a European Union study on how to store carbon dioxide in natural gas fields in the Norwegian North Sea, Algeria and Germany.

These changes come as Democratic leaders prepare to take over key committees on Capitol Hill. Sen. Barbara Boxer (Calif.), who calls global warming "the greatest challenge of our generation," will take the place of Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) as chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. Inhofe refers to global warming as a "hoax."

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), the incoming Energy and Natural Resources Committee chairman, said he hopes to "do something on global warming." Even though the Bush administration's expected opposition might make the enactment of legislation unlikely in the next two years, many companies cannot put off decisions about what sort of power plants to build.

Duke Energy, for example, has not added significant power generation in two decades, and customer demand is rising 1 to 2 percent a year. The company has included a price for the carbon emitted in its cost estimates for a new coal-fired generating plant proposed for Indiana.

"If we had our druthers, we'd already have carbon legislation passed," said John L. Stowell, Duke Energy's vice president for environmental policy. "Our viewpoint is that it's going to happen. There's scientific evidence of climate change. We'd like to know what legislation will be put together so that, when we figure out how to increase our load, we know exactly what to expect."

One reason companies are turning to Congress is to avert the multiplicity of regulations being drafted by various state governments. The Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative, a group of seven Northeastern states, is moving ahead with a proposed system that would set a ceiling on greenhouse gas emissions, issue allowances to companies, and allow firms to trade those allowances to comply with regulations.

California is drawing up its program. Other states are also contemplating limits. Even the city of Boulder, Colo., has adopted its own plan -- a carbon tax based on electricity use.

"We cannot deal with 50 different policies," said Shell's Hofmeister. "We need a national approach to greenhouse gases."

Next week, the Supreme Court will hear arguments on whether the federal government is obligated to regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant; its decision could force the government to come up with guidelines.

Though many energy firms had already voiced support in recent months for federal regulations limiting greenhouse gas emissions, the coming changeover in Congress has intensified the discussions.

"There have been many more folks wanting to engage on the detailed architecture of climate-change legislation," said Jason S. Grumet, executive director of the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy. "The tenor, tone and the detail of discussions has changed in the last couple of months. Nobody's going to want to be the last company to come before the Congress and say, 'I've been opposing you for five years, but now can I have my piece?' "

Some businesses are making new hires based on the assumption that legislative activity on global warming will increase in the coming months. Truman Semans, director of markets and business strategy for the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, said at least half a dozen of the companies that belong to the center's Business Environmental Leadership Council have recently hired staff members focused on global warming.

Not every energy company is planning to curb greenhouse gas emissions in the near future. TXU Corp. is planning to spend $10 billion to build 11 new coal-fired power plants, which would more than double the company's carbon dioxide emissions, from 55 million tons to 133 million tons a year. That increase in emissions is more than the total carbon dioxide pollution emitted in all of Maryland or by 10 million Cadillac Escalade sport-utility vehicles.

In an e-mail to The Washington Post, TXU spokeswoman Kimberly Morgan said that the company supports "a comprehensive, voluntary, technology-based approach to global climate change based on carbon intensity" that is both "flexible and cost effective."

"We are at a point in time where other states and businesses are starting to take global warming seriously," said Colin Rowan, spokesman for the advocacy group Environmental Defense. "California is heading toward the future, and TXU and Texas are sprinting full speed back to the 1950s."

The company's approach may pay off in the short term, but it may not last. "Over the next two years I don't think environmental policy is going to change radically," said Carl Pope, executive director of the advocacy group Sierra Club. But he added, "I think the environmental agenda and conversation will change radically."

Corporate America wants to be part of that conversation. Duke Energy's Stowell said: "Industry is coming together and saying, 'Okay, if we're going to do this, let's do this in a way that won't wreck the economy.' "

Taming King Coal (NYT)

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

The front page of this newspaper's business section recently featured two articles about the world's most plentiful fuel, coal. Written from different parts of the globe, they framed the magnitude of the task confronting international negotiators and the newly empowered Democrats in Congress who want to put the brakes on emissions of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas.

One article pointed out that China will surpass the United States as the world's largest emitter of carbon dioxide by 2009, a decade ahead of previous predictions. A big reason is the explosion in the number of automobiles, but the main reason is China's ravenous appetite for coal, the dirtiest of all the fuels used to produce electricity. Already, China uses more coal than the United States, the European Union and Japan combined. Every week to 10 days, another coal-fired power plant opens somewhere in China, with enough capacity to serve all the households in Dallas or San Diego.

What's frightening about this for those worried about the long-term consequences of warming is that nearly all of these plants are being built along traditional lines, burning pulverized coal to make electricity. And what's sad about it is that there's a much cleaner coal-burning technology available. Known as I.G.C.C. — for integrated gasification combined cycle — this cleaner technology coverts coal into a gas before it is burned.

These plants produce fewer of the pollutants that cause smog and acid rain than conventional power plants do. More important, from a global warming perspective, they also have the potential to capture and sequester greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide before they enter the atmosphere.

This new technology is not readily available in China, but it is available to utilities in the United States. Which brings us to the second article — an announcement by TXU, a giant Texas energy company, that it intends to build 11 new coal-fired power plants in Texas, plus another dozen or so coal-fired monsters elsewhere in the country. All told, this would be the nation's largest single coal-oriented construction campaign in years.

Is TXU availing itself of the cleaner technology? No. TXU will use the old pulverized coal model. The company says the older models are more reliable. But the real reason it likes the older models is that they are easier to build, cheaper to run and, ultimately, much more profitable. So, like the Chinese, TXU is locking itself (and the country) into at least 50 more years of the most carbon-intensive technology around.

Barbara Boxer, the California Democrat who will shortly assume command of the Senate environment committee, believes that we should impose a price on carbon emissions (as Europe has done) so that companies like TXU will begin to think about investing in cleaner technologies — technologies that China could then use in its power plants. The message from both Texas and China is that Ms. Boxer should get cracking.

Justice Department Files Motion For Alcoa (ELGC)

Elgin (TX) Courier, November 25, 2006

The Justice Department on the EPA's behalf, filed a motion in US District Court in Austin seeking to resolve issues related to a Consent Decree entered into by Alcoa, the U. S. Government and Citizens groups in 2003, concerning alleged violations in the operation of Alcoa's generating units, reported Jim Hodson, Public Affairs and Environmental Manager of Alcoa.

TXU is proposing to build a new, 630 megawatt (MW) power plant -- Sandow 5. A ruling is expected within a few weeks which if approved will add TXU to the Consent Decree and keep the project moving forward.

The court is being asked to approve a stipulated order that includes:

DOJ_NMG_0098593

--A payment of $859,000 to resolve Alcoa's anticipated failure to begin operation of Sandow 5 by the April 25, 2007 deadline.

--Alcoa's Sandow Units 1-3 would be shut down by December 31, 2006, roughly 4 months earlier than the original consent decree.

--A commitment by Alcoa and TXU to begin operation of Sandow 5 with full emission controls by August 31, 2009.

--A commitment by Alcoa and TXU to strive for a Sandow 5 emission rate for nitrogen oxides 20 percent lower than the rate currently provided for in the consent decree.

--TXU would be added as a party to the Consent Decree

--And a commitment by TXU to install selective catalytic reduction system to substantially reduce nitrogen oxide emissions from Sandow Unit 4.

Alcoa and TXU have agreed to the motion as filed.

The proposed new unit will be a clean coal technology, circulating fluidized bed boiler. This power plant will help insure affordable, reliable power to the TXU system and will help keep Alcoa's Rockdale operations fully operational. The new unit will be located at Alcoa's Rockdale plant.

Sandow 5 will cost about $900 million and would be built over a 3 to 4 year timeframe. The total economic impact of the plant would exceed hundreds of millions over the life of the project through payrolls, property taxes and value of required local products and services. The proposed plant would employ more than 1,000 workers during construction, as well as permanent operating jobs, and will produce enough energy to serve about 200,000 Texas homes.

The motion filed by the government is the outcome of prolonged negotiations but is a workable compromise and Alcoa and TXU are hopeful that the court will approve it. The project has been well supported by the local community.

This project is good for the environment because of the reductions in emissions, said Hodson. It is good for the local economy and taxing authorities because of the additional new assets, construction expenditures, and permanent operating and maintenance jobs.

Hodson continued, it is good for Alcoa because it helps keep the location operating at full capacity, providing high paying employment for more than 1,100 employees, maintaining taxing revenues for local entities and supporting hundreds of suppliers, contractors and consultants. It is good for TXU because it helps to resolve the state's energy reliability issues, Hodson added.

Groups Upset By Claim In Clean Air Suit (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - A prominent member of the Supreme Court bar, the small circle of lawyers who regularly appear before the justices, infuriated environmental groups by presenting an argument the groups say is demonstrably incorrect.

The claim a month ago by Washington attorney Carter Phillips that the federal government had changed course in regulating emissions from coal-fired power plants is simply not true and a paper trail of the industry's own documents proves it, the groups say.

The case, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy Corp., could determine the fate of an Environmental Protection Agency initiative targeting some of the biggest utilities in the nation. Phillips, representing Duke, is managing partner at the Washington office of the law firm Sidley Austin and has argued more than 50 cases at the Supreme Court.

"These companies are bent on getting away with 20 years of illegal pollution by trying to deceive the Supreme Court," said Natural Resources Defense Council clean air director John Walke, who is a former EPA attorney.

Utility industry attorney Scott Segal jumped to Phillips' defense, saying that "for these environmental groups to go after one of the best lawyers in the country is a travesty. Phillips leads a legal dream team with a spotless record." Segal, a partner at the law firm Bracewell & Giuliani, was responding to a list of questions a reporter sent to Phillips' office at Sidley Austin. With the case pending before the Supreme Court, Phillips did not respond.

The government enforcement action against Duke is one of more than a dozen brought by the Clinton administration in 1999 and 2000.

It is aimed at forcing power companies to install the latest pollution-control equipment on aging coal-fired plants which were renovated so they could be operated longer hours.

On Nov. 1, Phillips told the justices: "Our basic argument is that all along" EPA interpreted the regulatory requirements "in a certain way. And then 19 years later, they reversed course" and suddenly sued the companies.

The environmental groups say internal industry documents clearly show that Duke understood long ago that EPA was interpreting the requirements in the same way it did in 1999 when the government went to court. Some of the documents are part of the record before the Supreme Court and all were brought to light in lawsuits against Duke and other utilities.

Among the documents, according to a Justice Department court filing, are 10 memos from an industry trade association spelling out the EPA's position for Duke starting in the late 1980s. It was the same regulatory approach EPA took a decade later when it sued the company. The Justice Department document was filed publicly in 2003, but at Duke's request it was put under seal, barred from public view.

The day after the Supreme Court argument, the Natural Resources Defense Council provided journalists with copies of industry documents the environmental groups say contradict the tack taken by Duke's lawyer before the high court.

One of them is a Duke company training guide on environmental compliance from 1991 that appears to characterize the EPA's approach in the same way the federal agency did nine years later when it sued Duke.

George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley reviewed some of the industry files and said, "I find the statements Phillips made hard to square with these documents."

Turley said the complexity of the case makes it easy to suggest uncertainty or confusion, and that "Phillips' comments in court are more likely to be treated as attorneys gilding the lily for their client" rather than attempting to mislead.

The dispute between the utilities and the environmental groups and Justice Department lawyers is whether emissions increases should be measured on an annual basis or under a two-part test.

The industry says EPA regulations always have required an hourly rate increase in emissions before measuring for annual increases. Such an approach would enable the companies to run their revamped coal-fired plants without having to install additional pollution controls, as long as the hourly emissions rate doesn't rise. Pollution would rise significantly, however, because of the longer hours of operation. In his arguments to the justices, Phillips pointed to two EPA officials who in the early 1980s appeared to interpret the rules in the way industry favors.

The EPA and environmental groups say the regulations call for calculating emissions increases annually, which would force the installation of costly pollution controls on plants because of their longer hours of operation. One document environmentalists point to is a 1988 memo by an attorney representing Duke in the Supreme Court case. The document specifies an annual test "instead of" an hourly test.

But Segal, representing the industry, says focusing on that language in the 42-page document "mischaracterizes the memo." The company documents "all assume that you've already cleared the first hurdle of an hourly rate increase, so it's not surprising that the documents sometimes refer to an annual test."

"That's ridiculous," responded Keri Powell, a staff attorney with the not-for-profit environmental law firm Earthjustice.

It was "depressing to listen to Duke's attorney present a sob story to the Supreme Court about how the power companies had no idea that EPA would interpret its rules the way it did in 1999, when the power companies' own documents from years before so clearly show otherwise," Powell said.

Duke spokesman Thomas Williams said the environmentalists' criticism is "an after-the-fact, made-for-litigation theory that was correctly rejected by the lower courts."

Jolley Found Guilty On Multiple Drug And Weapons (CASPT)

By Tom Morton, Star-Tribune staff writer

Casper (WY) Tribune, November 23, 2006

A Casper man who led police on a door-to-door search in a Sunrise subdivision in January was found guilty on multiple drug and weapons charges in federal court in Cheyenne on Wednesday.

Armour Lyle Jolley, 32, faces at least 135 years and not more than 180 years of federal imprisonment, according to the second of two indictments filed this year.

He also could be punished with a fine up to $9,250,000, according to the second indictment.

The eight-day, 12-member jury trial began on Nov. 13 before U.S. District Court Judge Clarence Brimmer.

On the first day of the trial, Jolley pleaded guilty to the indictment filed Jan. 24 with the single count of being a felon in possession of a firearm, Justice Department spokesman John Powell said.

The conviction on Wednesday was on all 14 counts of the second indictment filed on July 19:

-- One count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and to distribute, methamphetamine.

-- Three counts of distribution of methamphetamine.

-- One count of possession with intent to distribute methamphetamine.

-- Two counts of being a felon in possession of a firearm.

-- One count of being an unlawful user of a controlled substance in possession of a firearm.

-- Three counts of possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking offense.
-- Two counts of use of a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking offense.
-- One count of carrying a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking offense.

The July 19 indictment outlines his drug and weapons violations starting in April 2005.

Two of those counts were related to a time between July and August 2005 when Jolley discharged a firearm at a person's residence to intimidate him into paying a drug debt; and another time when he drove a person to an area near the Casper Events Center and discharged a firearm to intimidate that person to pay a drug debt.

Powell said the court has ordered a presentence investigation for Jolley -- a process that could take up to 60 days -- and then it will set a sentencing date.

Neither prosecutor Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Phillips nor Jolley's defense attorney, Timothy Kingston, could be reached for comment.

In the Casper area, Jolley has had a long criminal history, including a felony when he pleaded in 2004 to a fourth charge of driving intoxicated.

On Jan. 6, 2006, Casper and Mills police officers attempted to arrest Jolley on a warrant after he failed to appear in court, according to court records.

He fled police and a massive manhunt ensued with armed members of the Special Response Team conducting a door-to-door search of a Sunrise subdivision. Police canine units and the Wyoming Medical Center's LifeFlight helicopter assisted in the search, which ended when police spotted Jolley riding in a passenger car.

Jolley was carrying a semi-automatic handgun in an ankle holster when he was arrested.

In August, Jolley attempted to escape the Platte County Jail, where he was being held on the federal charges, according to Platte County Attorney Eric Alden.

Jolley is the son of the late John Jolley, who unsuccessfully ran on the Democratic ballot against Republican Rep. Carolyn Paseneaux for House District 36 in 2000.

IMMIGRATION:

Civil Jury Fines Rancher In Illegal-alien Dispute (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

An Arizona rancher who has waged a five-year campaign to stop a flood of illegal aliens from crossing his property has been ordered by a civil jury to pay nearly $100,000 for a 2004 incident during which he confronted a family hunting on his land.

Roger Barnett, 62, who began rounding up illegal aliens after he said they destroyed his property, killed calves and broke into his home, was ordered to pay Ronald Morales, his father, his two young daughters and their friend on claims of negligence, false imprisonment and emotional distress.

The jury found in favor of all five plaintiffs, but split responsibility between Mr. Barnett, Mr. Morales and his father, Arturo Morales.

The Morales family had sought $210,000 damages in a lawsuit sponsored by two civil rights groups, the Border Action Network and the Southern Poverty Law Center, which accused Mr. Barnett of vigilantism and abusing the illegal aliens he detained. The jury settled on a damage award of $98,000.

"This is an historic moment," said Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network. "This victory is just the beginning. We can guarantee that every official who tried to sweep this case and issue under the rug and who still has the capacity of bringing criminal charges will hear from us."

Two other lawsuits brought against Mr. Barnett with the assistance of the Border Action Network were dismissed. A lawsuit filed by the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund is pending, naming Mr. Barnett, his wife and brother, and Cochise County Sheriff Larry Dever, in a conspiracy to violate the rights of illegal aliens.

During the Morales trial, Mr. Barnett denied threatening the party, testifying that he only took out his AR-15 rifle because the adults in the group were carrying rifles. He also denied accusations by Ronald Morales that he had insulted them with racial slurs and threatened to shoot them.

Mr. Barnett's brother, Donald, said in a statement: "In the Morales family, the father taught the son to trespass, and now the father's teaching the daughters how to trespass in blatant disregard for the law. I guess in this country, private property and a person's rights don't mean much any more."

Donald Barnett had been named in the lawsuit, but later was dropped as a defendant.

Mr. Barnett's Cross Rail Ranch near Douglas, Ariz., has become a major route for northbound illegal aliens. The ranch sits in what Cochise County law enforcement authorities have called "the avenue of choice" for illegal aliens.

"Thousands of aliens have crossed my property," Mr. Barnett told The Washington Times in a September 2002 interview at his ranch. "There are so many that I can tell you that at times it looks like a slow-motion invasion."

Mr. Barnett said some of his cattle have died from ingesting plastic bottles left behind by the aliens and that some of the ranch's trails were littered with trash nearly a foot deep.

A former Cochise County sheriff's deputy who later was successful in the towing and propane business, Mr. Barnett spent $30,000 on electronic sensors, hidden along established trails on his ranch. He searches the ranch for illegal aliens in a pickup truck, dressed in a green shirt and camouflage hat, with his handgun and rifle, high-powered binoculars and a walkie-talkie to communicate.

His actions have made him a target of alien and drug smugglers in Mexico. Law-enforcement authorities told him the smugglers had placed a bounty on his head.

"This is my land. I'm the victim here," Mr. Barnett said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Split On Ethics Enforcement (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Democrats are promising big changes in lobbying rules to combat congressional corruption. But they're divided over whether to create an outside investigative office to review ethics complaints or leave enforcement to members.

"This is an area where there is an opportunity to make the rhetoric of self-reform of Congress real by having the guts to set up an independent office," Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, a longtime Democrat who was re-elected as an independent, said in an interview this past week.

Opponents say such an office would encroach on Congress's responsibility to police itself and could create an unnecessary and expensive bureaucracy. Many senators have resisted changing oversight rules since most congressional scandals this year involved House members.

Fred Wertheimer, founder of Democracy 21, a nonpartisan group that advocates for ethics overhauls, says that without "effective ethics enforcement, you don't have effective ethics rules."

He says congressional ethics committees themselves have sometimes eroded hard-fought overhauls. In 1995, the House passed a rule limiting lobbyists' gifts to less than $50. Later, the ethics committee valued a seat in a skybox at a sporting event at $49.

After winning control of Congress in midterm elections shaped in part by scandals and corruption charges against Republicans, Democratic leaders are discussing new ethics rules. They include bans on gifts and meals from lobbyists and lobbying organizations, and more frequent reports by lobbyists disclosing for whom and what they are working. In disclosure reports, which lobbyists currently are required to file with Congress at least once a year, they also spell out how much they have been paid for their efforts.

Former members who become registered lobbyists would be prohibited from seeking help on legislation from their congressional colleagues for two years and denied access to the House and Senate floors. Today, lawmakers-turned-lobbyists can mingle with their former colleagues inside the chambers during debates and votes.

The proposed packages in both the House and Senate would curtail, if not ban, travel paid for by lobbyists and organizations that lobby. House leaders say they would prohibit lawmakers from using corporate planes for official travel. Both chambers are expected to require members to identify hometown projects they insert into spending bills.

House and Senate leaders are mulling creating an office to monitor lobbyists' disclosure reports, or enhancing the powers of existing offices to take on that job.

But so far, neither the House nor the Senate proposal would allow independent scrutiny of the actions of lawmakers themselves. The job of investigating and disciplining them would remain in the Senate and House ethics committees.

Those committees have proved vulnerable to partisan political influences. The House ethics committee was nearly shut down for several years, in part due to an ethics-complaint truce between the two parties in the late 1990s. Later, House Republican leaders clamped down after the committee issued rebukes against former Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

DOJ_NMG_0098597

Mr. Lieberman co-sponsored a measure earlier this year with Maine Republican Sen. Susan Collins establishing an independent Office of Public Integrity that would vet Senate ethics complaints and conduct investigations of those it deemed serious. Under the proposal, the ethics committee would oversee the integrity office and could end a probe with a majority vote. The committee also would decide whether to impose penalties on a member.

It was defeated in a bipartisan landslide, 70-30. Among those opposing the office was incoming Democratic Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

In the interview, Mr. Lieberman said he is going to "make another run at it" and hopes that the strong anticorruption message from voters in the midterm elections "may have changed some minds."

Two advocates for ethics overhaul in the House -- Connecticut Republican Rep. Christopher Shays and Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Marty Meehan -- are considering reviving the same proposal in the House if incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, of California, doesn't include it in her ethics-overhaul agenda.

Ms. Pelosi earlier this year proposed enhancing the powers of Congress's inspector general's office to handle disclosure reports by lobbyists. But it didn't extend that office's jurisdiction to ethics allegations against members of Congress. Aides say she is now considering backing the idea of a stronger independent office.

In addition to enforcement, there is the question of how to treat privately funded travel for lawmakers. Both chambers are expected to ban trips paid for by lobbyists and lobbying organizations.

The tougher question is how to deal with groups that have both lobbying and advocacy missions -- with each part organized independently and registered under separate sections of the tax code. Broadly speaking, advocacy work involves shaping policy on issues; lobbying is seeking lawmakers' votes on legislation affecting a particular business interest.

Among groups that handle both lobbying and advocacy are the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Sierra Club and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Opponents of a total ban, including major business trade groups, argue that trips are important for educating members of Congress about issues.

Critics say anything short of a total ban would give lobbyists a loophole to exploit. They note that Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist convicted of trying to bribe lawmakers, used what appeared to be charitable organizations to funnel his clients' money to finance a golf trip to Scotland. That became a focus in the Department of Justice investigation of his activities.

"If it's important for a member of the Ways and Means Committee to go outside of his district to look at tax policy in Hawaii, that's fine. It should be paid for with official funds. If not, they should pay for travel like the rest of us," said Meredith McGehee, policy director for the Campaign Legal Center, a nonpartisan watchdog.

House Democrats plan debates and votes on critical planks in their ethics package -- including rules banning lobbyist-financed meals and gifts -- as soon as they take control in January.

Hoyer Hit On Lobbyists' Contributions (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

House Democrats put lobbying reform near the top of their agenda, but their incoming majority leader was one of the biggest recipients of special-interest money.

A new report states that Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, was the "most dependent" on special-interest funding and received the fifth-highest total in lobbying contributions among members of Congress.

According to public financing records, Mr. Hoyer has received $609,836 from lobbyists, $2.46 million from out-of-state donors and $5.67 million in political action committee contributions since 2000.

"Much of the reason he's at the top of the list is because he's in leadership," said Craig Holman, legislative director of Public Citizen, a government watchdog organization that produced the report. "It does not necessarily mean he'll be reluctant to support lobbying reform."

Mr. Hoyer's congressional office was closed for Thanksgiving and was unavailable to comment. But in an interview last week with the liberal Web site Talking Points Memo, Mr. Hoyer was asked if he would support the Democrats' lobbying-reform agenda.

"One of the first things we're going to do is adopt lobbying reform," Mr. Hoyer said. "We are going to adopt rules that make the system of legislation transparent so that we don't legislate in the dark of night, and the public and other members can see what is being done."

Mr. Hoyer also said he would support further restrictions on lobbying and legislation aimed at curbing so-called "earmarks," which are expenditures anonymously attached to larger spending bills.

DOJ_NMG_0098598

Some liberal organizations have criticized Mr. Hoyer for his votes on lobbying-related measures. He previously has voted against bills that would place Internet political communications under the same campaign-finance restrictions as regular television and radio ads.

In addition, Mr. Hoyer voted against a measure that would require 527 political organizations, which are currently able to raise unlimited amounts of money, from falling under the same regulations.

"Steny Hoyer realizes that Democrats are in power because Americans are upset with issues of corruption in Congress," Mr. Holman said. "We fully expect Hoyer to be an ally."

Public Citizen says it has been actively working with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi's office to advocate lobbying-reform legislation. Although Mr. Holman says his organization has received a large degree of cooperation from the California Democrat's office, his group is not being granted all of its requests, which include a total ban on lobbyist campaign contributions.

Mrs. Pelosi had nominated Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, for the House majority leader position. Mr. Murtha lost that race.

Many analysts say Mr. Murtha's defeat was a result in part of his own troubles on ethics issues stemming from his involvement as a unindicted co-conspirator in the FBI's Abscam bribery investigation in the 1970s and '80s.

Pelosi's Ascendancy In House Puts A Close Liberal Ally In The Spotlight (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22 — In a friendship stretching over 30 years and many plane trips to Washington from their neighboring California districts, Representatives Nancy Pelosi and George Miller have become so close that, as colleagues say, they finish each others' sentences.

So it was not surprising that, when Mrs. Pelosi faced the first test of her role as speaker-elect of the House of Representatives, Mr. Miller was in the background, pushing her to back Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania to replace her as Democratic leader over the more centrist candidate, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who had been her No. 2 for four years.

In the week since Mr. Hoyer won the position, Democratic leaders have played down any disharmony created by the leadership struggle. But Mr. Miller's role raised fears that after carefully nudging her party to the center, which many say helped the Democrats retake the majority, Mrs. Pelosi would let her liberal allies have too much influence.

In the concerns of some Democrats — and the I-told-you-so's of some Republicans — Mr. Miller represents Mrs. Pelosi's true liberal soul, and his pushing for Mr. Murtha a sign that the far left would dominate and destabilize the Democrats, after they have emerged from 12 years in the minority.

There is no doubt that Mr. Miller remains one of Mrs. Pelosi's most trusted advisers. But those who know them both say that he, and his influence, have been wrongly judged.

Now one of the 10 most senior members of Congress, Mr. Miller has proven himself both a liberal lion — an early advocate of an increase in the minimum wage and a champion of the environment — and savvy about working both sides of the aisle. An agitator for higher teacher standards, he was one of the chief negotiators with President Bush on the No Child Left Behind legislation. (Mr. Bush nicknamed Mr. Miller, a burly and now white-haired former high school football player, Big George.)

After Hurricane Katrina, he enlisted Republicans to reverse Mr. Bush's order that allowed federal contractors working to rebuild the Gulf Coast to pay workers less than the prevailing local wage.

"He is liberal, and that pragmatism is always difficult to achieve when you're passionate about something," said Representative Ellen O. Tauscher, Democrat of California and a leader of the party's more moderate wing in the House.

But, Ms. Tauscher said, Mr. Miller understands what she calls the "very difficult kabuki dance" facing Democrats.

Party members have gritted their teeth for 12 years, she said. And now, "on a napkin, on the back of an envelope, in their BlackBerry, they've got lists of what they want to do, and they think their priorities are everybody's priorities."

"But in the end, this is about securing a majority for more than two years," she said. "I don't expect him to be thrilled about it. But I think he's sanguine; he's pragmatic and realistic."

Mrs. Pelosi, 66, and Mr. Miller, 61, share similar pedigrees. Her father was a Baltimore mayor and congressman; his father served 25 years in the California legislature. When the elder Mr. Miller died in his 50s, his son ran for his seat and lost.

Five years later, after law school, Mr. Miller ran for Congress from a largely working-class district east of San Francisco and won. He arrived in 1975 as one of the Watergate babies, the idealistic Democrats elected on a reform platform.

Mrs. Pelosi, meanwhile, rose through California politics and became chairwoman of the state Democratic Party. She would later take the Congressional seat that had been held by Phillip Burton, who was Mr. Miller's mentor.

Mr. Burton advised Mr. Miller to pick a committee and stay on it; this, he said, was how Southern Democrats had amassed power. Mr. Miller listened, staying on the House Interior and Education committees, becoming chairman of Interior (now named House Resources) in 1991. (Mrs. Pelosi congratulated him with a gift of Mr. Burton's chair and a small model of a Burton statue that had been placed in San Francisco.) He has been the senior Democrat on the education committee since 2001 and is expected to become its chairman in January.

He is also known more informally as the dean of the town house on Capitol Hill that has served as a kind of fraternity house for a succession of Democrats. Mr. Miller lived there with his family before they moved back to California; his roommates now are Senators Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and Charles E. Schumer of New York, the second- and third-ranking Democrats, and Representative Bill Delahunt of Massachusetts. In long-running Tuesday dinners with a group that included Mrs. Pelosi and other now-senior Democrats, it was Mr. Miller, other members say, who was the first to declare that Mrs. Pelosi would become the nation's first female speaker.

Mrs. Pelosi calls him "a valued friend and tremendously talented legislator."

As chairman of the Democrats' steering and policy committee, he helped shape the platform the Democrats ran on in the midterm elections — including raising the minimum wage, cutting interest rates on student loans and expanding stem cell research.

"He has guided Democrats' policy agenda that unified the caucus and spoke to the dreams and aspirations of the American people," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Some who know both lawmakers say that Mr. Miller's counsel continues to be important to her. "Not only can George give her good advice, but he can also tell her things she doesn't want to hear," Ms. Tauscher said. "Sometimes you can only take tough news from somebody that is very close to you."

But others say that if the relationship was once defined as one of complete trust, it is now more like trust, but verify.

Mr. Miller says his influence over Mrs. Pelosi has always been overstated, showing a misunderstanding of her talent and strength. He calls her "the toughest person you've met in politics."

He backed Mr. Murtha, he said, because he was impressed by his turnaround on the war in Iraq.

"To watch this man take his knowledge, his career, his experience in the military and to see him start to understand the damage that was being done to the soldiers and the institution, was really quite remarkable," Mr. Miller said.

"When he decided to go public, which is not generally his character," Mr. Miller said of Mr. Murtha, "he immediately changed the national debate. And then when you saw the role the debate on the war took during the campaign, I think there is a serious debt of gratitude. You were saying back to the voters, 'We heard you.' "

But the other message from voters, he said, is that they want Congress to work in a bipartisan manner, after years of Republican rule.

"There was a conscious decision by Tom DeLay and Dennis Hastert to turn the House into a winner-take-all," he said, where no legislation would be brought for a vote without most of the majority supporting it.

Having seen that, he said, he understands the role Mrs. Pelosi must assume.

"The speaker made a horrible miscalculation that he was the speaker of the Republican Party as opposed to the difference Nancy has drawn, that Tip O'Neill drew — that you are the leader of the Democrats, and speaker of the House," he said. "That simple understanding can allow a lot of things to happen that provide opportunities for the minority to participate."

The Struggle Within (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

Can the Democratic Party become fully competitive? Is American liberalism dead, the 2006 election a last twitch of life before rigor mortis sets in? The answer to both questions is yes. (More on this next week.)

For the Democratic Party to revive, major tenets of American liberalism, economic and sociocultural, will have to be discarded. The party can join Studebaker and the Glass Bottle Blowers union, it can trudge along as No. 2, or it can undergo a painful transformation — without guarantee of success.

To stay in the fight, Democratic leaders will have to acknowledge political realities affirmed by the electorate in 1994 and 2006. Many Democratic constituencies — organized labor, minority advocacy organizations, reproductive- and sexual-rights proponents — are reliving battles of a decade or more ago, not the more subtle disputes of today. Public sector unions, for example, at a time of wide distrust of government, are consistently pressing to enlarge the state. For these players, adapting to a re-emergent center will be costly.

Democrats won on Nov. 7 by carrying a 59 percent majority of independent, moderate voters angered by the Iraq war and Republican corruption. These voters demonstrated 12 years ago that they can easily turn against Democrats.

An example of the reality that Democrats refused to face the last time they had a shot at consolidating power materialized during the fight to pass Clinton's 1994 Omnibus Crime Bill, legislation that sought to burnish the party's justice credentials by increasing the number of felonies subject to the death penalty. Instead, amendments added to win support from the left — most visibly, $40 million for midnight basketball leagues — caught fire on conservative talk radio, spread to the establishment media, and soon became a liability.

When Democrats bend to the will of liberal interest groups, even in pursuit of laudable goals, the damage to the party's credibility can be devastating. President Clinton succumbed to such pressure, and Democrats in the House and Senate paid the price. Democrats now have a chance to regain public trust, but even a minor miscalculation can push the party off the tightrope. Its House majority is tenuous: 17 of the new Democrats represent districts that voted for Bush in 2004 by at least 54 percent, according to the political scientist Gary Jacobson.

The public will desert Democrats placing a disputed cultural or spending agenda above the broader public interest. This is especially true at a time of extreme uncertainty: lethal struggle in the Mideast, nuclear proliferation, mounting skepticism toward free trade, and a rising non-marital birthrate — now at 37 percent — that concerns moderate voters.

The potential for an incendiary controversy to engulf the Democratic left has sharply escalated with Web access to each committee and floor vote under new Congressional transparency rules, and the development of aggressively partisan outlets in the blogosphere. An army of conservative media is determined to recreate the political climate so advantageous to the G.O.P. in 1994. At the same time, very liberal senior House Democrats now have vastly enhanced power to add inflammatory provisions to bills moving through their committees (think Rangel and the draft).

Nancy Pelosi and her closest advisers in the House are more likely to support such radioactive amendments than to serve as guard dogs protecting a slender Democratic majority. The first test of Pelosi's ability to distinguish between broad-based and special interests will be when she decides whether to appoint Alcee Hastings, the once-impeached federal judge, to head the House Intelligence Committee.

Only two members of the House leadership are intuitively attuned to such problems: Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic caucus, and Steny Hoyer, the majority leader. But Emanuel has limited influence, and relations between Pelosi and Hoyer are distant at best.

Still, the vigilance of Hoyer and Emanuel will be crucial to a party whose renewal could easily be stillborn. Congressional leaders are not all-powerful, but they can set the stage for a successful presidential candidate, or lay waste to the center-left, dooming the nominee.

The Democratic Party can secure its 2006 gains, but to do so will require abandoning a decades-long willingness to indulge pressure groups on the left that no longer command broad popular allegiance.

Texas Universities Battle Each Other To Nab Bush Library (WSJ)

By Steve Levine

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

DALLAS -- The biggest college rivalry in Texas these days isn't only over football. It is the battle to score President Bush's presidential library.

Southern Methodist University, the University of Dallas and Baylor University are the three finalists to house Mr. Bush's presidential library. In efforts to snag the prize, they have bought up hundreds of acres of land, awarded honorary degrees to Bush family members, and even named a highway after the president. A decision by the George W. Bush Presidential Library Site Selection Committee is expected in December or January.

SMU -- which sits in an affluent enclave a few miles north of downtown Dallas -- is the betting favorite. It is Laura Bush's alma mater, she serves on its board of trustees, and the Bushes' church, United Methodist Church, is next to the college. But the University of Dallas and Baylor have fought back with lavish proposals that pay homage to themes of the Bush presidency.

"This is a high-stakes game, and everyone understands that," said Tommye Lou Davis, who is overseeing Baylor's library initiative.

There currently are 11 official presidential libraries. Though some are more popular than others, they hold the potential to bring hundreds of millions of dollars in local tourism and development. Little Rock, Ark., officials, for example, say the two-year-old Clinton Presidential Library has thus far attracted some $1 billion in fresh downtown construction and roughly 800,000 visitors.

Mr. Bush has appointed some of his closest intimates to vet and shape his library. The effort is led by Donald L. Evans, Mr. Bush's friend and former commerce secretary, and also includes Karl Rove, his top political adviser, brother Marvin Bush and White House counsel Harriet Miers, the former Supreme Court candidate.

Mr. Evans has kept much of the process secret and asked the competing universities to do the same, officials of the schools say. But in a letter sent in summer 2005 to all candidates, Mr. Evans and Marvin Bush said the library would seek to adopt the president's signature themes of "compassionate conservatism, the spread of freedom and democracy throughout the world, and defeating terrorism."

The library, along with a public policy center that Mr. Bush wants to include, will cost more than $200 million -- funds raised from private contributors. That is at least 20% more than the $165 million, 28-acre Clinton Library, which opened in 2004.

In 2001, Mr. Bush signed an executive order that can significantly restrict scholars' access to all presidents' papers, and some Democratic critics have made hay over the library effort. "Whoever designs his library, don't make the parking lot too big," wrote humorist Garrison Keillor in his latest book, "Homegrown Democrat."

Laura Bush has helped fuel SMU's front-runner status by saying that the couple will have a post-presidential home in Dallas, and telling the Houston Chronicle that the university is her sentimental favorite. SMU has granted an honorary doctorate to former President Bush.

SMU is among Texas' most prestigious colleges. It is also in the middle of a densely built neighborhood. Though SMU is tight-lipped about its library plans, it has been acquiring land that is widely believed to be for the library site. Dallas oil man Ray Hunt, a big Bush contributor, recently gave the school $35 million that allowed it to buy a shopping center that might be part of the presidential library site.

The school, whose officials have declined to comment on any specific plans, ran into a snag when one property owner refused to sell his four condos to the university. Gary Vodicka, an SMU graduate, has filed suit in Dallas federal court claiming that SMU's $450,000 offer for his units is inadequate. They sit on a 12.5-acre area near SMU that is presumed to be one of the sites proposed by the school to the Bush committee.

SMU's land issues have left an opening for the lesser-known University of Dallas, which is pushing its own, 300-acre site with a view of downtown Dallas. Plans are already drafted for a "Bush Presidential Library and School of Democracy" and a "Liberty Mall."

Situated in the suburb of Irving, on Dallas's western side, the Catholic school was able to recruit longtime Bush supporter Nancy Cain Marcus as a key advocate. In 2001, Mr. Bush gave Mrs. Marcus the plum appointment as an alternate representative to the United Nations. Last September, she accompanied the University of Dallas's president to Washington to present the school's proposal at the Mayflower Hotel.

Dallas Mayor Laura Miller is trying to find a compromise that will satisfy all her constituents. She advocates locating the library at the University of Dallas, but affiliating it with both Dallas-area schools. "The proposed SMU site is cramped, and the campus, though pretty, is already a traffic nightmare, even without a heavily visited presidential library in its midst," Ms. Miller says.

Though details of such a plan are still vague, the University of Dallas would seriously explore the Miller idea, says university President Frank Lazarus. Brad Cheves, SMU's vice president for development, says the school hasn't considered the plan.

Then there is Baylor. The Baptist institution is situated in the city of Waco, about two hours south of Dallas. A century ago it was more important financially than Dallas because of its cotton-industry and railroad connections. But the central Texas city of 120,000 people often seems to be answering for long-ago calamities.

In June, the city council condemned a series of lynchings in the city and the area in the 19th- and 20th-centuries. Waco's shuttered-up downtown has yet to recover from a 1953 tornado. And some outsiders still call the city "Wacko" because of the 1993 deaths of 76 people in a standoff just outside town between FBI agents and members of the Branch Davidian religious sect.

The local thinking is that Waco could shed those ugly images should Baylor win. "This is a community of historically low self-esteem....There is a sense that this is something Waco could win," says Carlos Sanchez, editor of the Waco Tribune-Herald, which has been beating the drum for the library.

Former Baylor President Robert Sloan started lobbying for the library even before Mr. Bush announced his presidential candidacy in 1998. The entire city establishment since has joined the cause. Baylor has presented honorary doctorates to Mr. Bush and his mother, Barbara Bush. In 1998, the school gave a high university decoration called the alumna honoris causa to Laura Bush. "At a cynical level, that can come off negatively," says Mr. Sloan. "But you want people to see the university."

Mr. Sloan, meanwhile, got Baylor graduate Drayton McLain Jr. -- owner of the Houston Astros baseball team and a close friend of Mr. Bush -- to chair the effort. The city and business community of Waco got behind it, too. Waco renamed a local strip of U.S. 84 Interstate the "George W. Bush Thoroughfare." And a local businessman, Clifton Robinson, offered up a low-interest $6 million loan toward a riverfront four-star hotel for visitors.

DOJ_NMG_0098602

Even Bernard Rapoport, the city's leading Democratic Party activist, is excited at the prospect of the library. He says it could "raise the level of thinking of our community by bringing in notables and speakers." Mr. Rapoport, who has a 4,000-volume library at home, says a presidential library is something that transcends partisan lines. "What a library does is tell you that there's no excuse for being ordinary."

Gates Pushed For Bombing Of Sandinistas (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

His 1984 memo called for 'hard measures' against Nicaragua.

WASHINGTON — Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to lead the Pentagon, advocated a bombing campaign against Nicaragua in 1984 in order to "bring down" the leftist government, according to a declassified memo released by a nonprofit research group.

The memo from Gates to his then-boss, CIA Director William J. Casey, was among a selection of declassified documents from the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal posted Friday on the website of the National Security Archive, http://www.gwu.edu/nsarchiv/ .

In the memo, Gates, who was deputy director of the CIA, argued that the Soviet Union was turning Nicaragua into an armed camp and that the country could become a second Cuba. The rise of the communist-leaning Sandinista government threatened the stability of Central America, Gates asserted.

Gates' memo echoed the view of many foreign policy hard-liners at the time; however, the feared communist takeover of the region never materialized.

"It seems to me," Gates wrote, "that the only way that we can prevent disaster in Central America is to acknowledge openly what some have argued privately: that the existence of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Nicaragua closely allied with the Soviet Union and Cuba is unacceptable to the United States and that the United States will do everything in its power short of invasion to put that regime out."

Gates predicted that without U.S. funding, the Nicaraguan anti-communist forces known as Contras would collapse within one or two years. But he said that providing "new funding" for the Contras was not good enough. Instead, he advocated that the United States withdraw diplomatic recognition of the Sandinista government, provide overt assistance to a government in exile, impose economic sanctions or a quarantine, and use airstrikes to destroy Nicaragua's "military buildup."

"It sounds like Donald Rumsfeld," said National Security Archive Director Thomas S. Blanton. "It shows the same kind of arrogance and hubris that got us into Iraq."

In the memo, Gates noted he was advocating "hard measures" that "probably are politically unacceptable."

Indeed, Blanton said, Gates' advocacy of military strikes against Nicaragua was extreme.

"It sure wasn't a mainstream opinion; most Americans thought we shouldn't be doing anything in Nicaragua," Blanton said. "How possibly was our national security interest at stake?"

Reached late Friday, Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said he was not familiar with the memo. Stanzel said Gates would not be available for comment because it was standard practice for nominees to reject interview requests before Senate confirmation hearings.

Blanton said it would be wrong to look at a 22-year-old memo as evidence of Gates' current thinking. Gates seems to have changed after his nomination for CIA director was withdrawn in 1987, Blanton said. When Gates became CIA director in 1991, he was chastened and his earlier "arrogance" diminished.

"People change," Blanton said. "And very possibly the Robert Gates nominated for secretary of Defense is the Robert Gates who is the best CIA director we ever had, and not the Robert Gates who was a 'mini-me' Rumsfeld."

The memo offers some insights into how Gates viewed historical lessons, at least in 1984.

Gates wrote that the United States wrongly thought in the late 1950s that it could encourage Castro to form a pluralistic government. And he said that in Vietnam the United States took a series of half measures that "enabled the enemy to adjust to each new turn of the screw" by the war's end, he said, the country was able to tolerate severe bombing campaigns.

"Half measures, halfheartedly applied, will have the same result in Nicaragua," Gates wrote.

It was probably the election of Daniel Ortega to the Nicaraguan presidency in November 1984 that prompted Gates to write his memo of Dec. 14, 1984.

Ortega was elected again to the presidency this year, although he now presents himself as a moderate.

In the memo, Gates concluded that the Contra rebels alone would not be able to overthrow the Sandinista regime, even with U.S. money.

DOJ_NMG_0098603

It was the Reagan administration's attempts to find ways to provide funding for the Nicaraguan rebels even after Congress forbade such support that led to the Iran-Contra scandal, a plan to use the proceeds of arms sales to Iran to fund the Contras.

The Iran-Contra affair erupted in the public spotlight 20 years ago. Gates' role in the scandal was investigated by Independent Counsel Lawrence E. Walsh and was the focus of confirmation hearings for Gates' 1987 nomination for CIA director.

Gates denied any wrongdoing in the scandal. Most of the debate over Gates' role centers on what he knew about the plan.

According to documents released by the National Security Archive and others, Gates seems to have known about Oliver North's attempts to raise money for the Contras, but opposed the idea and tried to keep the CIA out of it.

Critics have said Gates failed to make inquiries about the scandal that could have stopped the scheme from going forward.

Walsh concluded that Gates was "less than candid" but did not bring charges against him.

Gates' suggestions for Nicaragua policy were never adopted by the Reagan administration. And, on the whole, Gates' predictions in the 1984 memo didn't pan out.

Nicaragua did not become a communist dictatorship. The Sandinista regime did not lead to the fall of U.S.-backed governments in El Salvador, Honduras or Guatemala. Ortega and the Sandinistas were voted out of office in 1990. A year later the Soviet Union ceased to exist.

At CIA, Robert Gates Advocated Air Strikes Against Nicaragua In 1984, Documents Say (IHT/AP)

International Herald Tribune/AP, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON: In 1984, Robert Gates, then the No. 2 CIA official, advocated U.S. airstrikes against Nicaragua's pro-Cuban government to reverse what he described as an ineffective U.S. strategy to deal with communist advances in Central America, previously classified documents say.

Gates, President George W. Bush's nominee to be defense secretary, said the United States could no longer justify what he described as "halfhearted" attempts to contain Nicaragua's Sandinista government, according to documents released Friday by the National Security Archive, a private research group. .

In a memo to CIA Director William Casey dated Dec. 14, 1984, Gates said his proposed airstrikes would be designed "to destroy a considerable portion of Nicaragua's military buildup" and be focused on tanks and helicopters.

He also recommended that the United States prevent delivery to the Sandinistas of such weapons in the future. The administration, he said, should make clear that a U.S. invasion of the country was not contemplated.

Ironically, Gates' nomination to succeed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was announced just days after Ortega capped off a surprise political comeback by winning election as Nicaraguan president after three previous bids were rejected by the voters.

Ortega has recast himself as a moderate, assuring Nicaraguans that his Marxist-Leninist days are over.

Gates saw a calamitous situation in Central America in December 1984. Congress had ordered a halt to U.S. support for the Contra rebels, leaving Ortega free, as Gates saw it, to establish Nicaragua as a "permanent and well-armed" ally of the Soviet Union and Cuba.

He said the United States should acknowledge that the existence of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Nicaragua closely allied to Moscow and Havana "is unacceptable to the United States and that the United States will do everything its power short of invasion to put that regime out."

In addition to airstrikes, he recommended withdrawal of U.S. recognition of the Nicaraguan government and recognition of a Nicaraguan government exile that would be entitled to U.S. military support.

Economic sanctions should be considered, "perhaps even including a quarantine," Gates wrote.

His proposals were never adopted but the administration attempted to circumvent the Contra aid ban by secretly funneling money to the rebels that had been obtained through arms sales to Iran. Democrat says they will question Gates during his Senate confirmation about his knowledge of the Iran-Contra scandal, which erupted two years after he sent his memo to Casey.

Gates' grim prediction in the memo of disaster in Central America did not come to pass. Congress renewed aid to the Contras in 1986. In February 1990, Nicaraguans dealt a blow to the Soviet Union and Cuba by voting Ortega out of office. And within two years, the Soviet Union had disappeared.

On Iran-Contra's 20th Anniversary, Private Group Releases Documents About Gates' Role (SDUT/AP)

By Pete Yost,

The San Diego Union-Tribune/AP, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098604

The Iran-Contra affair exploded 20 years ago Saturday, a scandal that crippled the last two years of Ronald Reagan's presidency and temporarily damaged the career prospects of Robert Gates, President Bush's nominee to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Gates advocated air strikes against Nicaragua in '84, documents say

On Nov. 25, 1986, Attorney General Edwin Meese announced the diversion of millions of dollars in proceeds from the Reagan administration's secret arms sales to Iran to Central America, where the money was used to help bankroll a war secretly run out of the White House. At the time, Congress had cut off military aid to the rebel force known as the Contras fighting the communist government of Nicaragua.

The National Security Archive, a private group, is posting on its Internet site some of the hundreds of thousands of government documents it has collected on the scandal, including some about Gates. His nomination to become CIA director was derailed in 1987, but Gates stayed on in government, survived the political bloodletting, was renominated by President George H.W. Bush four years later and confirmed by the Senate.

Now Senate Democrats are expected to gauge Gates' willingness to change the administration's war policies, but they probably won't stand in his way to becoming the next defense secretary.

Thirty-one Democrats voted against him in 1991, in part because some felt he had turned a blind eye to the diversion of funds to the Contras. Gates says he first heard information about the diversion nearly two months before it was disclosed to the public, and a CIA official said he first told Gates about it even earlier.

Iran-Contra Independent Counsel Lawrence Walsh investigated Gates but brought no criminal charges, concluding that Gates' statements to investigators “often seemed scripted and less than candid.”

One of the central figures in the Iran-Contra affair, retired Air Force Gen. Dick Secord, said Friday that critics “have beat this dead Iran-Contra horse far too much by trying to involve Gates, which is a laugh.”

Secord was recruited by CIA Director William Casey to run the secret resupply network to the rebels along with National Security Council aide Oliver North. He said Gates “was not a player and, since I was the chief of operations, I guess I would have known if he was a player.”

Vengeful Shi'ites Kill 25 (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, November 24, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Shi'ite militiamen yesterday doused six Sunni Arabs with kerosene and burned them alive as Iraqi soldiers stood by, amid attacks on mosques that left 19 other Sunnis dead.

The violence was seen as revenge for the slaughter of at least 215 Shi'ites in the Sadr City slum the day before.

The mosque attacks took place after the Iraqi government, attempting to stop the nation's slide into civil war, imposed a sweeping curfew in the capital. Officials shut down the international airport and closed Iraq's main outlet to shipping lanes in the Persian Gulf.

Shi'ite militiamen of the Mahdi's Army, armed with machines guns and rocket-propelled grenades, swept through the Hurriyah neighborhood near an Iraqi army post. The militiamen burned four mosques and several homes, and attacked worshippers as they left services, police Capt. Jamil Hussein said.

Followers of radical anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr warned they would suspend their membership in parliament and the Cabinet if Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki meets with President Bush in Jordan next week, a member of parliament said.

Legislator Qusai Abdul-Wahab, an al-Sadr follower, blamed U.S. forces for Thursday's bombings in Sadr City because they failed to provide security.

"We say occupation forces are fully responsible for these acts, and we call for the withdrawal of occupation forces or setting a timetable for their withdrawal," Mr. Abdul-Wahab said.

Mr. Bush, who was spending the Thanksgiving holiday at Camp David, said through a spokesman that he would stick to his plans for the summit.

Mahdi's Army gunmen loyal to Sheik al-Sadr had begun to take over the mixed neighborhood of Hurriyah during the summer and a majority of its Sunni residents had fled.

Three Sunni mosques elsewhere in Baghdad came under attack later in the day, and in Sadr City, a U.S. helicopter shot back at Shi'ite militiamen who opened fire on it from the ground, residents said. There were no immediate reports of casualties.

At least 87 persons were killed or found dead yesterday in sectarian violence across Iraq.

Capt. Hussein said at least 25 Sunnis were killed and 14 wounded in the mosque attacks in Hurriyah, despite a 24-hour curfew that the government imposed to try to prevent reprisal killings in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0098605

The Baghdad attacks appeared to have been a reaction to the deaths Thursday in Sadr City, when Sunnis unleashed bombs and mortars that killed at least 215 persons and wounded 257 in the deadliest single assault since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

The killings threatened to tip Iraq's widespread sectarian violence into full-scale civil war pitting majority Shi'ites against minority Sunnis.

In the northern city of Tal Afar, 23 persons were killed and 43 wounded when explosives hidden in a parked car and in a suicide belt worn by a pedestrian detonated simultaneously outside a car dealership, police Brig. Khalaf al-Jubouri said.

Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki were scheduled to meet Wednesday and Thursday in Amman.

The al-Sadr bloc in parliament and in the government is the backbone of Mr. al-Maliki's political support. Its withdrawal, if only temporarily, would be a severe blow to the prime minister's already shaky hold on power.

Sheik al-Sadr's followers hold six Cabinet seats and have 30 members in the 275-member parliament.

Sheik al-Sadr also challenged Sheik Harith al-Dhari, the Sunnis' most influential leader, who heads the Association of Muslim Scholars, to issue a fatwa, or religious edict, that condemned Sunni attacks on Shi'ites.

Leading about 5,000 worshippers in Friday prayers at a mosque in the Shi'ite holy city of Kufa, 100 miles south of Baghdad, the Shi'ite cleric said Sheik al-Dhari should ban Sunnis from joining al Qaeda in Iraq and organize the reconstruction of the Shi'ite Golden Dome mosque in Samarra, north of the capital.

Suspected al Qaeda bombers blew the shrine apart Feb. 22. Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi's Army militia and associated death squads are thought to be responsible for killing hundreds of Sunnis since suspected al Qaeda in Iraq militants bombed the Golden Dome mosque. That attack set off a surge of retaliatory killings between Shi'ites and Sunnis that have raged all year.

In Sadr City yesterday, hundreds of men, women and children beat their chests, chanted and cried as they walked beside vehicles carrying the caskets of their loved ones to the holy Shi'ite city of Najaf. Despite Baghdad's curfew, Mr. al-Maliki, himself a Shi'ite, ordered police to guard the processions.

Once the processions reached the edge of Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, the cars and minivans left most of the mourners behind and began the 100-mile drive south to Najaf, a treacherous journey that passes through many checkpoints and areas controlled by Sunni militants in Iraq's so-called Triangle of Death.

As cleanup crews continued removing remains of the dead from wreckage of the car bombs, tents were erected where relatives could receive condolences.

Thursday's attack surpassed coordinated blasts on March 2, 2004, that struck Shi'ite Muslim shrines in Karbala and Baghdad, killing a total of at least 181 Iraqis and wounding 573. A bombing in the southern city of Hillah that targeted mostly Shi'ite police and national guard recruits, killed 125 and wounded more than 140 in February 2004.

GAO: DOD Business Practices Risky (UPI)

United Press International, November 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 (UPI) -- One of the most important tasks in the next session of U.S. Congress is to oversee the Pentagon's business operations, the Government Accountability Office said.

The GAO has identified 26 federal programs or activities that are at risk for waste, fraud and abuse because of lax oversight. Eight of them are in the Defense Department and six are programs for which the DOD bears some responsibility.

"Billions of dollars have been wasted annually because of the lack of adequate transparency and appropriate accountability across DOD's business areas," the GAO stated in a new report to Congress, outlining what it believes should be Congress' top priorities for oversight.

The high-risk areas include DOD's overall management approach to business transformation, business systems modernization, financial management, the personnel security clearance process, supply chain management, support infrastructure management, weapon systems acquisition, and contract management, according to the report.

The GAO lays out key tasks for Congress to help the Defense Department get a handle on the management of its $430 billion annual budget:

--"Require DOD to establish management accountability at an appropriate level of the organization with significant authority, experience, and tenure to provide sustained leadership needed to achieve successful and sustainable transformation," it said;

--"Require DOD to develop and implement a viable strategic plan with goals, objectives, key milestones, and measures to monitor and report on progress in transforming its key business operations;

--"Evaluate DOD's progress in complying with legislative requirements to improve its business systems modernization and financial management modernization efforts,(and) require DOD to develop and implement plans to address its high-risk areas."

Lost Documents Slow Veterans' Access To Benefits (LAT)

By Diane C. Lade, South Florida Sun Sentinel

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

Almost a million a year ask federal officials about retrieving papers they need to apply for valuable aid. Now forms are available online.

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA. — Harold Brewster certainly earned the right to veterans benefits. He was aboard the battleship New Mexico when a kamikaze pilot slammed into its bridge, killing its commanding officer and 29 crew members during World War II.

But when the former sailor now living in Boca Raton asked about the free plots that would be available to veterans in the new South Florida National Cemetery, he found out he needed documents that had been lost years before. Brewster's military papers and five medals were taken when his household belongings were stolen 10 years ago.

"I didn't know what we were going to do," said Brewster, 80.

Almost a million veterans a year ask federal officials about retrieving lost military documents, papers they need to apply for valuable veterans benefits like housing loans and low-cost healthcare.

The process now can be expedited by applying online. But some veterans and their families still find it cumbersome and confusing.

"Most people don't have the ability to do it on their own," said Floyd White, section manager with Broward County Elderly and Veterans Services.

At least one veteran a week comes into the office for help replacing lost papers, White said.

Brewster's family turned to the Mae Volen Senior Center in Boca Raton, where Brewster goes for activities and lunch.

Administrative assistant Grace Ginsberg pulled up the forms online and, within a few months, had the papers, as well as replacements for the medals.

Brewster wept as a Navy recruiter presented his decorations, in a display box put together by the center, during a ceremony two days before Veterans Day.

But some documents can be hard to retrieve, especially for veterans who served in World War II or the Korean War.

A huge fire swept through the National Personnel Records Center in St. Louis, Mo., in 1973, destroying as many as 18 million military files.

The majority of Army and Air Force veterans discharged before 1964 were affected; the center has reconstructed service histories for 6 million, sending them certificates to replace their military discharge papers.

Officially called a Report of Separation, or DD Form 214, a military discharge paper is required for most veterans benefits, including a veteran's home loan, healthcare at a U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs clinic or hospital, low-cost prescription drugs through the VA, and burial at a veterans cemetery.

According to the VA, the best way to request records is to fill out the Standard Form SF-180. It is available online at http://www.archives.gov/veterans . Veterans can file the form electronically or by mail.

The records center receives about 5,000 requests a day involving its 60 million records. But the center, part of the National Archives and Records Administration, tries to respond within 10 days, officials said.

Older veterans should apply for replacement documents as soon as they realize their originals are missing, veterans officials said.

Dems In Control? We're Still Staying In Canada (LAT)

By David Drucker

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

MY WIFE AND I AWOKE, as usual, to NPR. Before political correspondent Mara Liasson got to the end of her first sentence, I knew the news was disastrous. George W. Bush had been reelected.

"Honey," I said, "remember when we talked about moving to Canada?"

I'm sure a lot of other dyed-in-the-organic-wool liberals muttered something similar that dark morning in 2004, but unlike most of them, we meant it. Plan A: John Kerry wins, we build that dream ski house in Vermont. Plan B: Move to Vancouver, Canada.

So, Plan B it was. We'd had enough of Bush, the direction the United States was going, and this was the last straw. Never mind that we lived in Cambridge, Mass., arguably the most liberal city in the bluest of the blue states. We were packing our bulk granola into our diesel Beetle and heading out.

Eight months later, we were settling into a new home and jobs in British Columbia, when Canada had its own election. For those unfamiliar with the Canadian system of government, the prime minister is elected by parliament — not every four years but after losing a no-confidence vote. After a few of those there was a parliamentary election in January, which led to the election of a new prime minister, Stephen Harper, of Canada's Conservative Party.

Harper ran on cutting taxes and turning a federal child-care program into a monthly payment per child. The opposition's negative campaign ads sounded eerily familiar: He supported Bush's war in Iraq, was against signing the Kyoto environmental accord and wanted to "reexamine" gay marriage (which is legal in Canada). A shiver rippled down from our berets to our Birkenstocks.

Then, a few weeks ago, we awoke, as usual, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. Before CBC morning show host Tom Allen got to the end of his first sentence, I knew: Back in the United States, the Democratic Party had won control of the House and the Senate.

"Honey, did we make a big mistake?"

By "big mistake," I mean, not the kind in which you switch lines at Whole Foods and the line you'd been in suddenly starts to move. We're talking big mistake like selling all of your stock in Ben & Jerry's the day before Unilever buys the company.

But it turns out that Canadian conservatism can look awfully liberal. So far, Harper — derided as "Bush lite" — has, for instance, introduced a partial tax credit for monthly transit passes. The Conservatives have proposed a Clean Air Act for Canada, and although it's not ideal, it's still something. Harper said that these new laws would "institute a holistic approach that doesn't treat the related issues of pollutants and greenhouse gas emissions in isolation." When was the last time you heard any U.S. politician utter the word "holistic"?

Did I mention universal healthcare? Even Harper seems committed to keeping that.

We've come to the conclusion that the United States has drifted so far to the right that any self-respecting Canadian Conservative would be considered a raving liberal in Washington. Stephen Harper is no George W. Bush. We may not agree with him, but we don't feel ashamed every time he opens his mouth. We might yawn, though.

So we're staying in Canada. But good luck with that new Congress, eh?

Why The Economy Needs Consumers To Shop This Year (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse, Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The latest readings on the U.S. economy suggest a less-than-festive picture as this holiday shopping season begins: Unless consumers turn in a stellar performance at the mall, the recent sluggish growth could last through year's end.

While many economists and executives have begun to believe that the worst of the housing slump is over, the knock-on effects of the slowdown are becoming apparent. Together with a weak auto sector, sharp cutbacks in building activity are hitting everyone from manufacturers to retailers. Truckers are moving less merchandise, and stocks of unsold goods in warehouses are up.

Many retailers reported stronger-than-expected turnout on Black Friday, as shoppers swarmed stores and malls in search of deep discounts. But some economists and analysts worry that it is only deep discounts that are drawing shoppers out, not underlying strength. (See related article1)

All told, the latest data suggest consumers have been cautious, choosing not to spend all extra income and any savings from the gas pump. In October, retail sales excluding gasoline rose 0.4%, putting inflation-adjusted consumer spending on track to rise at about a 3% annualized rate in the current quarter -- a healthy pace, but not enough to generate a rebound in the economy as a whole.

"It'll take a miracle on 34th Street to get a solid rebound in economic activity," says Paul Kasriel, chief economist at Northern Trust Corp. in Chicago. Indeed, a spreading perception that growth in the U.S. is decelerating is weighing a bit on markets and contributing to a drop in the value of the dollar overseas.

Not all is gloom. Producers of capital goods such as machine tools and automation equipment are doing fairly well as businesses keep up their investments. The trade deficit might improve slightly as imports slow and healthy growth abroad stimulates exports. Moreover, deep discounts at Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other large chains could help keep a lid on inflation.

But how U.S. consumers -- whose purchases make up more than two-thirds of the economy -- respond to the mixed picture they face remains the big unanswered question.

DOJ_NMG_0098608

On one hand, falling home prices have made many feel poorer. On the other, job and wage growth still look good. The unemployment rate fell to a five-year low of 4.4% in October, and the average wage was up 3.9% from a year earlier -- compared with average annual growth of 2.8% since the current expansion began in late 2001. Gasoline prices are still high, but are far below their August peaks. And the stock market is doing well.

Retailers of goods to affluent shoppers, who make up an outsized share of consumer spending, say they see reason for optimism. "We've had good strength in the financial markets this year, and that would bode well for bonuses on Wall Street," says Stephen Sadove, chief executive of Saks Inc. "We also feel good about tourism. Those along with other factors make us feel good about the holiday season for luxury."

Recent earnings reports from big discount retailers Wal-Mart and Target Corp. paint a murkier picture. Wal-Mart, which has been struggling with soft sales amid store redesigns, reported better-than-expected earnings for the quarter ended Oct. 31, but warned that holiday profit could disappoint if deep discounts fail to boost sales. Target offered a better outlook, saying it expects to gain market share over the holidays and beyond.

Meantime, economists' views of the prospects for growth have darkened. As of mid-November, 56 economists polled by The Wall Street Journal predicted, on average, that real gross domestic product -- an inflation-adjusted measure of all the goods and services the U.S. produces -- will rise at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the current quarter. That was down from their October estimate of 2.5%. Many cut their estimates further on Nov. 17, after the Commerce Department reported that new-home construction had plummeted to a six-year low.

As a result, the current quarter is looking not much different than the last, in which GDP, hurt by the housing slump, rose a meager 1.6% -- a number that economists expect to be revised upward a bit this coming week.

The housing outlook remains unclear. Beyond its immediate dampening of growth, the home-building slump ultimately could help the housing market recover. By cutting back on construction, home builders are helping to reduce a huge overhang of unsold homes. Meanwhile, buyers have been more active than many expected: Mortgage applications have been stable for several weeks, and the latest National Association of Home Builders survey showed an uptick in both home builders' actual sales and their expectations for future sales.

The signs of improvement in housing "could be judged as no more than the proverbial dead-cat bounce, but I believe it indicates more than that," says Robert Toll, chief executive of luxury-home builder Toll Brothers Inc. In the Wall Street Journal survey, nearly two in three economists said they thought the worst of the housing slump had passed.

But even if the housing market stabilizes, its effects on the broader economy will linger. Lower home values mean people can't take as much spending money out of their houses through cash-out refinancings and home-equity loans -- a source of funds that in some places, particularly in California, has amounted to more than a fifth of people's disposable income. And everyone from building suppliers to mortgage brokers must adjust to a slower pace of sales.

Retailers Home Depot Inc. and Lowe's Cos. both said recently they expect sales and profits to sag as lower home prices take a toll on customers. Economists at Moody's Economy.com estimate that housing-related sectors -- such as residential construction, furniture making and extermination -- will shed 300,000 jobs over the next year and a half.

James Metcalf, president and chief operating officer of Chicago-based wallboard producer USG Corp, says he has so far made only "surgical" layoffs, though he has slashed overtime and cut back production by about 10% since July. On the brighter side, he says, commercial construction remains robust and new computer systems have allowed him to adjust production much faster than in previous downturns, lessening the risk of the kind of oversupply that leads to big busts.

Still, companies have a lot of unsold inventory sitting on shelves and in warehouses, suggesting that they have plenty of adjusting to do. Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs in New York, calculates that in the third quarter, nonauto inventories rose by an inflation-adjusted, annualized figure of $59.3 billion -- the biggest jump since 2000. That means businesses don't need to order as much in the current quarter, a trend reflected in October's manufacturing survey from the Institute for Supply Management, which showed a significant drop in new orders.

Bill Zollars, CEO of trucking company YRC Worldwide Inc., based in Overland Park, Kan., says he has seen smaller and fewer shipments than usual among manufacturers and retailers in recent months -- a time when they are typically stocking up for the holidays. "The peak shipping season is not as robust this year as it has been in previous years," he says.

To be sure, not everyone is hurting. Producers of capital goods are benefiting from businesses' continuing efforts to boost productivity. James Gelly, chief financial officer at Rockwell Automation Inc., a Milwaukee maker of factory-automation equipment, says business is strong in areas such as the energy sector in the Rocky Mountain region.

"The underlying conditions aren't so bad," he says. "In fact, there's a nice uptrend."

Shoppers Flock To Stores, But Will It Be Enough? (WSJ)

By Vanessa O'Connell, Stephanie Kang, Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Crowds swarmed stores across the country early Friday, shopping for deeply discounted big-screen TVs, designer clothes and home accessories. But a stronger-than-expected turnout doesn't necessarily mean retailers will have merry results overall in the critical holiday shopping season, forecasters and retailers warn.

The big risk: power shoppers who showed up for Friday's numerous midnight store openings might have little interest in shopping when the discounts aren't as steep. While the specials appeared to bolster shopper enthusiasm, they could backfire for stores if shoppers use the door busters and other blitz promotions to cherry-pick discounted items. With the extended hours now offered by discounters, malls, outlets and department stores, shoppers can hop from store to store, buying just the dirt-cheap specials -- many below wholesale prices -- and leave the higher-margin products on the shelf.

"The positive is that they've been able to draw consumers into the store," said Donald Soares, principal in the retail practice of consultancy Capgemini. "The negative is the risk that consumers will only buy discounted items and ignore the rest of the store."

"When the dust settles, we'll say 'hey, gee, what a good Black Friday.'" But the big question is, "how much momentum is there?" said Michael P. Niemira, economist for the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group.

No doubt, many retailers saw good response to their efforts to lure early shoppers into their stores. At 9 p.m. on Thanksgiving night, CompUSA opened its doors to crowds of shoppers who rushed the aisles for $400 LCD HDTV-ready televisions by Olevia and $50 Linksys routers that normally sell for $79.

The early opening allowed Corey Jackson, a 32-year-old computer programmer from North Dallas, to get a jump on holiday shopping and snare bargains at many stores. After snatching a hard drive and a Bluetooth headset, he planned to head back out in the morning, hitting Wal-Mart for toys for his 21-month-old son, then to Micro Center for more computer shopping, then on to Circuit City and Best Buy for $3.99 CDs and DVDs.

Overall, the number of shoppers who hit stores Friday was greater than anticipated by Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak RCT Corp., of Chicago, which collects data from 40,000 sensors in enclosed malls and strip centers. The research firm had been predicting a 2.5% increase in traffic Friday over the same day last year. But by late morning Friday, he said the increase in shopper traffic seemed likely to surpass that by at least a few tenths of a percentage point. "That's a pretty strong increase," he said.

"The question is how much money do they spend?" Mr. Martin added. To benefit stores, the increased traffic "has to ring out in the register" by generating solid sales of goods at profitable prices. "What we saw Friday was a grab for market share, with retailers just trying to get people in the store," he said.

By 11:30 p.m. Thanksgiving evening, cars were bumper-to-bumper trying to nab a parking space at Citadel Outlets in Commerce, Calif. For the first time this year, the center opened some of its stores at midnight on Black Friday. At Old Navy, shoppers waited for more than 30 minutes to get into the store, shuffling through a velvet-roped line. By 12:15 a.m. shoppers were snaking around the interior of stores like Vans, KB Toys, apparel retailer Kids Supercenter and others, waiting to get to the cash register.

Melissa Guttierrez, a 29-year-old who was standing in line to get into Calvin Klein at 11:45, said she would spend about $1,000 this year, less than what she spent last year.

Consumers' holiday spending is an important indicator of the strength of the $12 trillion U.S. economy. Retailers count on holiday sales for as much as 40% of their annual sales and half their annual profits.

While the day after Thanksgiving is no longer considered the biggest shopping day of the year -- that honor this year will likely fall to the last Saturday before Christmas -- the day does bring some of the biggest specials. Often known as Black Friday for its historical significance as the day when many retailers turned a profit -- or "went into the black" -- the day generally sets the tone for the rest of the season. But this year's markdowns on some items were surprisingly sharp, especially for electronics.

"It has been a cautious year for retail in general, and the stores wanted to end the year with a bang," said Scott Krugman, a spokesman for the National Retail Federation, which is forecasting an overall increase of 5% in retail sales during the holiday season this year, down slightly from last year's 6.1% gain.

"What you can say for sure is that if retailers run bargains, they can bring out the masses," says Britt Beemer, chairman of America's Research Group, a Charleston, S.C., research firm. In his surveys of shoppers, 42% said they would respond to an advertised deal, up from about 32% of the shoppers he interviewed last year.

At Macy's flagship store in Manhattan, shoppers were waiting in a line that stretched around the block by 5:30 a.m. -- half an hour before the store opened. Many shoppers were clutching $10-off coupons for Macy's merchandise that they had clipped from a newspaper circular the day before. "We have much more traffic than we have had in the last few years" on the day after Thanksgiving, said Terry Lundgren, chief executive of Macy's parent Federated Department Stores Inc.

Some Web retailers pulled out the stops to attract consumers to their Web sites. On Thursday, Amazon.com placed Microsoft's Xbox 360 game console on sale for $100, a steep discount to its normal $299 price. The 1,000 Xbox 360s Amazon was offering at the lower price sold out 29 seconds after going on sale at 11 a.m. Pacific Time, causing the performance of Amazon's site to temporarily slow down. "We saw dramatically more traffic than we anticipated," said Amazon spokesman Craig Berman. On Friday, high traffic disrupted Wal-Marts Web site for much of the day.

US Retailers Fire Starter Gun On Sales (FT)

By Jonathan Birchall

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

US shoppers on Friday launched their frantic traditional post-Thanksgiving Day assault on stores and malls across the country, amid predictions of a solid but not spectacular holiday season for the retail sector.

The annual Friday ritual of early-morning openings and "door-buster" limited availability offers is used by retailers to mark the start of the holiday shopping season.

However, most leading retailers now launch their Christmas marketing campaigns at the beginning of November.

This year the event again crept into the Thursday holiday itself – led in part by online retailers, who last year saw a spike in transactions from customers shopping from home on the holiday.

Underlining the trend, Amazon, the largest online retailer, staged a Thanksgiving afternoon promotion in which it sold 1,000 Xbox 360 systems for a third of their advertised price. Kmart's 1,400 discount stores opened for the first time on Thanksgiving Day, while CompUSA, the computer retailer, opened its stores from 9pm to midnight. FAO Schwartz, the Manhattan toy store, also opened on Thursday.

Department stores, including JC Penney, Kohl's, Saks and Macy's also launched "pre-Thanksgiving" sales in the week before the holiday.

A number of malls owned by Simon Properties opened their doors at midnight on Thursday. But the early Friday morning remains the most bitterly contested retail battleground. The focus on the day after Thanksgiving continues a tradition that dates back to the days when department stores reopened their stores with Christmas decorations and settings on the day after the holidays.

Wal-Mart, the largest US retailer, and Best Buy and Circuit City, the largest electronics retailers opened their doors at 5am on Friday, with customers in some locations queuing all night for "door-buster" bargains, traditionally advertised in Thanksgiving Day papers.

In an effort to thwart websites that have managed in the past to publish details of its door-buster offers ahead of time, Wal-Mart this year announced 17 "secret" items on its website on Thanksgiving Day – including the latest Xbox game console that would be limited to just six per store.

The hooplah this year also included a stunt by David Blaine, the escapologist, in New York's Times Square sponsored by Target, Wal-Mart's main rival.

Overall, economists are predicting stronger consumer spending over the holidays than last year, despite an initial level of pessimism based around high fuel prices and interest rate concerns.

The National Retail Federation in September predicted a modest 5 per cent increase this year in sales in November and December to $457.4bn against a 6.1 per cent increase last year.

But Wayne Best, Visa USA's chief economist, said earlier this month that it expected growth of 7.5 per cent, as lower fuel prices and a buoyant stock market have improved consumer's confidence.

Holiday Shopping Season Starts Strong (CHIT)

By Sandra Jones

Chicago Tribune, November 25, 2006

Corey Hatters set up his lawn chair in front of Office Depot in Algonquin at 11:50 p.m. Thanksgiving Day and settled in for the night.

The 17-year-old student doesn't usually go for so-called doorbuster deals, but this year the bargain was too good to pass up. When the doors opened at 6 a.m., Hatters' position as first in line secured him one of only three $299.99 Toshiba laptop computers in the store, marked down from $649.99.

"I'd rather do other things with my time, but it was worthwhile," said Hatters. "Before I go to college, I need to get a laptop."

An estimated 60 million shoppers poured into the nation's shopping today—one of the busiest shopping days of the year—snapping up bargains on everything from large-screen plasma TVs to diamond jewelry to KitchenAid mixers.

DOJ_NMG_0098611

Millions stayed home and went online as well, causing some problems for retailers on the crucial shopping day. Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s Web site was disrupted for several hours today because of high traffic volume. The huge retailer's problems came a day after Amazon.com suffered disruptions because of a Thanksgiving Day sale on Microsoft Corp.'s Xbox 360.

Indeed, the early returns on the official kick off to the holiday shopping season in the Chicago area came in strong.

At Spring Hill Mall in West Dundee, where more than half the stores opened at 1 a.m., many retailers reached 75 percent of their daily sales goal by 6 a.m., according to assistant general manager Neil Lopez.

Best Buy on Clark Street in Lakeview, where the first customer lined up at 7 p.m. on Thanksgiving Day, reported sales that were double the daily plan by 2 p.m., said Jon Kulikowski, general manager. An estimated 1,000 people lined up around the block for Best Buy's 5 a.m. opening. Most were shopping in large part for great deals on flat panel plasma TVs and laptop computers.

Stores opened earlier than ever, some as early as 1 a.m., and the pace of shopping remained strong throughout the day.

Perhaps it was simply the sunny, warm weather in Chicago or the more civilized plans many retailers put in place to handle doorbusting crowds, but the upbeat mood lead many observers to predict this holiday will be a rosy one for retailers.

"When you marry this weather with the business we had today, it doesn't get much better than this," said Marc Strich, general manager at Woodfield Mall in Schaumburg.

Traffic at Woodfield Mall rose an estimated 7 to 9 percent, according to Strich. In anticipation of the crowds the mall increased traffic controllers and started them at 8:30 a.m., three hours earlier than last year.

The National Retail Federation predicts a 5 percent gain in holiday sales this year, less than the 6 percent of a year ago but on par with the 4.8 percent average annual increase of the past decade.

Shoppers Line Up For Sales (DMN)

By Maria Halkias

The Dallas Morning News, November 25, 2006

Dallas-area shoppers flocked to snap up early-bird bargains Friday – the kickoff of retailers' critical holiday shopping season – saying that Thanksgiving weekend discounts are some of the best of the year.

“I come out every year on this day,” said Jennifer Wilder of Dallas, as she carried bags from Ann Taylor, Macy’s, Bath & Body Works, Limited and Zales to her car in the parking lot at NorthPark Center.

“I got a top for $9.99 that was $49.99 for me and brown cowboy boots for my grandbaby for $19.99 that were regular $69.99,” Ms. Wilder said. “It’s worth it. I saved $500 on diamond rings for me and my husband.”

The day after Thanksgiving represents the kickoff to the holiday shopping season and has been called Black Friday because it traditionally represented the day retailers went from posting losses, or being in the red, to being profitable, or in the black.

“Retailers are trying to get people to buy early. The point is to get the shopper early in the cycle,” said Edward J. Fox, director of the J.C. Penney Center for Retail Excellence at Southern Methodist University.

“Retailers who get shoppers to commit earlier end up doing better.”

Last year, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. ended up having a weak day on the Friday after Thanksgiving and that carried through to the rest of the season, he said.

This time Wal-Mart was more aggressive with its discounts and started earlier, he said. Wal-Mart discounted toys, electronics and small appliances weeks leading up to Black Friday.

Many retailers chose not to wait until Black Friday to bring in the crowds.

Late Thursday night, shoppers formed long lines at several stores, including Banana Republic, Polo Ralph Lauren, Tommy Hilfiger, at the Allen Premium Outlets.

About two-thirds of the center's 100 stores participated in the Midnight Madness sale.

“Nike had such a long line it decided to open at 11:35 Thursday night,” said Michele Rothstein, spokeswoman for the shopping center. “We had traffic backed up on I-75 (at the Stacy Road exit). “People voted by showing up. I think we’re onto something.

Sherrie G. McAvoy, U.S. retail sector leader of Deloitte & Touche LLP’s consumer business practice, visited both NorthPark and the Galleria in Dallas on Friday.

“I think the strength we’ve been seeing in luxury will continue this season,” she said. “I saw equal numbers of browsers and shoppers. Due to the area’s competitive environment the retailer has to work harder to convert the browser into the shopper.”

Dallas-Fort Worth shoppers are among the most discerning and demanding, according to results of Deloitte & Touche survey. Despite their high expectations of retailers, they seem to enjoy holiday shopping, Ms. McAvoy said.

Holiday Shoppers Turn Out For Bargains (AP)

By Anne D'Innocenzio

AP, November 24, 2006

It was cold, it was dark and in some places it was foggy. None of that would stop millions of bargain-seekers from climbing into their cars for a pre-dawn raid on their local malls, electronics retailers and discounters for the official start to the holiday season.

""Great deals. I'm shopping for everybody today. We hit Target. We're going to Meijer. We hit Sears. We started shopping at 5 a.m.," Joanne Dosant, a 36-year-old legal assistant from Windsor, Ontario, said Friday as she loaded her SUV with two cartloads of items from a Target store in Madison Heights, Mich.

AUDIO: Gerald Storch, chief of Toys R Us, is upbeat. | But shopper Roy Scott has a problem.

The aggressive tactics used to lure shoppers out before sunrise on Black Friday apparently worked. Based on early reports, the expanded hours, increased discounting and free money as gift cards drove hordes of shoppers to stores to buy flat-screen TVs, computers and toys.

"Large crowds drive me nuts, but this was my Christmas present to myself," said Mark Demers, 23, of Bristol, Conn., who had camped out overnight in front of the Best Buy store in West Hartford, Conn. for the 5 a.m. opening after seeing a TV commercial late Thursday touting $500 off on the $1,500 price tag for a 42-inch LCD TV made by Westinghouse.

Clearly, Black Friday is "becoming the biggest sport," said Marshal Cohen, chief analyst at NPD Group Inc., observing that shoppers this year bought fewer, but pricier items than a year ago.

A growing number of stores such as KB Toys opened at midnight. Some, like CompUSA Inc. and BJ's Wholesale Club opened on Thanksgiving Day for the first time.

Overall, the biggest draws were consumer electronics, particularly flat-screen TVs, laptop computers and digital cameras. Toys fared well too. In addition to the hard-to-find Fisher-Price TMX Elmo, shoppers snapped up other items like anything Dora, robot toys, Fisher-Price's Kids Tough Digital Camera and Jakks-Pacific FlyWheel XPV, according to toy merchants.

But clothing, mirroring a trend in recent years, took a back seat, Cohen said: "Apparel will be the late bloomer making mall-based apparel stores a little nervous."

Wal-Mart Stores, which promised the most aggressive pricing strategy ever, set the tone by plying shoppers with one-time offers such as a $988 Viore 42-inch plasma TV set. The discounter declined to comment Friday about business; it's slated to announce estimated sales results for November on Saturday.

Sears Holdings' Sears Roebuck stores, which offered $10 reward cards to the first 200 people showing up for the 5 a.m. opening, drew increased traffic at many locations, spokeswoman Gail Lavielle said.

Toys "R" Us and KB Toys also reported increased traffic from a year ago.

Karen McDonald, a spokeswoman at Taubman Centers, which operates or owns 23 malls in 11 states, said a handful of malls surveyed on Friday reported traffic and sales gains over last year.

"The line was literally wrapped around the building. I haven't seen that in years," said Terry Lundgren, chairman and CEO of Federated Department Stores, who surveyed the crowds at the 6 a.m. opening of the flagship Macy's in New York as the chain began its first holiday season as a national brand. The hottest draws were discounted cashmere, $50 luggage sets and $100 one-carat diamond necklaces, Lundgren said.

The Best Buy store in West Paterson, N.J., had almost 2,000 people waiting for Friday's 5 a.m. opening — nearly 24 hours after they started lining up.

"They had turkey sandwiches," said Chuck O'Donnell, a district service manager for Best Buy, which sold out of all the early morning specials advertised in its circular, including the 42-inch Westinghouse TVs and $80 digital cameras.

In fact, many of those who arrived at stores early Friday came away disappointed. They were plenty of customers like Brian Clark, 27, who left empty-handed from the West Hartford Best Buy after the televisions and computers he'd eyed as Christmas gifts were snatched by even earlier shoppers.

Alarmed by a recent shooting of a customer waiting outside a Connecticut Wal-Mart for the highly sought Sony's PlayStation 3 game console, Clark had tucked his Glock pistol in a holster under his jacket and put extra ammunition in his pocket before heading out early Friday.

"You never know these days," he said, quickly adding that he has a state permit for a concealed weapon.

Gary Miller, a 45-year-old computer programmer in Cincinnati, was at Wal-Mart at 5 a.m. to hunt for a 20-inch LCD television he had seen advertised online.

DOJ_NMG_0098613

"My wife sent me out for this one," he said, pointing to the set in his shopping cart. "But then I saw this one (a 20-inch conventional TV) for $85 and said, 'What the heck, I'll get that one, too.'"

At the Glendale Galleria in suburban Los Angeles, The Gap had been set to open at 5 a.m. but unlocked the doors 15 minutes early to accommodate a long line of shoppers, said Fran Vartanian, district manager of the chain. Sales were brisk, with all prices reduced by 30% until noon — a first-time promotion for the store. Sweatshirts with hoods were big sellers at about $35 after the discount.

While Black Friday officially starts holiday shopping, generally it's no longer the busiest day of the season. That honor now falls to the last Saturday before Christmas. Stores say Black Friday sets the tone for the weeks ahead, however: What consumers see that day influences where they will shop for the rest of the season.

This year, analysts expect robust holiday sales gains for the retail industry, though the growth is expected to be slower than a year ago. The National Retail Federation projects a 5% gain in total holiday sales for the November-December period, less than the 6.1% in the year-ago period.

Meanwhile, the International Council of Shopping Centers estimates sales at stores open at least a year will rise 3% in the November-December period, less than last year's 3.6%.

Eager Shoppers Ring It Up On "Red-Eye Thursday" (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

At midnight yesterday, 30-something gal pals Tracey Oskey and Jodi Weier kicked off their Black Friday shopping spree in classic Washington style: stuck in traffic.

"Oh my God, this is insane," Oskey said as she stared down the stretch of red tail lights on Route 7 in Loudoun County headed toward Leesburg Corner Premium Outlets.

The 5 a.m. early bird special is so last year. For the first time, retailers across the country threw open their doors at 12 a.m. to throngs of shoppers, turning the day after Thanksgiving into a nearly 24-hour shopping smorgasbord.

"I don't even call it Black Friday anymore. I'm calling it red-eye Thursday," said Marshal Cohen, chief industry analyst at consulting firm NPD Group, who hit several midnight openings and early bird specials. "I feel like I'm in college pulling an all-nighter."

Black Friday is the symbolic start of the holiday shopping season, when retailers showcase door-busting discounts on everything from plasma TV sets to Barbies as they jockey for customers and, perhaps more importantly, buzz. A successful day can give a retailer momentum that will last until Christmas. Midnight openings are the latest craze, luring shoppers before they have barely digested their turkey.

"Sales are important, but they're secondary. It's about getting the people" said Ellen Davis, a spokeswoman for the National Retail Federation, a trade group. "Retailers hope that the people who came into their stores today will be back throughout the holiday."

Black Friday earned its nickname because it marks the day when retailers traditionally went from losing money to making a profit, or being in the black. The research firm ShopperTrak predicts that yesterday's foot traffic will be the second-heaviest of the year, following the Saturday before Christmas. By Sunday, retailers expect to have seen 137 million people, up about 2 million from last year, according to the NRF.

Oskey's husband was out of town on a business trip for the phone installation company they run together, Telforward. So her parents came to her home in Tysons Corner at noon on Thursday for turkey and stuffing. They were out the door by 5:30.

Oskey threw some clothes into a backpack and headed west to Loudoun County, where she had booked a shop-and-stay package that Lansdowne Resort, near the outlets, was marketing for the midnight opening. Weier met her at the hotel, and by 9 p.m. they settled in with a bottle of merlot from the minibar and "Grey's Anatomy" on the television.

By 10:45, they were visibly dragging.

"I said that I can make it," Oskey announced in a determined voice as she mapped out her plan of attack in the hotel lobby.

A second wind arrived in the form of hot tea, coffee and a booklet of coupons -- part of the hotel package. Oskey made one last stop at her room to dump off her belongings before heading to the outlets. She pocketed her credit card and driver's license and walked out the door, unencumbered by a purse.

A hotel shuttle took the girlfriends and a handful of other shoppers who had booked the package trip to the outlets, circumventing parking lots that were full shortly after midnight. The bumper-to-bumper traffic was forgotten at the first rack of clothes at the first store Oskey entered.

"C'mon now, $9.99? This rocks!" she said as she sorted through a rack of men's fleece jackets at Haggar. "Are you only allowed one per customer?"

DOJ_NMG_0098614

It was 12:30 a.m., and the line at the lone cash register was already seven people deep -- one of the shortest lines of the night.

The Leesburg outlets were among 25 shopping centers around the country run by Chelsea Property Group to open at midnight. After a successful test at seven locations last year, the company expanded the midnight opening to almost all of its properties.

"It created a lot of excitement to get people to come to us first," said Michele Rothstein, a Chelsea Property spokeswoman. "We're all out there trying to capture the attention and the spending of customers."

Eight malls owned by Greensboro, N.C.-based Tanger Factory Outlet Centers opened at midnight, as did a dozen run by Baltimore-based Prime Retail Inc., including one in Hagerstown.

Retailers said they would not begin tallying the number of shoppers until today but that anecdotal reports indicated strong traffic. Wal-Mart's Web site crashed yesterday because of high volume. Jim Martin, vice president of ShopperTrak, said he expected yesterday's traffic to be comparable to last year's. Early openings might not draw more shoppers but spread them throughout the day, he said.

Some retailers even opened on Thanksgiving Day. CompUSA was open from 9 p.m. to midnight. Kmart checked out shoppers from 7 a.m. to 9 p.m., following a long-standing tradition. Gail Lavielle, a Kmart spokeswoman, said that customers "like having different alternatives and being able to shop all weekend."

But locked doors and dark windows weren't enough to stop some people from showing up to cash in on yesterday's blockbuster promotions. About a dozen shoppers arrived at Fair Oaks Mall in Fairfax at 11 p.m. on Thursday, reported parent company Taubman Centers, to claim spots in line at Elite Boardshop and Sears -- which opened at 5 a.m. and offered a plasma TV for $1,199.99.

Showing up at 4:30 a.m. meant you were downright late. That's when Jae Shim, 41, of Olney arrived at Best Buy in Germantown, where a long line had beat him. He and a friend waited two hours to get inside and another two hours to pay for a DVD player, video games and some movies.

"What we wanted we didn't even get," said Shim, who wanted to snag a Hewlett-Packard laptop for $380. "We could barely get in the store. It was crazy. They said, 'We're out of this; we're out of that.' "

Meanwhile, Oskey was blowing through her Christmas list of about two dozen people long before other retailers flicked on their lights. But even she had her limits. She quickly dashed out of Pottery Barn after seeing that the line wrapped around half the store.

"There's nothing in here I want that bad," she said.

By 3 a.m., she was back in bed. Her list was all checked off, and the only thing left to do in the morning was get a massage and mani-pedi at the hotel spa.

Getting Head Start On Black Friday (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

Tracy Rigual and her daughter, Rachel, have marked the start of the holiday shopping season with pre-dawn shopping trips for a decade. So when Leesburg Corner Premium Outlets started Black Friday at midnight, so did they.

Armed with coffee and a stroller for packages, the Riguals joined millions of Americans who yesterday hit stores throughout the country.

Retailers look at Black Friday, named after the day retailers traditionally start to see a profit each year, as a bellwether for how the rest of the Christmas season is going to go and a factor in consumer confidence.

So merchants loaded up on discounts this year to entice shoppers.

At Leesburg Corner, some stores offered up to 30 percent off for the first few hours after midnight. Wal-Mart and Target, the expected top draws on Black Friday, have been heavily discounting this season with deals on electronics. Wal-Mart was concerned it would repeat last year's mistake of not discounting enough.

"Retailers went all out this year with exciting promotions and big sales to bring in shoppers," said National Retail Federation President and Chief Executive Officer Tracy Mullin. "Many stores offered substantial savings on big-ticket items for consumers, and it seems that, for many shoppers, the deals were simply too good to pass up."

Roads into Leesburg Corner were packed and the parking lots were full shortly after midnight. Stores with big promotions, such as Ralph Lauren, Coach and Old Navy, and stores selling coffee had lines for hours.

Shoppers were camped out at Best Buy and Circuit City department stores in Northern Virginia by 10 on Thanksgiving night. Both chains opened at 5 a.m. yesterday.

Sears Holdings and Macy's East reported "good" foot traffic at their stores.

DOJ_NMG_0098615

Toys 'R' Us Inc. Chief Executive Officer Gerald Storch told Bloomberg News that the chain's stores had lines longer than they've seen in years. The toy chain had Black Friday deals such as 60 percent off select board games.

Trade groups estimate that between 100 million and 137 million Americans — more than one-third of the U.S. population participated — in Black Friday shopping.

Consumers appear to be behind on their shopping this year, possibly prompting more people to shop on Black Friday. According to the International Council of Shopping Centers, a New York trade group, about 24 percent had started their shopping by Oct. 31. Last year, 29 percent had started by then.

Mark Rein, director of strategic consulting for Maritz Research Retail Group, said Macy's and Coach appeared to be the big winners at the Mall of America in Bloomington, Minn., the country's largest shopping center. Both had major Black Friday promotions.

Department stores, which lost some of their luster with young shoppers during the past few years, are poised for a comeback this holiday.

"Macy's was very busy right at 6 this morning," he said. "Last year, Macy's was a ghost town here."

Other big winners at the Mall of America were the stores that heavily promoted and discounted: Wet Seal, Victoria's Secret, Coach and Bath & Body Works.

"In general, it's busier than last year, without a doubt," he said. "People are walking around with three to four bags — big bags — way more than last year."

Some shoppers chose to stay in their pajamas and shop on the Web. For the first time, many retailers had their Black Friday deals available online — some as early as Thanksgiving Day.

"It's definitely one of the first times we've noticed that retailers and Web sites are making more of a connection," said Kathy Grannis, a National Retail Federation spokeswoman.

But some of the deals may have been too good. Frustrated shoppers were turned off by long lines and slow Web sites.

Wal-Mart's Web site was jammed with traffic and shut down for parts of the day yesterday.

Baltimore residents Mike Hoffman, Lara Wolf and Erin Marsh looked defeated by 1 a.m. yesterday and ready to leave Leesburg Corner without any shopping bags.

"The lines are too long. It's not worth it," Mr. Hoffman said. "I'd rather pay full price than sit in these lines."

Others at Leesburg just wanted to see the madness of a shopping center opening at midnight.

"I guess I'm here just to say I've shopped at midnight," Leesburg, Va., resident Souzanne Al-Azm said a few minutes before midnight.

"This is our cardio," said Terri Hackenburg of Bethesda, before shopping with her sister, Stephanie. "We're burning off the turkey."

Some shoppers did well. The Riguals left Leesburg Corner at 4 a.m., with about 90 percent of their shopping list done.

"I think because we got there so early, we didn't fight traffic getting in, and one of us stood in line while the other one shopped around," Tracy Rigual said. "It was fun."

Attention, Holiday Shoppers: We Have Fisticuffs In Aisle 2 (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

Perhaps it should be renamed Black-and-Blue Friday.

For decades, the day after Thanksgiving has been called simply Black Friday, because it is the unofficial start of the holiday shopping season, when retailers supposedly move into the black, or start turning a profit.

But bargain hunters competing for scarce quantities of “doorbuster” discounts have given this day an increasingly sharp-elbowed, close-fisted and purse-swinging edge.

Shortly after midnight yesterday, an estimated 15,000 shoppers pushed and shoved their way into the Fashion Place mall in Murray, Utah. Police soon joined them, responding to reports of nine skirmishes.

Once inside, shoppers ransacked stores, overturning piles of clothes as they looked for bargains. A retailer’s dream — too many customers! — quickly turned into a nightmare, forcing store clerks to shut their doors, and only let people in after others left. The mall even briefly closed its outside doors to avoid a fire hazard.

At the Finish Line shoe store, one employee enlisted his mother, who happened to be shopping in the mall, to guard the entrance.

“We were not prepared for this,” said Amber Friedrichsen, the store’s manager.

DOJ_NMG_0098616

Customers behaved badly across the country yesterday, but the mayhem can be traced in part to an escalating battle among retailers to be the first to open their doors and offer the steepest must-have deals.

Many merchants angered shoppers by trumpeting huge discounts — like $70 portable DVD players and $600 flat-screen televisions — only to announce they were sold out moments after they opened.

The fact that so many people were sleep-deprived probably didn't help.

It was the earliest Black Friday on record. Trying to one-up its rivals, CompUSA started its annual Black Friday sales at 9 p.m. on Thursday, just as many Americans sat down for Thanksgiving dessert.

A dozen malls, from Utah to Maine, opened at midnight. And Wal-Mart, Best Buy and J. C. Penney began ringing up sales at 5 a.m. (A 6 a.m. opening at Target seemed so 2005.)

A final tally from yesterday's sales will not be available until tomorrow, at the earliest. But retail executives, who were constantly checking sales figures on their BlackBerrys yesterday, said the numbers suggested that the holiday season was off to a strong, if uncivil, start.

"I have not seen a crowd this size in years," said Terry J. Lundgren, the chief executive of Federated Department Stores, after surveying the lines outside Macy's Herald Square at 5:30 a.m.

Gerald L. Storch, the chief executive of Toys "R" Us, said reports from store managers around the country were the same: long lines at the checkout counter. "Sales results look really good," he said.

Merchants had been wringing their hands throughout the fall over higher gas prices and a weak housing market, worrying that they would make consumers wallet-shy in the crucial November-December period.

But with prices at the pump falling, the industry is now predicting an above-average holiday season.

The National Retail Federation, a trade group, has forecast a 5 percent sales increase, to $457.4 billion, over last year. That figure is well above the industry's performance from 2000 to 2002, when retail sales growth topped out at 3.4 percent. But it falls short of the last two seasons, when they rang up gains of more than 6 percent.

To lure customers, merchants dangled all sorts of discounts. Macy's, Sears, J. C. Penney and Kohl's all placed the same bet: that a $10 coupon on the front of their circulars would draw crowds. Gap offered 30 percent off everything if customers spent more than $50, and Kmart reduced the price of some apparel by 50 percent.

But once they were in the store, many customers heard a deflating message.

"Sold out, sold out, sold out," announced the manager at a Staples on Fifth Avenue in Manhattan yesterday at 7 a.m. "When?" asked the incredulous customer. "An hour ago," replied the manager — in other words, the minute the store opened.

In Lewis Center, Ohio, near Columbus, Cindy Milsap, 43, and her daughter, Ashley, 20, woke up before dawn to drive to the nearby Wal-Mart Supercenter, which advertised a 52-inch high-definition television for $474. "We don't really need a new TV, Ms. Milsap said. "But at that price? C'mon."

But the bargain eluded them. The "limited quantity" in the ad, she said, was three TVs — all sold by the time the pair arrived.

Those customers left in peace.

But at the Wal-Mart outside Columbus, customers dashing toward 5 a.m. deals pinned employees against stacks of merchandise.

"Oh, my god, stop pushing me, oh, my god," screamed Linda Tuttle, a 47-year-old employee at the store.

Grace Smith, a 22-year-old customer in the store, was stunned by the scene. "I heard it would be crazy but I never thought I'd see anything like this," she said.

Black Friday was once the province of a few hard-core bargain hunters, who camped outside stores waiting for deals. Stores barely advertised the event.

But over the last decade, retailers have begun treating the day after Thanksgiving as the biggest retail event of the year, wagering that the discounts offered that day influence perceptions about a store's prices throughout the holiday season.

Several years ago, the phrase "Black and Blue Friday" started creeping into the lexicon, as consumers became increasingly aggressive, and Black Friday has become even more of a contact sport since.

Electronics once again were the hottest items. At Best Buy, Game Spot and Toys "R" Us, customers pleaded for PlayStation 3 ($600) and Nintendo Wii ($250), two video game consoles introduced last week. But more often than not, stores had sold out, leaving consumers to turn to the season's remaining must-haves: portable DVD players, cashmere sweaters and satchel handbags.

And Elmo. Again.

At 6 a.m. yesterday morning in Times Square, a line of shoppers several hundred deep burst through the doors of Toys "R" Us and promptly formed a second, equally long line to buy the $40 T.M.X. Elmo (Tickle Me Elmo Version No. 10).

DOJ_NMG_0098617

The familiar Elmo-induced panic ensued — pushing, shouting, grabbing — until the dolls sold out and a frustrated crowd fanned out across the store in search of a substitute. “Complete madness,” said a 16-year-old, Ray Robinson, who snatched one of the last Elmos.

Mr. Storch of Toys “R” Us said demand for the furry red doll had exceeded the chain’s wildest projections and tested Mattel’s manufacturing capacity. “We’ll get more,” he said.

In cities like Chicago, Washington and St. Louis, yesterday was the beginning of the first holiday shopping season without storied local chains like Marshall Fields, Hecht’s and Famous-Barr, which have all become Macy’s. Consumers still showed up for the early-morning discounts, albeit grudgingly.

“I had sworn to myself that I wouldn’t cross the doorstep and come in here,” said one Chicago resident, Marilynne Felderman, 61, a longtime Marshall Field’s shopper, standing inside the chain’s elegant State Street store, now a Macy’s. “But here I am” — encouraged, no doubt, by deals like a five-piece luggage set for $49.99.

To take advantage of yesterday’s discounts, shoppers hatched elaborate strategies, drawn up on maps and in spiral-bound notebooks.

Stefanie Brooker, 41, slept over at the home of her friend, Michelle Wolfe, 43, so the pair could draw up a battle plan for hitting Best Buy, Kohl’s, Linens ’N Things and Toys “R” Us near Columbus. Yesterday morning, the two operated under strict instructions: “Once we get started,” Ms. Brooker said, “no one’s allowed to eat, drink or go to the bathroom until we are done.”

Clicking With Cyber Monday (WSJ)

By Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

Black Friday has come and gone. Now the online-shopping frenzy can begin in earnest.

The Monday after Thanksgiving -- dubbed Cyber Monday by the National Retail Federation -- is one of the year's busiest online-shopping days. This year, it kicks off a period of fierce competition among online merchants and traditional retailers' Web sites that promises shoppers more, and sometimes novel, ways to trim their holiday bills.

The number of online shoppers is expected to rise to nearly 115 million this holiday season, up 6% from a year ago, according to New York market-research firm Jupiter Research, and retailers are trying to capture their attention with a steady stream of deals.

With so many players one-upping each other with discounts and promotions, consumers can expect to find a broader range of prices online on any one item -- from digital cameras to luxury cashmere sweaters -- than they could by visiting dozens of stores.

Among the deals this year: online-only sales, rotating daily offers, and heavy doses of exclusive coupons and shipping upgrades targeted to repeat purchasers and email subscribers. Online-payment services, like PayPal and Google Checkout, are offering new incentives for using their services. Search engines that search for products across a broad range of retailer Web sites are brandishing new tools to help shoppers become more savvy.

These promotions come at a critical time of the year. Consumer spending in November and December last year was nearly 20% of the annual total, according to the Commerce Department. As high-speed Internet access proliferates and the number of online merchants continues to grow, Jupiter Research forecasts U.S. online holiday sales will reach $32 billion this year, up 18% from 2005. Americans will spend an average of $791.10 each on holiday merchandise this year, according to Shop.org, a division of the National Retail Federation.

Yet shopping online can cause additional costs and headaches. While more retailers offer free shipping, many do so only above certain thresholds, meaning it still may be wise to head to the store and avoid the temptation to unnecessarily boost your online order. Technical glitches and slow page-loading, while becoming less common, can still stall the process, particularly during peak traffic times. Online shoppers also open themselves up to the possibility of "phishing" attacks -- when scam artists pose as legitimate businesses -- and other forms of fraud.

Leading this year's online land grab are brick-and-mortar retailers, including Circuit City Stores Inc. and Gap Inc. They are turning heavily to Web-exclusive deals (up to 30% off winter accessories at Gap.com) to get customers to use their sites not only to research products but purchase them, too. To drive more traffic to its newly redesigned home page, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Monday will begin running online-only specials on items like flat-screen high-definition televisions, which it will be offering for less than $800, and digital cameras, which will be priced under $50.

To keep up with the discounting, established online retailers and smaller players are getting more creative, rapidly refreshing the deals and discounts they offer on their sites.

Seattle's Amazon.com Inc., which captured 14% of visits to the top 100 retail Web sites in October, according to research firm Hitwise, plans a new promotion every week for the next several weeks. In a further twist, customers get to vote on which promotion is offered, with four choices every week. Options currently include deals on items ranging from DVD players to diamond earrings.

Other retailers are offering a different deal every day. Petco Animal Supplies Inc. will start posting Web-only deals on Petco.com, including 25% off personalized dog collars, starting on Dec. 1. A different deal will be offered daily in each of six pet categories. Home Depot Inc. will soon switch on a "Hammer Drop" feature with a different deeply discounted item posted on its site every day, such as $70 off a set of tools originally priced at $649.

Traditional shopping search engines, which once displayed little more than a hodgepodge of deals combed from the Web, are getting more useful.

Yahoo Inc.'s Yahoo Shopping service now allows shoppers to sort merchandise by free shipping and other deal types. And a new breed of search engine, such as Become Inc.'s Become.com, TheFind Inc.'s TheFind.com and Mpire Inc.'s Mpire.com, offer such features as Zip code-based tax and shipping calculators and graphs that chart historical price information on the item you are searching for, to help predict whether it's likely to rise or fall.

Consumers also can find new deals through online-payment services. EBay Inc.'s payment unit PayPal is doling out rebates to members who use the service during the holiday season on certain Web sites. It also is partnering with selected merchants to give free shipping to those who use the service through Dec. 15. Google Inc.'s Google Checkout, a new service that stores credit-card and billing information to speed purchase time, is joining with some of its merchants, like Timberland, Ace Hardware and Sports Authority, to offer discounts.

Shoppers who lack the time to tune in to their favorite sites regularly now have more ways to ensure that the deals come directly to them. Home Depot, FAO Schwartz Inc. and Discovery Communications Inc.'s Discovery Channel Store are experimenting more aggressively with email marketing, offering exclusive deals like free-shipping and percentage-off coupons to those who provide their email addresses.

Jackie Andrews, a deputy court clerk from Hampton, Va., has spotted a bunch of online steals by subscribing to the email lists of retailers like Circuit City. Last year, after the electronics retailer told her about online holiday deals on MP3 players, she purchased one for her husband for less than $40. As a result, Ms. Andrews, 48 years old, plans to do more than half of her holiday shopping online this year, particularly because she can avoid lines at stores.

Some retailers are partnering with alternative-payment options, which often charge merchants lower fees than credit cards and are more widely accepted this year. EToys Direct Inc., an online toy merchant, reserves special promotions on eToys.com for customers who use Bill Me Later, a deferred-payment option accepted at some 425 online retailers. In the past few weeks, Bill Me Later, a unit of I4 Commerce Inc., launched a shopping engine that allows consumers to search for a particular product across merchants that accept the payment service.

But experts still warn that credit cards, which protect users from fraudulent charges, are the safest way to shop, particularly during the holiday season, when the risk of being scammed rises.

Stocks Weaken As Dollar's Fall Chills Investors (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

As shoppers hit stores in the post-Thanksgiving tradition, the stock market was rattled by a decline in the U.S. dollar, spurred in part by uncertainty about the economy's health.

Now, investors are looking ahead to economic data due out in the coming week for answers.

Capping a slow holiday-shortened week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average on Friday closed down 46.78 points, or 0.4%, at 12280.17, but still up 15% this year. The blue-chip average lost 62.39 points, or 0.5%, for the week, ending two consecutive weeks of gains.

The Dow industrials were down as much as 60 points in early trading following news of the dollar weakness against the euro. In late trading Friday in New York, the euro reached $1.3097, its highest level against the dollar in 20 months. Against the yen, the dollar fell to 115.81 yen from 116.74. The U.S. currency is now off 9.6% against the euro so far this year and down 1.8% against the yen.

Contributing to Friday's downturn were jitters about Friday's retail sales, said Charles Lieberman, chief investment officer at Advisors Capital Management in Paramus, N.J., though early data were limited. A fuller picture is due from retailers next week.

Among retail-company stocks, Best Buy fell 1.4% Friday and Target lost 1.2%. Home-improvement retailers also declined, with Lowe's down 1.1% and Home Depot off 1%.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 5.14 points, or 0.4%, to 1400.95, nearly flat for the week and up 12% this year. The tech-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite fell 5.72 points, or 0.2%, to 2460.26, up 0.6% for the week and 12% for the year-to-date.

DOJ_NMG_0098619

Stocks could continue to suffer for a time if retailers disappoint, said Romeo Dator, co-manager of All American Equity Fund at U.S. Global Investors in San Antonio, but he expects strong holiday sales overall. "We have pretty lofty expectations on consumer spending for Christmas," he said.

Slightly more than 514.7 million shares changed hands at the New York Stock Exchange in a shortened day on Friday, about a quarter its usual volume. (Overall, 853.4 million shares of NYSE-listed stocks traded.) Analysts warned that such low activity can create volatility, making it difficult to gauge the market's true direction. "I wouldn't want to take and interpolate today's action too much," said Mr. Dator. Citing a prolonged rally that has left the Dow up 15% on the year, he said, "In overbought conditions, any pullback is welcome."

Though a weaker dollar can raise fears of inflation and higher interest rates, Treasury-bond prices rose, and yields, which move in the opposite direction, fell.

Commodities prices rose, as they often do when the dollar falls. In electronic trading, gold futures climbed $9.60 to $638.60 an ounce and crude-oil futures rose 66 cents to $59.90 a barrel. Regular pit trading for both commodities was closed Friday.

The outlook for economy could become much clearer next week. Reports are due on sales of new and existing homes, consumer confidence, manufacturing activity, durable-goods demand and personal spending and income.

"Next week's numbers will go along way in determining whether or not the rally will continue into the final month of the year," Robert Pavlik, chief investment officer at Oaktree Asset Management, wrote in a note to clients.

But the month's biggest economic report -- the Labor Department's reading of November unemployment and nonfarm payrolls growth -- won't be released until the following week, meaning some investors might stay cautious a little while longer.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell. On the NYSE, 1,673 stocks rose and 1,416 declined.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note was up 3/32, or 93.8 cents per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.55%. The 30-year bond rose 7/32 to yield 4.63%.

The dollar weakened. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.3097 from $1.2938 late Thursday, and the dollar fell to 115.81 yen from 116.74.

Dollar Falls Sharply Against Euro As Economies Appear To Diverge (WSJ)

By Joanna Slater, Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The dollar fell sharply, breaking out of a recent tight trading range and hitting a 20-month low against the euro, spurred by concerns that the U.S. economy is slowing just as Europe's is revving up.

Late Friday in New York, it took $1.3097 to buy one euro, compared with $1.2942 a day earlier in global trading. The dollar's weakness also weighed on stocks, which fell in New York Stock Exchange trading in an abbreviated Thanksgiving holiday session.

Over the past week, data released in the U.S. and Europe have solidified perceptions that the two regions may be headed in opposite economic directions.

This coming week will be pivotal as trading levels return to normal and traders grapple with a raft of new data -- including U.S. durable-goods orders and consumer-spending figures -- looking to see if more evidence surfaces that the U.S. economy is slowing.

Signs that the U.S. and European economies are diverging will be good news for the rising euro, say observers. "It could be the start of something big," says Ken Wattret, chief euro zone economist at BNP Paribas in London. The euro's high against the dollar is $1.36, which it hit in December 2004.

Interest-rate expectations in the U.S. and Europe helped propel the latest currency swing. Some financial-market participants believe that the U.S. Federal Reserve could cut interest rates early next year, while the European Central Bank is widely expected to raise its key interest rate by another quarter point, to 3.5%, at its Dec. 7 meeting. Now markets are eager to see whether comments by ECB President Jean-Claude Trichet indicate that a further rate increase is possible in early 2007.

The dollar's recent drop took place amid widespread feeling among investors that the currency was due to weaken. Market watchers who are pessimistic on the dollar's prospects say the size of the U.S. current-account deficit is unsustainable and central bankers elsewhere in the world are debating whether to hold less of their reserves in dollars.

The U.S. Federal Reserve's pause in interest-rate hikes also has undermined support for the dollar, since higher interest rates make dollar-denominated assets, like bonds, more attractive to foreign investors.

Still, the dollar's newfound weakness is unlikely to raise alarms in Washington. The past week's sharp move has not triggered notable selling of other U.S. assets, a move that would be evidence of a more damaging loss of confidence in the dollar. Treasury bond prices rose slightly Friday and their yields, which move in the opposite direction of prices, declined. That suggests the dollar's drop is mostly a response to expectations that softer U.S. growth relative to Europe will lead to lower U.S. interest rates relative to Europe's.

In fact, the administration has privately welcomed the dollar's slow decline as one way of beginning to address the huge U.S. trade deficit. A weaker dollar generally makes U.S. goods more competitive against foreign products.

Currency analysts say the speed and size of the dollar's recent fall wasn't precipitated by a particular piece of economic news. "The magnitude of the move was triggered more by momentum than by a specific economic event," said Matthew Strauss, senior currency strategist at RBC Capital Markets in Toronto.

The dollar's slide against the euro is also affecting its relationship with Asian currencies, although not to the same degree. Japan's yen has appreciated against the dollar in recent days, for example.

If the dollar's weakness persists, investors should watch for Asian central banks intervening in the foreign-exchange market to prevent their currencies from appreciating too much, says Marc Chandler, global head of currency strategy at Brown Brothers Harriman.

U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has largely maintained a hands-off attitude toward the dollar, in keeping with the administration's belief that exchange rates are best set by competitive markets and not by verbal or real government intervention.

"I'd expect to see the dollar temper somewhat against ... the other reserve currencies in the world, and I think Treasury would be glad to see that happen because it would be in line with economic fundamentals," said Grant D. Aldonas, who early on in the administration spearheaded its China economic policy as undersecretary of commerce for international trade.

That said, in the case of China the U.S. has explicitly called for a stronger yuan -- and therefore a weaker dollar. Treasury officials believe that a stronger Chinese currency will do little to narrow the trade gap, but they hope that pressing China to allow the yuan to rise will quiet Beijing bashers in Congress who argue that the artificial weakness of the yuan hurts U.S. companies and workers.

Nonetheless, the recent slide in the dollar doesn't appear to have much to do with U.S. pressure on China or with expectations that Mr. Paulson's trip to Beijing next month will spark a sudden Chinese revaluation, according to Mr. Aldonas.

Dollar Falls Sharply Against Euro And Pound (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters, Carter Dougherty

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

The dollar dropped sharply yesterday against a range of major currencies, with the euro breaking through $1.30 for the first time in a year and a half. The fall highlighted concerns about softness in the American economy as economies abroad continue to expand.

The currency sell-off came as investors weighed a number of issues that complicate the prospects of the United States in the coming months, including a huge trade imbalance with China and a slowing domestic housing market. On top of that, economic growth in some European countries is gaining momentum, threatening to siphon investment away from the dollar.

The dollar’s losses came in a thin trading day in which the British pound rose to its strongest value against the dollar in two years. The euro traded at $1.3079 yesterday afternoon, up from $1.2941 on Thursday. The pound was trading at $1.9317, up from $1.9156.

Stocks closed lower on Wall Street yesterday after a shortened holiday trading session that was soured by news of the dollar’s woes.

“To dismiss this as a technical correction is to overlook the structural reasons why the U.S. dollar is having a very hard time these days,” said Hans Redeker, global head of currency strategy at BNP Paribas in London.

Economists say the United States is in a vulnerable position compared with its global competitors. While the most recent data show that the trade imbalance tightened in September, the decline was largely a result of falling oil prices. The deficit between what Americans import and export was a negative $586.2 billion for the first nine months of the year, and it remains on track to break last year’s record of a negative $716.7 billion. The biggest chunk by far represents imports from China.

The trade gap will be one of the major issues that Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. and other top Bush administration officials discuss next month when they travel to China. Mr. Paulson, along with a delegation that will include Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, is expected to press Chinese officials on a number of economic issues, from cracking down on piracy to allowing the Chinese yuan to trade more freely in currency markets.

Analysts said that the dollar’s drop yesterday, which was accelerated by orders from traders to sell automatically once it fell past $1.30 against the euro, reflected a growing anxiety over Chinese economic policy. China’s central bank holds a large amount of American currency, and speculation has intensified recently that it could begin selling off dollars to avoid being burned if the dollar collapses.

DOJ_NMG_0098621

Also lurking behind the dollar's depreciation is the rising probability, in the view of some economists and currency investors, that a slowing American economy will force the Federal Reserve to begin cutting borrowing costs next year.

Against the backdrop of a European Central Bank that seems determined to tighten rates further next year, the appeal of dollar-denominated assets is falling as the prospect of higher returns in Europe rises.

"There can be no doubt that the E.C.B. has more shots in its gun," said Erik Nielsen, chief Europe economist at Goldman Sachs in London. "If the Fed starts cutting next year, then the gap begins to widen."

Already, the European Central Bank has signaled that it will raise rates by a quarter percentage point, to 3.5 percent, on Dec. 7, and bank watchers have been voicing rising expectations of more rate increases after that.

This week, data on German business confidence, French economic growth in the third quarter and a historically reliable gauge of business sentiment in Belgium all pointed toward stronger growth. All these factors are more likely than not to push the European bank to raise interest rates in a bid to head off inflation, a course of action that would damp the appeal of the dollar in relation to the euro, currency specialists said.

"This drop in the dollar has been justified for some time," said Chris Turner, head of foreign exchange strategy at ING Baring in London. "The American economy could do more than simply land softly, and Europe is pretty strong right now."

But there was no single event yesterday to touch off such a sharp drop in the value of the dollar. Rather, economists said, it was a culmination of recent signs of weakness in the American economy that investors found troubling. Some experts said that could suggest that the dollar's losses would deepen.

Julian Jessop, chief international economist for Capital Economics in London, said in a research note yesterday that the sudden drop in the dollar was "an indication of a much more fundamental lack of support for the currency." He said this suggests that "the falls will be all the larger once the markets do start to anticipate persistently sluggish growth."

Markets Rocked By Sharp Slide In Dollar (FT)

By Neil Dennis, Chris Giles, Ralph Atkins

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

A sharpening slide in the US dollar unnerved global markets on Friday as investors sought to protect themselves from the possibility of sustained dollar weakness.

As US markets were closing on Friday , the euro stood at a 19-month high of $1.309, up 1.2 per cent, while sterling gained 0.9 per cent to a 1½-year peak of $1.9333. The yen climbed 0.5 per cent to ¥115.66.

European and Asian stock markets suffered the fallout from the dollar's decline with exporters to the US the worst performing stocks in all regions. But on commodity markets, dollar-denominated prices tracked higher as gold, copper and oil became cheaper in other currencies.

The euro's strength could put the European Central Bank under fresh political pressure not to raise interest rates again after the expected quarter percentage point rise to 3.5 per cent on December 7.

The dollar has now fallen this year by more than 10 per cent against the euro and 12 per cent against sterling. Some economists suggest the greenback has further to slide given a weak economic outlook in the US, and the prospect of interest rate cuts there next year.

Steve Saywell, currencies analyst at Citigroup, said: "While the economic data remain soft, the dollar will continue to fall."

The gaping US trade deficit, the near certainty of a December rise in eurozone interest rates, rising expectations of a cut in US rates in the spring and wariness about borrowing in yen to finance investments in the US all continued to weigh on the dollar, analysts said.

These concerns were heightened by comments from Wu Xiaoling, deputy governor of the People's Bank of China, indicating her unease at the rapid build-up of $1,000bn of reserves in China. She said Asian foreign exchange reserves were at risk from the dollar's fall, although she stopped short of indicating that China was about to stop adding to its pile of reserves.

"The dollar is coming under real pressure and this looks like the beginning of a sustained move," said Ian Stannard, strategist at BNP Paribas.

Equities markets in Europe and Asia fell sharply. Tokyo's Nikkei 225 fell 1.1 per cent to 15,734.6, while the FTSE Eurofirst 300 shed 0.8 per cent to 1,451.05.

Commodities tracked higher, with gold climbing 1.2 per cent to $638.50 a troy ounce, while copper added 2.5 per cent to $7,155 a tonne. Nymex crude gained 1.1 per cent to $59.90.

Housing Falling Behind On Payments (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098622

While economists debate whether the U.S. housing slump is almost over or just getting started, one corner of the market is showing rapid deterioration: Many recent subprime borrowers are falling behind on their payments.

The latest snapshot of the housing market will come Tuesday, when the National Association of Realtors is due to report on October sales of previously occupied homes. Thomas Lawler, a housing economist in Vienna, Va., believes the Realtors will report a decline in median prices of as much as 5% from a year before. On Wednesday, the government will issue its monthly report on new-home sales.

So far, the economy has weathered the housing downturn with few problems. Rising incomes and stock prices, low interest rates and falling energy costs have helped consumers cope with the psychological blow of declining home prices in many parts of the country. The more bullish analysts believe house prices will start rising again before the end of 2007.

Even if the housing downturn is brief, though, the pain will linger for people who borrowed too heavily to buy homes near the top of the market. David Liu, an analyst at UBS AG in New York, released a report this past week on a worrisome trend in subprime mortgages, those for people with blemished credit histories. As of Oct. 31, borrowers were 60 days or more behind in payments on nearly 4% of the subprime home loans packaged into mortgage securities this year. That's about twice the delinquency rate on new subprime loans recorded a year earlier.

The weak housing market makes life tougher for subprime borrowers. If they run into financial trouble, it's no longer so easy to sell their homes for enough money to repay the loan, meaning more face foreclosure. Mr. Liu also blames looser credit policies by lenders trying to make up for shrinking profit margins by offering more loans to riskier borrowers. Some of the worst performances are coming on the types of mortgages that don't require borrowers to document their income and assets -- known colloquially as "liars' loans."

Delinquent subprime loans are particularly common in cities like Detroit, which has been hit by huge job losses. But they're also above the national average in such metro areas as Boston, Sacramento and San Diego, where home prices have been falling after huge leaps in the first half of this decade, Mr. Liu found. "California is no longer a safe haven" for mortgage lenders and investors, he says.

Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com, says losses on foreclosures and regulatory pressure will make lenders more cautious. That's unlikely to cause a recession, he says, but it will help restrain housing demand in the next couple of years.

Missed Mortgage Payments Rise 20% In Third Quarter (NYT)

By Christine Haughney

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

In the third quarter of this year, the number of city residents who had missed more than three months of mortgage payments jumped by 20 percent compared with the same quarter a year ago. Still, New Yorkers often have more time to try to hold onto their homes than homeowners in the rest of the country.

Data collected by PropertyShark .com, a real estate data company based in Brooklyn, shows that 1,468 city homeowners missed mortgage payments from July to September, compared with 1,220 in the comparable period last year. That puts them in what is commonly known as preforeclosure, when banks typically warn people that they are at risk of foreclosure so the homeowner will take steps to catch up on the payments. But while more homeowners are in the danger zone, more have also been able to avoid foreclosure. In New York City, lenders foreclosed on 425 homes in the third quarter of 2006, compared with 545 in the year-ago period. (The city has 3,018,000 homeowners.)

John McIlwain, a senior fellow for housing at the Urban Land Institute, a nonprofit planning and research group in Washington, said of the jump in preforeclosures, “It’s a warning sign, but it’s not yet a serious problem in terms of the market.”

The neighborhoods with the highest number of preforeclosures are in Brooklyn and Queens. The Canarsie and Flatbush neighborhoods of Brooklyn had the largest number last quarter, with 37. Elsewhere in Brooklyn, Bedford-Stuyvesant had 32 preforeclosures and East New York had 31. Jamaica, Queens, had 31 preforeclosures. The same neighborhoods had the most preforeclosures the year before.

State laws give New Yorkers an advantage over homeowners elsewhere. According to PropertyShark’s chief executive, Ryan Slack, New York courts typically consider the buyer of the property to be the owner, while California treats the bank that holds that mortgage as the owner.

Banks in California can foreclose on a property and take it back in roughly seven months, but banks in New York have to go through a legal battle that can take more than two years.

That means that New Yorkers have more time to find ways to hold onto their homes.

“There are a lot of things you can do between the time you stop paying your mortgage and the time they can take it away from you,” Mr. Slack said.

Homeowners in Manhattan are less likely than those in other boroughs to lose their homes because they have often put up more money and because they can use the rising values of their homes as bargaining chips with lenders, Mr. McIlwain said.

Because Manhattan homeowners have amassed considerable resources to break into the condominium or co-op market in the first place, they can usually make their mortgage payments even if they lose their jobs or suffer an illness, he said. With divorce, those are the leading causes of foreclosure, he said.

"There's just a lot more flexibility there," Mr. McIlwain said. "People — instead of going to delinquency or foreclosure — can sell their property and avoid the mark on their credit. There's also an ability to take out an equity loan."

In many cases, banks warn homeowners that they are falling behind, in hopes of giving them time to catch up on their payments.

Last year, Guillermina Edwards, a 50-year-old bookkeeper, missed mortgage payments on the Flatbush home he has owned for 20 years when he had to pay for airline tickets and a funeral after a relative died abroad.

In December 2005, he was placed in preforeclosure, but as soon as he caught up with his payments, he said, the bank left him alone.

"They're just harassing you," he says. "I didn't refinance or anything. You just pay back the months that you owe."

Pension Plan In Ontario Is Buying Ports In U.S. And Canada (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

TORONTO, Nov. 24 (AP) — The Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan agreed to buy two marine container terminals in the New York area and two in British Columbia from Orient Overseas (International) for $2.4 billion.

The Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan, one of Canada's largest institutional investors, said the deal with Orient Overseas, based in Hong Kong, is still subject to Canadian and United States regulatory approvals.

The terminals involved are the New York Container Terminal on Staten Island and Global Terminal and Container Systems at Bayonne, N.J. The deal also includes TSI Terminal Systems' Deltaport and Vanterm facilities on Canada's Pacific coast.

Once the deal is completed, the terminals will nearly double the value of the plan's infrastructure and timber portfolio to $6.5 billion — about 8 percent of the plan's total assets.

"This acquisition represents solid, robust assets, has little vulnerability to market or economic vagaries and features a very attractive growth profile that we will support and will serve us well into the future," James Leech, senior vice president of Teachers' Private Capital, the pension plan's private investment arm, said in a statement.

Combined annual sales of the operations total approximately $500 million. The terminals include equipment to either load shipping containers onto ships from trucks or trains or unload them from ships for transport by land to their destinations.

Orient Overseas is part of a transport and logistics group that has offices in 58 countries.

The transaction is expected to be completed by the end of the first quarter of 2007, after receiving the necessary regulatory and shareholder approvals.

The Ontario Teachers' Pension Plan has $84 billion in assets under management and administers the pensions of Ontario's 163,000 elementary and secondary school teachers and 101,000 retired teachers.

Kremlin Critic's Death Unnerves Putin Opponents (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

The death of a prominent Kremlin critic by radioactive poisoning in London, coming weeks after the killing of a well-known independent journalist in Moscow and the harassment of opposition politicians, is fueling fears that opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin could face even more pressure before a transfer of presidential power in 2008.

Mr. Putin denied the Kremlin played a role in the death of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko, which Mr. Putin called tragic. But at the same time, he accused his critics of a "political provocation."

In a letter released after his death Thursday evening, Mr. Litvinenko, who fled to Britain in 2000 to escape criminal charges in Russia, blamed a "barbaric and ruthless" President Putin for poisoning him in what Mr. Litvinenko said was an effort to silence critics. (Read his statement.)

"The risks are growing," said Vladimir Ryzhkov, an independent deputy in the lower house of Russia's Parliament who is frequently critical of the Kremlin. "For the first time in my political career I'm beginning to feel scared."

Mr. Litvinenko's death comes amid a deepening chill in relations with the West -- which has been uneasy with the Kremlin's steady tightening of control over Russian society -- and irritated by Moscow's foreign-policy moves. Moscow has frustrated Washington, for example, with its reluctance to take harsher moves to pressure Iran to give up its nuclear ambitions. Friday,

Russia's Defense Ministry announced it was beginning deliveries of antiaircraft missiles to Iran, even as the U.S. and Europe have sought to isolate the government in Tehran.

At a news conference in Finland after a tense summit Friday with European leaders, Mr. Putin said, "A death of a man is always a tragedy, and I give my condolences to Mr. Litvinenko's loved ones." He added, "It's extremely regrettable that such a tragic event as death is being used for political provocation."

In Moscow, some senior Russian legislators called Mr. Litvinenko's death a publicity stunt organized to discredit the Kremlin. They suggested the perpetrator was Boris Berezovsky, a deposed Russian tycoon, now living in London, who has said he would like to overthrow Mr. Putin's government.

Mr. Litvinenko, 43 years old, told police he believed he had been poisoned Nov. 1 while investigating the October slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another critic of Mr. Putin's government.

Doctors in London were hampered in treating Mr. Litvinenko because they were unable to identify the poison used against him. After his death, health authorities said Mr. Litvinenko's body had been exposed to large amounts of radiation from a rare substance called polonium 210. The substance is harmless outside the body but highly toxic if ingested. Investigators from Britain's antiterrorist police found traces at Mr. Litvinenko's home and a sushi restaurant and hotel in central London he had visited shortly before he fell ill. (Read the Health Protection Agency's statement.1)

Polonium 210 had been used in the Soviet space program, and today has a few commercial uses, such as removing static electricity and measuring other forms of radiation. "It's hard to obtain," said Derek Lohmann, a research chemist. "You generally require a nuclear reactor to produce it."

U.K. Home Secretary John Reid held a meeting of the government's emergency committee Friday to discuss Mr. Litvinenko's death, and U.K. diplomats asked Russia's ambassador to provide all assistance necessary to the police probe. Mr. Putin pledged to cooperate fully.

Irina Khakamada, a Russian opposition leader, said the political environment in Moscow has become edgy particularly since the Politkovskaya murder. She said some question whether Mr. Putin is fully in control of his Kremlin entourage as they angle for power before the end of his presidential term in 2008. While some factions may try to gain power themselves, others are trying to curry favor or encourage him to defy the Russian constitution and stay on for a third term.

Mr. Litvinenko, a former colonel in Russia's security service, was a longtime irritant to Mr. Putin. He publicly accused his superiors of ordering him to kill Mr. Berezovsky in 1998. Later, Mr. Litvinenko spent nine months in jail from 1999 on charges of abuse of office.

He was later acquitted, but, facing a retrial, he sought asylum in Britain. There he wrote a book accusing Mr. Putin of coming to power by organizing a series of apartment bombings in 1999 that prompted Russia's invasion of Chechnya.

Sergei Dorenko, a Moscow-based journalist and friend of Mr. Litvinenko, said Mr. Litvinenko told him that the Kremlin in 2003 had offered him safety from prosecution if he were to return home, but that he would be killed if he stayed in London.

London Riddle: A Russian Spy, A Lethal Dose (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 24 — Radiation poisoning killed Alexander V. Litvinenko, the former Russian K.G.B. officer and foe of the Kremlin, authorities here said Friday, further complicating a case that has taken on all the mystery and menace of a political thriller.

From his deathbed, Mr. Litvinenko's family said, he had accused President Vladimir V. Putin of being behind his poisoning. Outside the hospital where he died late Thursday, alarm spread across London after the police found traces of radiation in three places the former spy had been: a sushi bar, a hotel and his North London home.

Scientists were astounded at the use of the rare and hard-to-produce substance, polonium 210, which is dangerous when breathed, injected or ingested. All the while, diplomats scurried to prevent the case from becoming an international incident.

The cause of his death was so unusual, so baffling and so chilling that a senior British official called it "unprecedented." The government called a high-level meeting restricted to the most senior ministers — codenamed Cobra — and the Russian ambassador was summoned to the Foreign Office. Rebutting the accusations of foul play, Russian officials hinted at a devious conspiracy to discredit President Putin.

The former agent's family, citing what they called a statement dictated by the dying Mr. Litvinenko, accused President Putin of a "barbaric and ruthless" murder — a charge the Russian leader promptly rejected. Mr. Litvinenko's father, Walter, also accused Russian authorities of responsibility, and said his 43-year-old son, who had been inquiring into the killing of a journalist in Moscow last month, was "killed by a little, tiny nuclear bomb."

But the British police said they were treating the case as an “unexplained death” — displaying some caution about calling it a murder inquiry.

Photographs of the dying Mr. Litvinenko showed him hairless and gaunt, wearing a green gown and lying in a hospital bed. Friends who visited him before his death said he had looked ghostly, far removed from the fit figure he presented just weeks ago. Developments in the case over the past week have tantalized Britons, confronting them with the notion that their land might have been used as a theater for sinister machinations more familiar in a James Bond movie.

Mr. Litvinenko’s slow and inexorable death was among the most bizarre since Georgi Markov, a Bulgarian dissident, was murdered in London with a jab from a poison-tipped umbrella in 1978.

It is not the first time that modern-day Russia has been suspected in a prominent poisoning in a foreign land. Doctors said that the Ukrainian president, Viktor A. Yushchenko — who campaigned in 2004 to move Ukraine away from Russian influence and forge closer ties with the European Union — was poisoned with dioxin when he was running for office, leaving his face badly disfigured. Russia, as well as an array of Mr. Yushchenko’s political adversaries, was suspected in the poisoning, but the matter was never resolved.

Word of a possible radiation attack, using what officials identified as polonium 210, a highly radioactive isotope, raised fears of contamination, though many Londoners seemed to take word of the official alert with a degree of stoicism, or even indifference, on a damp Friday evening.

“Spy Radiation: Major Alert,” said a banner headline in The Evening Standard. Still, inured to such scares by acts of terrorism in their city, including the bombings in July 2005 by Islamic militants, many seemed to shrug off the news.

The police searched several locations that Mr. Litvinenko had visited in early November— the Itsu sushi bar on Piccadilly, his home in the white-collar Muswell Hill neighborhood of north London and the Mayfair Millennium Hotel near the American Embassy in Grosvenor Square — and said they had found radioactive traces at each of them. Television showed plainclothes officers carrying away a metal box and several tote bags of evidence from the Itsu restaurant.

At the Mayfair Millennium Hotel, where the lobby and bar were chock-full, the health and safety manager, Brian Kelly, seemed to play down the alarm. “If we had a radiation problem here, do you think my restaurant and bar would be so full of people?” he said.

The authorities said they were also trying to find nurses and other medical staff who had treated Mr. Litvinenko since he began to complain of an unspecified illness on Nov. 1, in case they had been contaminated.

Roger Cox, the director of the Health Protection Agency’s center for radiation, chemicals and environmental hazards, said a large quantity of alpha radiation had been found in Mr. Litvinenko’s urine. Referring to the effects of polonium 210, he said: “If that enters the body by ingestion, then it will rapidly track through the body and go to most major organs,” causing “tissue damage characteristic of radiation.”

It was not immediately known why it had taken so long for the source of Mr. Litvinenko’s poisoning to become clear. Medical authorities denied earlier reports that Mr. Litvinenko had been poisoned by thallium, a toxic metal.

At a news conference on Friday, Dr. Pat Troop, the Health Protection Agency’s chief executive, described Mr. Litvinenko’s death as “an unprecedented event in the U.K., in that someone has apparently been poisoned by a type of radiation.”

A British counterterrorism official said polonium 210 was a byproduct of the nuclear industry and is used in the production of antistatic materials. But in the form believed to have been used in the suspected poisoning, it would have required high-grade technical skills and a sophisticated scientific process to produce, probably within a nuclear lab.

The official, who spoke in return for anonymity because the case had not yet been resolved, declined to comment on efforts to locate possible sources of the substance. The investigation would be difficult for the police because, for instance, at the Itsu sushi bar “thousands of people will have passed through since he was there,” the official said.

Mr. Litvinenko was a former operative in the K.G.B. who became a colonel in its successor organization, known by its Russian initials as the F.S.B. In the late 1990s, Mr. Litvinenko said publicly that he had been ordered to assassinate Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon, but had refused to do so. He fled to Britain and secured British citizenship earlier this year. In 2003, he wrote a book accusing the Russian secret service of orchestrating apartment house bombings in Russia in 1999 that led to the second Chechen war.

Since his illness became known last week, his friends have depicted his poisoning as an officially sanctioned reprisal for his criticism of the Kremlin and his efforts to investigate the fatal shooting of Anna Politkovskaya, a prominent Russian journalist.

Before news broke of the radiation poisoning, Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Mr. Litvinenko, read what was described as the former spy’s deathbed statement, addressed largely to President Putin.

“You may succeed in silencing me, but that silence comes at a price,” the statement read. “You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed.”

DOJ_NMG_0098626

"You have shown yourself to have no respect for life, liberty or any civilized value," the statement said. "May God forgive you for what you have done, not only to me but to beloved Russia and its people."

Mr. Litvinenko's death threatened to strain relations between Britain and Russia, but Britain sought to avert a major crisis. A Foreign Office official, who spoke in return for customary anonymity, said the Russian ambassador here, Yury V. Fedotov, was called to the Foreign Office on Friday and told that "police were pursuing their investigations and the situation was now more serious."

British officials wanted Russia to help the inquiry with any information it might have about the case, the official said.

Mr. Putin found himself on the defensive when he appeared in Helsinki, Finland, after a meeting with leaders of the European Union, as he had been when he traveled in Europe following the death of Ms. Politkovskaya.

He called Mr. Litvinenko's death a tragedy, but suggested that there was "no indication that it was a violent death," citing what he said was a British medical report. He called for an investigation and pledged the assistance of Russian authorities.

"I hope that the British authorities will not contribute to the fanning up of political scandals having no real grounds," he said in remarks televised in Russia.

Mr. Putin also brushed aside the significance of Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning, suggesting his death was being used for political purposes.

"Those who did it are not the Lord, and Mr. Litvinenko is not Lazarus," he went on. "It is regretful that even such a tragic event as the death of a human being is being used for political provocation."

Andrei Lugovoi, a former K.G.B. colleague who met Mr. Litvinenko in London, denied in a radio interview on Friday that he or a colleague, Dmitry Kovtun, had any part in poisoning him. Speaking on Ekho Moskvy, an independent Russian radio station, Mr. Lugovoi said that he and Mr. Kovtun had met Mr. Litvinenko at a hotel in London on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill, and had discussed business for 20 to 30 minutes.

"He did not order anything," he said. "We did not pour anything for him."

Mr. Lugovoi, now in Moscow, went on to stress that he did not believe Mr. Litvinenko suspected either man while he was ill, and that he had spoken with him on Nov. 7 and Nov. 13. "We had normal, regular conversations," he said. "Nobody accused anybody."

The British police said the investigation was being headed by the counterterrorism command, led by Peter Clarke, an officer normally associated with inquiries into Islamic terrorism.

In a statement on Friday, Mr. Clarke said no arrests had been made, but promised a thorough inquiry. He spoke after the government announced that it had held a meeting of its closed-door Cobra group of top ministers. The code stands for the somewhat more prosaic "Cabinet Office Briefing Room A" in Whitehall, where such gatherings are held.

While Mr. Litvinenko's friends have accused President Putin, the Russian leader's own supporters have hinted at a conspiracy of a different nature.

In Helsinki, where the poisoning overshadowed efforts to resolve disagreements on European-Russian relations, Mr. Putin's aide in charge of European affairs, Sergei V. Yastrzhembsky, said: "What is alarming is the eye-striking, excessive number of deliberate coincidences of high-profiling deaths of people who positioned themselves as opponents to the existing Russian government with international events in which the Russian president takes part."

He added that Russia faced "a well-orchestrated campaign or a plan to consistently discredit Russia and its leader," according to the Interfax news agency.

Radioactive Poison Killed Ex-Spy (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Peter Finn

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 24 -- Former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko was fatally poisoned by a radioactive substance, traces of which were found in his urine, at his home and at a London restaurant and hotel he visited the day he became ill, according to the British health department. It called the case "unprecedented" in Britain.

Authorities closed the restaurant and sealed off part of the hotel Friday as part of an emergency effort to trace the substance, polonium 210, and ensure that it does not harm other people. Litvinenko would have eaten, inhaled or received it through a wound, according to Pat Troop, chief executive of Britain's Health Protection Agency.

Coming after the mysterious poisoning of another prominent opponent of the Kremlin, Ukrainian politician Viktor Yushchenko, the death provoked accusations that Russia continues to use Cold War-style tactics to eliminate critics abroad. London was the scene of the 1978 assassination of a Bulgarian dissident who was killed by a jab from a umbrella tip bearing the toxin ricin.

Litvinenko blamed the Kremlin shortly before he died, according to friends and family members. "As I lie here I can distinctly hear the beating of wings of the angel of death," Litvinenko, 43, said in a dictated statement, according to friend Alex Goldfarb, who met reporters while accompanied by Litvinenko's tearful father.

"You may succeed in silencing one man but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life," the statement said. "May God forgive you for what you have done, not only to me but to beloved Russia and its people."

Kremlin and Russian security service officials have denied any involvement in the poisoning of Litvinenko, who fled to Britain in 2000 after publicly accusing the security service of involvement in the bombings of two apartment buildings in Russia in 1999 in which 300 people died. Litvinenko had been investigating the murder last month of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another critic of the Putin government.

Litvinenko's death complicated a summit in Helsinki between Putin and European Union leaders. Speaking there, the Russian president called Litvinenko's death a tragedy, expressing his condolences and pledging his country's cooperation in the investigation.

Addressing allegations that he had ordered the assassination to silence a troublesome critic, Putin said, "I hope the British authorities won't fuel groundless political scandals." He added, "It is a great pity that even such tragic things as human death are used for political provocations."

Putin questioned why Litvinenko's deathbed note had not been made public before he died. Putin also said there was no official finding that Litvinenko had been murdered. "As I know, the medical certificate of British doctors does not indicate that he died a violent death," Putin said. "It does not say that. Hence there is no reason for such talk at all."

Troop, the British health chief, said no autopsy had been conducted. She did not say why, but the BBC reported that "the delay is believed to be over concerns about the health implications for those present at the examination."

Roger Cox, another health agency official, told reporters that radiation emitted by the polonium had been detected in Litvinenko's urine.

John Henry, a toxicologist who was asked by Litvinenko's family to look into the case and who examined Litvinenko before his death, said the type of polonium involved is "only found in government-controlled institutions." In an interview, Henry called polonium 210 an "extraordinary poison" that is lethal in doses so small, "you can lose it on the point of a pin."

Henry, who took part in the investigation of the 2004 poisoning of Ukraine's Yushchenko, then opposition leader and now the president, said that polonium 210 "kills cell by cell" and that once it is administered, there's "absolutely nothing" that can be done to save the exposed person.

Peter Clarke, head of Scotland Yard's anti-terrorism branch, which is leading the investigation, said police are studying closed-circuit television surveillance footage of the places in central London that Litvinenko visited Nov. 1, the day he became ill.

In Friday interviews with Russian news media, a Russian man who met with Litvinenko that day said he had been questioned by British officials in Moscow and denied involvement in the case.

Andrei Lugovoy, a former Russian security agent, said Litvinenko called him and invited him to a meeting to discuss business contacts. He said that he and two other men, including one named Dmitry Kovtun, met with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel on Grosvenor Square near the U.S. Embassy.

He said Litvinenko did not eat or drink anything during their 20- to 30-minute meeting. "I'm surprised by how hysterically some are trying to tie me to this," Lugovoy said.

Police said Friday night that part of that hotel as well as the Itsu sushi restaurant that Litvinenko visited had been closed while the investigation continued.

From London to Moscow, people were trying to sort out who stood to benefit from Litvinenko's death.

Litvinenko's supporters say Putin benefits by eliminating a fierce critic. Kremlin defenders say it is not Putin, but rather the Russian leader's enemies who gain. The fierce anti-Putin circle in London, including exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, has seized on the poisoning as a way to smear Putin's reputation internationally, they said.

Nikolai Kovalyov, chairman of the veterans committee of the lower house of the Russian parliament, told the Interfax news agency: "Doubtlessly, it did not benefit Russia and its special services. . . . It is not in our interests at all."

Kovalyov, who once headed the Federal Security Service, the domestic successor to the KGB, added that other "defectors who did incomparably more harm to Russia than Litvinenko continue to live in the West safe and sound."

Putin Denies Role In Death Of Ex-spy (FT)

By Jimmy Burns, Stephen Fidler, Frederick Studemann

Financial Times, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098628

Vladimir Putin was on Friday forced into a public denial of responsibility for the death of the former Russian intelligence officer Alexander Litvinenko, after British authorities said the ex-spy had been poisoned by highly radioactive polonium 210.

The UK Foreign Office said it had raised the incident with the Russian ambassador after British authorities said they knew of no precedent for such a killing.

Litvinenko died in a London hospital on Thursday night, and a statement he is said to have dictated on Tuesday night blamed the Russian president.

"You succeeded in silencing one man but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life," said the statement, read publicly on Friday by a friend, Alexander Goldfarb. "You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed."

As Kremlin officials vigorously denied official Russian involvement, Mr Putin was forced to answer questions about Litvinenko's death while at an EU/Russia summit in Helsinki.

"There is no grounds for speculation of this kind," Mr Putin said, adding that talk of his government being involved "has nothing to do with reality". He expressed his sympathy for Mr Litvinenko's family, but added that he hoped Britain would not seek to create a "political scandal" over the death.

Mr Putin added: "As far as I understand from the medical statement, it does not say this was the result of a violence."

He also expressed doubts as to the authenticity of the declaration. He said he was "unclear" why, if the statement had been written while Mr Litvinenko was still alive, it had not been reported at that time.

In a rare televised appearance, a spokesman for Russia's SVR foreign intelligence service also reiterated its denials of responsibility. "Probably someone wanted to make a splash out of this, but it's difficult to say who," he said.

Last night, three places in London visited by Mr Litvinenko before he died – a restaurant, his home and sections of a hotel – were sealed off and police said they had found traces of the isotope at each location.

Polonium 210 emits 5,000 times more alpha radiation than radium and a microscopic dose can be lethal if ingested. It has a number of uses, including as nuclear bomb triggers, nuclear batteries and, more frequently, in static electricity eliminators.

The Soviet-era predecessor to Russia's intelligence services, the KGB, used radioactive substances to assassinate opponents, but British experts said they knew of no precedent for the use of polonium. In 1957, in an incident with reverberations in the Litvinenko case, the KGB tried to kill a defector, Nikolai Kholkhov, using radioactive thallium. He suffered horrific symptoms but he survived.

Andrei Nekrasov, a Russian film-maker and friend of Mr Litvinenko, said that his death was "clearly intentional - no doubt about that".

He said Mr Litvinenko was convinced it was the FSB, Russia's domestic intelligence service, that had killed him but that there was no proof. Mr Litvinenko had said that "they were threatening him" and that poisoning would be completely in their style.

Mr Nekrasov said that a recent law passed by the Duma allowing Russian intelligence to eliminate Russia's enemies abroad effectively gave licence to Mr Litvinenko's enemies. "They hated him for going public on all these issues," he said.

Poisoned Spy Blames Putin For His Death (AP)

By Jill Lawless, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

A rare radioactive substance killed an ex-KGB spy turned Kremlin critic, the British government said Friday. In a dramatic statement written before he died, the man called Russian President Vladimir Putin "barbaric and ruthless" and blamed him personally for the poisoning.

Putin, in Finland, offered his condolences for the death of Alexander Litvinenko and denied any involvement. He called the release of the deathbed statement a "political provocation" by his opponents.

Litvinenko died late Thursday at a London hospital after spending days in intensive care as doctors puzzled over what was causing his organs to fail and attacking his bone marrow and destroying his immune system.

Britain's Health Protection Agency said Friday that the radioactive element polonium-210 had been found in his urine, and the police said traces of radiation were found at Litvinenko's home and a ritzy hotel bar and sushi restaurant he visited on the day he became ill.

Police said they were treating the case as an "unexplained death" — but not yet as a murder.

The 43-year-old Litvinenko, who fiercely criticized Putin's government from his refuge in London since 2000, told police he believed he was poisoned Nov. 1 while investigating the October slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, another critic of Putin.

Litvinenko's statement, read by his friend Alex Goldfarb to reporters outside the hospital, put the blame for his death squarely on Putin.

DOJ_NMG_0098629

He accused Putin of having "no respect for life, liberty or any civilized value."

"You may succeed in silencing me but that silence comes at a price. You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed," the statement said.

"You may succeed in silencing one man but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life."

Goldfarb said Litvinenko dictated the statement before he lost consciousness Tuesday, and signed it in the presence of his wife, Marina.

Putin strongly denied involvement by his government.

"A death of a man is always a tragedy and I deplore this," the Russian leader said when asked about Litvinenko during a news conference after a meeting with European Union leaders.

Putin said the fact that Litvinenko's statement was released only after his death showed it was a provocation. "It's extremely regrettable that such a tragic event as death is being used for political provocation," he said.

At a meeting Friday with Russian Ambassador Yury Fedotov at London's Foreign Office, British diplomats asked Moscow to provide all assistance necessary to a police inquiry into the death, government officials said. Putin pledged to cooperate.

Home Secretary John Reid convened the British government's crisis committee Friday to discuss the death, a Cabinet Office spokeswoman said. Prime Minister Tony Blair's Downing Street office said he was in Scotland and did not attend.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said the United States has sought information on the case from British authorities. "We have been told that they have no definitive conclusions and that they are conducting an investigation," Casey said.

The Health Protection Agency described poisoning with polonium-210 as "an unprecedented event."

"I've been in radiation sciences for 30-odd years and I'm not aware of any such incident," said Roger Cox, director of the agency's center for radiation, chemicals and environmental hazards.

The agency's chief executive, Pat Troop, said the high level of polonium-210 indicated Litvinenko "would either have to have eaten it, inhaled it or taken it in through a wound."

Troop said the agency was evaluating whether it was safe to perform an autopsy.

Peter Clarke, head of London's anti-terrorist police, said officers and military radiation experts were searching several locations in London. A police statement later said at least five locations were being checked, but did not identify two of them.

Traces of radiation had been found at Litvinenko's north London house, the sushi restaurant where he met a contact Nov. 1 and a hotel he visited earlier that day, Clarke said. The restaurant and part of the hotel were closed, with officers removing materials in heavy metal boxes.

Clarke said extensive tests by forensic toxicologists on behalf of police — which began before Litvinenko's death — had on Friday confirmed the presence of polonium-210.

"There is no risk to the public unless they came into close contact with the men or their meals," said Katherine Lewis, a spokeswoman for the Health Protection Agency.

Experts said small amounts of polonium-210 — but not enough to kill someone — are used legitimately in Britain and elsewhere for industrial purposes.

Professor Dudley Goodhead, a radiation expert at the Medical Research Council, said that "to poison someone, much larger amounts are required and this would have to be manmade, perhaps from a particle accelerator or a nuclear reactor."

Chris Lloyd, a British radiation protection adviser, said it would be relatively easy to smuggle polonium into the country, because its alpha radiation would not set off radiation detectors.

Doctors treating Litvinenko had said Thursday that they could not explain his rapid decline. They discounted earlier theories that the father of three had been poisoned with the toxic metal thallium.

Lewis, the Health Protection Agency spokeswoman, said doctors had not discovered the presence of polonium-210 in Litvinenko earlier because hospitals do not normally test for the alpha-ray radiation it emits.

University College Hospital, where Litvinenko died, said Friday it could not comment further because the case was being investigated by police.

Litvinenko's friends had little doubt about who was to blame — Putin's regime.

They said the former spy, who sought asylum in Britain in 2000 and became a citizen, worked tirelessly to uncover corruption in Russia's Federal Security Service, the successor agency to the Soviet-era KGB, and unmask Politkovskaya's killers.

Litvinenko had worked for the KGB and then the Federal Security Service until he publicly accused his superiors in 1998 of ordering him to kill Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky. He spent nine months in jail on charges of abuse of office, but was later acquitted and moved to Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0098630

In Moscow, pro-Kremlin legislators pointed at Berezovsky, who amassed a fortune in dubious privatization deals after the 1991 Soviet collapse but fled to London after falling out of favor with Putin. He has been a persistent critic of Putin and worked with Litvinenko.

Lawmakers questioned whether the two critics had a falling out and argued the Kremlin had nothing to gain from Litvinenko's death. "I think this is another game of some kind by Berezovsky," Valery Dyatlenko said on Channel One.

Litvinenko's father, Walter, said his son "fought this regime, and this regime got him."

"It was an excruciating death and he was taking it as a real man," Walter Litvinenko told reporters outside the hospital, his voice choked with emotion.

Goldfarb said the attack bore "all the hallmarks of a very professional, sophisticated and specialist operation."

Another friend, Andrei Nekrasov, said Litvinenko told him: "The bastards got me, but they won't get everybody."

Poisoning Of Ex-spy Ignites Health Scare (LAT)

By Sebastian Rotella, Janet Stobart

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

LONDON — Counter-terrorism police investigating the mysterious death of a Russian spy-turned-dissident warned Friday of a potential public health hazard at two hospitals that treated him and three other locations where officials found traces of the radioactive material thought to have killed him.

On a day of dramatic revelations and accusations, authorities said they believed Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB agent and a fierce critic of Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, died Thursday night from a lethal dose of polonium-210, a radioactive substance that is deadly only if ingested.

Concern about danger to the public prompted meetings Friday of a government committee that responds to national emergencies such as terrorist attacks.

Contamination could result from direct contact with the dead man's bodily fluids, authorities said, or by swallowing polonium-210, inhaling it or absorbing it through an open wound. Investigators suspect the 43-year-old was poisoned Nov. 1, when he had meetings in central London at a sushi restaurant and a luxury hotel. Traces of the radioactive material have been found at both locations and his home in North London.

Health officials said they had worked overnight interviewing staffers at the hospitals that treated Litvinenko and were trying to determine the number of people at risk. The government appealed Friday night to anyone who ate at the restaurant Nov. 1 to contact health officials because they may have been contaminated.

"This is an unprecedented event in the U.K. in which someone has apparently been deliberately poisoned with a type of radiation," said Pat Troop, executive director of the Health Protection Agency, which advises the government on major health threats such as radiation and infectious diseases.

Three days before he died, an emaciated Litvinenko dictated a statement from his hospital bed in which he accused the Russian secret services of poisoning him, friends and family revealed at a news conference Friday.

Saying he heard the "beating wings of the angel of death," Litvinenko lashed out at Putin in the statement, read by his close friend Alexander Goldfarb.

"You have shown yourself to be as barbaric and ruthless as your most hostile critics have claimed," Litvinenko said in the statement. "You have shown yourself to have no respect for life, liberty or any civilized value. You have shown yourself to be unworthy of your office, to be unworthy of the trust of civilized men and women. You may succeed in silencing one man, but the howl of protest from around the world will reverberate, Mr. Putin, in your ears for the rest of your life."

Putin, whose government has repeatedly denied involvement, responded quickly. At a summit of the European Union and Russia in Helsinki, Finland, he called the death a tragedy and expressed condolences to the family. But he warned against political manipulation and "provocation."

"I hope that British authorities will not assist in blowing up some kind of political scandals not based on real grounds," Putin said. "If need be, the Russian authorities, including investigators and the Russian prosecutor's office, will render all necessary assistance in the investigation."

A sensitive case

Scotland Yard's elite counter-terrorism unit is leading the investigation. The case is politically delicate, in part because Russian spy agencies have been accused or implicated in previous attacks on opponents, some of whom were poisoned.

A British official knowledgeable about the case, who asked not to be identified, said police conducted in-depth interviews of the hospitalized Litvinenko, four or five sessions lasting about four hours each. In addition, they are reconstructing his movements through interviews of witnesses and analysis of footage from London's widespread surveillance camera network, Deputy Assistant Commissioner Peter Clarke, head of the Counter Terrorism Command, said in a statement.

Police have assembled a detailed picture of the dead man's life, the first British official said. They have not ruled out any theories, some of which are as convoluted and murky as Russia's political underworld, the official said.

In contrast to the victim's deathbed accusations against Putin, Russian leaders alleged Friday that exiled Russian "oligarch" Boris Berezovsky, a rival of Putin and ally of Litvinenko, may have engineered the plot to discredit the Kremlin.

Moreover, police have not discounted the possibility that Litvinenko, a veteran of an intelligence culture steeped in the use of poisons, somehow ingested the substance while handling it, the British official said.

"They are not ruling out anything," the official said. "Our police are good and they will follow it wherever it goes. But they are not going to be affected by political pressure to go in only one direction. There are things that came up in the investigation of his life that don't point all in one direction."

Whoever the mastermind may be, the amount of the traces found at the restaurant and the relatively open form in which food is prepared and served at sushi bars are among factors making it likely that the poison was slipped into the victim's food there, the official said.

It is also possible that Litvinenko was poisoned before the two meetings and left traces of the material at the location because it had gotten onto his hands or clothes, the official said.

The culprit had to be an expert. It is difficult to obtain polonium-210 and to employ it as a weapon, said Sally Leivesley, a security and terrorism advisor interviewed Friday by the BBC.

"It's not only a weapon of assassination, it's also a weapon of terror," Leivesley said. "Let's remember what happened with our victim, who has had an unfortunate and absolutely ghastly death.

"What we're seeing is a very measured dose, so the understanding of the people who did this is absolutely acute…. If it had been too high, he would have gone into convulsions on the spot and he would have died immediately. If it had been too low, very fortunately he would have been able to recover, but perhaps been quite ill in the long term."

Victim's day

On Nov. 1, Litvinenko ate lunch at the Itsu sushi bar in the bustling Piccadilly area with Italian security analyst Mario Scaramella, who had come to London to discuss with him the killing in Moscow last month of Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian investigative journalist. Litvinenko was investigating her death. Scaramella showed him a Russian security hit list of anti-government critics on which the names of both Politkovskaya and Litvinenko appeared, according to Litvinenko's accounts to journalists and friends.

Scaramella has denied any involvement and pledged full cooperation with police, saying that he now fears for his life.

After the meal with the Italian academic, officials said, Litvinenko had tea with two Russian men at the Millennium Hotel in Grosvenor Square, where the U.S. Embassy is located. One of the Russians was a former KGB officer, Andrei Lugovoy, and the other was referred to simply as Vladimir, according to Litvinenko's accounts.

Lugovoy, who now runs a private security company, has denied wrongdoing, according to an interview published Friday in the Times of London newspaper. He described himself as a business associate of the slain man and identified the third man as Dmitri Kovron, a businessman, according to the Times. Lugovoy told the newspaper that Litvinenko had requested the meeting to discuss a British company interested in the Russian market, and that Litvinenko did not drink or eat anything during the afternoon conversation.

The sushi bar has been closed while it is searched for radioactive traces. Police said parts of the hotel also had been closed, but a hotel spokesman said all areas of the hotel were functioning normally Friday.

Litvinenko fell ill on the evening of Nov. 1 and was admitted to North London's Barnet General Hospital. His condition worsened, and Nov. 17 he was transferred to University College Hospital in central London, where he was kept under armed surveillance.

In interviews and exchanges with friends from his hospital bed, he said he was the victim of a poisoning.

Doctors named thallium or some kind of radiation poisoning as the cause of his illness, but were unable to pinpoint the substance that caused excruciating pain and a gruesome transformation as his hair fell out and his organs failed.

By Thursday morning, he had been resuscitated from cardiac arrest, and after several hours on a respirator and life-support machine, he died about 9:20 p.m.

The substance that killed him is a radioactive material that occurs naturally and is present in the environment and people in very low concentrations, officials said. It is used industrially for anti-static devices in factories.

Although it cannot penetrate skin, if ingested it can cause an increased cancer risk or, if the quantity is large enough, destruction of body tissues and organs, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0098632

The dissident's father, Walter, spoke tearfully Friday, saying his son displayed dignity and courage throughout his ordeal. He echoed his son's denunciation of the Kremlin.

"My son died yesterday, and he was killed by a tiny nuclear bomb," the elder Litvinenko said. "It was so small you could not see it. But the people who killed him have big nuclear bombs and missiles, and those people should not be trusted."

Russia Said To Deliver Arms To Iran (AP)

By Judith Ingram, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Russia has begun delivery of Tor-M1 air defense missile systems to Iran, a Defense Ministry official said Friday, confirming that Moscow would proceed with arms deals with Tehran in spite of Western criticism.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue, declined to specify when the deliveries had been made and how many systems had been delivered.

Ministry officials have previously said Moscow would supply 29 of the sophisticated missile systems to Iran under a $700 million contract signed in December, according to Russian media reports.

The United States called on all countries last spring to stop all arms exports to Iran, as well as ending all nuclear cooperation with it to put pressure on Tehran to halt uranium enrichment activities. Israel, too, has severely criticized arms deals with Iran.

Tehran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, but the United States and its allies suspect Iran is trying to develop weapons.

The U.N. Security Council, where Russia is a veto-wielding permanent member, is currently stalemated on the severity of sanctions on Iran for defying its demand to cease enrichment.

The Tor-M1 deal, involving conventional weapons, does not violate any international agreements.

Russian officials say the missiles are purely defensive weapons with a limited range.

According to the Interfax news agency, the Tor-M1 system can identify up to 48 targets and fire at two targets simultaneously at a height of up to 20,000 feet.

Russian media have reported previously that Moscow had conducted talks on selling even more powerful long-range S-300 air defense missiles, but Russian officials have denied that.

Lebanon's Crisis Worsens With Strike (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Lebanon's political crisis worsened Friday with government ministers fearing for their lives after the murder of one of their own, businesses on strike and Hezbollah renewing threats of protests.

Beirut was tense after several hundred supporters of the pro-Syrian Hezbollah briefly took to the streets on Thursday night, burning tires and blocking the road to the airport until the Islamic militant group's leader ordered them home.

Tuesday's assassination of Interior Minister Pierre Gemayel, an anti-Syrian Christian leader, has added to Lebanon's political uncertainty. It has also reignited anger at Syria, which dominated Lebanon for nearly three decades but was forced to withdraw its troops last year over accusations it was behind Hariri's killing.

The U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora moved ahead with an issue that was likely to anger Hezbollah. The Cabinet was due to meet Saturday to give its final approval to a U.N.-created international court to try suspects in the February 2005 killing of former prime minister Rafik Hariri.

In a gesture toward the government and the anti-Syrian majority in parliament — which regard the U.N. court as a priority — Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah and parliament speaker Amal leader Nabih Berri said they supported the creation of the tribunal. But they accused their opponents of using the issue to block their demands for enough Cabinet seats to be able to veto decisions.

"We insist on our legitimate right to demand a real participation in the political decision-making," the two said a statement. They pledged to press their "demand by using all available democratic and legal means," a reiteration of threats to hold non-violent protests. When Nasrallah first demanded more Cabinet seats earlier this month, he said that Hezbollah would call demonstrations to bring down the government if its demands were not met. But those protests were called off following Gemayel's death.

Damascus has denied any role in the slayings of Hariri, Gemayel or four other anti-Syrian politicians over the past two years. But Syria suggested in a letter that circulated at the U.N. Friday that it may not cooperate with the international court, saying it was not consulted about the planned court.

An estimated 800,000 government supporters — a fifth of the population — turned out for Gemayel's funeral on Thursday, turning it into a political rally against Syria as Lebanon's ethnic groups faced their sharpest divisions since the 1975-90 civil war.

"Even at the height of the civil war, Lebanon has never witnessed this level of polarization among its sects, this kind of political mobilization and the crisis at such a dead end," wrote Sateh Noureddine, managing editor of the daily As-Safir.

Fearing a meltdown, business leaders called a two-day strike starting Friday to urge the rival leaders to "take national decisions ... engage in dialogue and stop making threats of street protests."

Factories, banks and financial institutions closed Friday. Though many small shops remained open, many schools shut down and traffic was thinner than normal on Beirut's usually bustling streets.

Underlining the atmosphere of fear following Gemayel's assassination, some Cabinet ministers are taking shelter in the government headquarters in downtown Beirut, although Cabinet Minister Ahmed Fatfat, speaking on Lebanese Broadcasting Corp. television, would not say how many ministers.

Efforts to break the deadlock — and even the outpouring of grief over the slaying of the young Christian politician — have failed to soften the entrenched positions.

Egypt and Saudi Arabia have mediated in recent days, apparently to no avail.

Hezbollah ignored a call by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora on Thursday night for it to resume dialogue and for six pro-Hezbollah members who quit his Cabinet to return to their posts. The six quit in protest just before the Cabinet gave its initial approval of the international tribunal, which is opposed by Hezbollah.

Pro-government groups have warned that more government ministers may be targeted for assassination, which could deny the Cabinet the legal two-thirds quorum of 16 needed to approve the court. The Cabinet now has 17 members following the Shiites' withdrawal and Gemayel's death.

Nabil Bou Monsef, a political analyst speaking on LBC TV Friday, said the latest events served as "a great red alert" to the country. "Tensions are flashing red."

Lebanon's Ominous Sense Of Deja Vu (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

BEIRUT — The Sunnis were lucky: The homemade bomb that exploded outside their little filling station in the early hours Friday didn't ignite the tanks of gasoline. Shrapnel smashed through the glass windows and metal shutters, but the lone employee was in the bathroom and nobody was hurt.

Shiite gangs roamed the surrounding streets that night, attacking any Sunni symbols they could find, including a mosque. All over Lebanon, Shiites were spoiling for revenge after seeing television footage of the funeral of assassinated Christian Cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel.

Mourners, including some Sunnis, had cursed Shiites and their leaders at the funeral. Afterward, Shiites turned their rage on the nearest Sunnis they could find. Sunnis fought back. A cycle of violence, with uncomfortable echoes of Lebanon's past, was getting underway.

"The country is headed for war," said Abbas Ismail, 50, a Sunni who works in the bombed gas station. He stood on a small concrete ledge as a sinking sun spilled long shadows over Beirut's southern suburbs. "People think we are going to face a civil war."

Brawls and vandalism with sectarian overtones have erupted in the Lebanese capital in recent days, especially where rival sects or political parties live side by side. Gangs roamed the streets, looking for a place to vent their rage.

The incidents are minor: insults shouted, rocks thrown at mosques, posters of sectarian leaders shredded. But they reveal a precarious mood. This is just the sort of low-level violence that has sparked clashes and fueled Lebanon's internal religious fighting for generations.

A political rift has grown steadily more serious. On one side is a government clinging precariously to existence; on the other, a Hezbollah-led opposition determined to grab a greater share of power.

With Hezbollah, a powerful Shiite party, and its allies threatening to stage massive protests to topple the government, there is mounting concern that street violence could give way to wider reprisals.

"Maybe it will start like this. It's very obvious — in 1975 it started like this," said Romel Sherri, a 34-year-old engineer, referring to the start of Lebanon's 15-year civil war. Like most people in Lebanon, Sherri was confident that his own group, Hezbollah, would behave itself, and skeptical about the intentions of its rivals.

"Hassan Nasrallah can control the street, but the others can't," he said, referring to the popular leader of Hezbollah. "They start throwing poison between the religions."

DOJ_NMG_0098634

Against the backdrop of religious slaughter in Iraq, tensions are particularly thick between Lebanon's Sunni and Shiite Muslims. Members of both sects speak of a regional spillover, saying that news from Iraq, along with growing Arab anxiety over the rising influence of Shiite-ruled Iran, has worsened the animosities here.

"If we hear on the news at night that Shiites have been killed by Sunnis in Iraq, then they want to attack Sunnis here in Lebanon," said Ismail, the gas station employee. "It makes them hate us even more."

This is not the same Lebanon that slipped into civil war three decades ago, with the most glaring difference this: Instead of Christians fighting Muslims, the most heated divisions are emerging among rival Christians and, especially, between Sunnis and Shiites.

"It's much more among communities, internally, than between communities," said Fadia Kiwan, head of political science at Beirut's St. Joseph University. "The tension that is of concern to everybody now is the emergence of a Sunni and Shiite split. The situation is very critical."

Tensions also have flared between Christians who are still loyal to the government and the followers of Gen. Michel Aoun, a popular Christian leader who has forged an unlikely alliance with Hezbollah. The night Gemayel was killed, furious young men from the slain minister's Falangist Party attacked Aoun's posters and burned his militia flags in Beirut's Christian neighborhoods.

The tiny gas station that came under attack stands at the entrance to a small enclave of about 60 Sunni families. A ramshackle maze tacked together from cinderblocks and scraps of corrugated tin, their neighborhood is an impoverished island in a sea of Shiites.

These are the southern suburbs, indisputably Hezbollah's turf. But above a rusting fuel tank at the small gas station, Sunnis have tacked up a massive banner printed with the pictures of assassinated former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri; his son, parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri; and the elder Hariri's Sunni driver, who hailed from a nearby neighborhood and was killed in February 2005 along with his boss.

"Our eyes are on you," read the Arabic lettering swimming across a backdrop of Lebanese flags.

The massive poster is a sign of defiance. The younger Hariri has accused Syria of assassinating Lebanon's leaders, and is battling to establish an international tribunal to prosecute his father's killers. He is also locked in a political battle with Hezbollah, which has long been backed by Syria.

The gas station owners acknowledge that once Shiite customers notice the banner, they usually don't come back.

"If we take this picture down, it's humiliation for us," said Mohammed abu Ali, 45, a driver who lives in the neighborhood. "If the situation were calm, we'd take it down. But in times like these, we can't."

Hezbollah put out word Friday that it would go ahead with long-threatened street demonstrations meant to topple the government.

The date of the demonstrations will be a surprise, they said, but they might begin as early as Sunday. Shiites were already looking forward to showing off their numbers.

"We will stay in the streets," said Hassan Khodor, a Hezbollah official in the predominantly Shiite Beirut neighborhood of Zkak al Blat, "until the government resigns."

The Shiites from this neighborhood say that Druze, Christians and Sunnis rampaged in the streets Friday, shouting insults and ripping down posters of Nasrallah. The men of the neighborhood attacked the interlopers. The army had to wade into the brawl.

"They used to humiliate the opposition parties, Hezbollah and Amal. But now they are attacking the Shiites in general," Khodor said. "They even insulted our religious traditions. This amazed me."

Lebanon Death "May Presage Coup" (BBC)

BBC.com, November 25, 2006

This week's killing of Lebanese politician Pierre Gemayel may be the first shot in a coup against the government, says a top US official.

John Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, said recent probes into political killings in Lebanon suggested Syrian involvement.

He told the BBC that if Syria was deemed to have been involved, the implications were serious.

Saturday sees the second day of a strike protesting at the killing.

Many shops closed on Friday with business leaders saying they hoped the action would move Lebanon closer to a "national dialogue" and ward off the threat of division and street protests.

Mr Gemayel, a Maronite Christian who was the industry minister, was shot in his car in a Christian area of Beirut on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0098635

Many Lebanese accuse Damascus of orchestrating the 34-year-old's murder, although Syria explicitly denies any involvement.

Speaking in a BBC interview, Mr Bolton said he did not want to pre-judge any investigation into Mr Gemayel's death.

Many Lebanese are still mourning Gemayel

Mr Bolton said that Washington would have to take such things into account when deciding whether to deal with Syria.

He said the Americans talked to the Syrians all the time - the issue was whether Syria was going to listen.

The Lebanese cabinet is due to meet on Saturday to approve a United Nations plan for an international tribunal to try those accused of murdering the former Prime Minister, Rafiq Hariri.

Syria has been implicated in the bombing that killed Mr Hariri last year, but denies involvement.

Correspondents say the Lebanese cabinet is expected to give its final approval to the tribunal, and this is likely to increase tensions with pro-Syrian politicians.

Earlier this month six pro-Syrian ministers resigned from the cabinet, saying they wanted a greater role in government.

The death or resignation of two more cabinet ministers would bring down the government.

Meanwhile, the UN Security Council has agreed to a request from the Lebanese government to help investigate Mr Gemayel's murder.

His killing will be probed by the same tribunal that implicated senior Syrian officials and pro-Syrian Lebanese in the killing of Mr Hariri.

Correspondents say the government is accusing Hezbollah of exploiting the delicate political situation in Lebanon to try and block the UN-backed probe into the Hariri killing.

Pro-Syrian groups have already said the UN plan is illegal under Lebanon's constitution.

In 2005, Syria withdrew its troops from Lebanon following 29 years of military and political rule over its smaller neighbour, after massive international pressure following the assassination of Mr Hariri.

Iran And Syria Helping Hizballah Rearm (TIME)

By Elaine Shannon

Time, November 24, 2006

Iran is smuggling weapons through Syria to re-arm Lebanese allies Hizballah, despite renewed efforts by United Nations peacekeepers and the Lebanese army to seal off the mountain borders with Syria in the wake of last summer's war between the Shi'ite militia and Israel, according to reports by Saudi and Israeli intelligence sources that have been confirmed by western diplomats in Beirut.

Israeli military officials in Tel Aviv say that Hizballah replenished nearly half of its pre-war stockpiles of short-range missiles and small arms. But western diplomats in Beirut say these calculations under-estimate the weapons flow and that Hizballah has now filled its war chest with over 20,000 short-range missiles -- a similar amount fo what they had at the start of the conflict, during which the group is believed to have fired over 3,000 rockets at Israel. "The Iranian pipeline through Syria was already working during the war," despite constant Israeli bombing raids on the roads into Lebanon from Syria, this Beirut source said. Officially, Syria and Iran deny that they're supplying weapons to Hizballah. As for the Shi'ite group itself, when asked about receiving a new shipment of arms from Syria and Iran, a spokesman told TIME, without elaborating, "We have more than enough weapons if Israel tries to attack us again."

Over the past three months, according to a knowledgeable Saudi source, Iranian Revolutionary Guard officers have been operating out of a military base on the outskirts of Damascus. The Iranian government has dispatched shipments of small arms and what appear to be missile components to this military base, according to the source. From the secret base, weapons have been shipped by truck across the border into Lebanon. Western diplomats say that the Lebanese army has posted over 8,000 troops along the border, forcing smugglers to use mountain passes instead of the heavily-monitored crossing on the main Beirut-Damascus road.

The Saudis, in particular, are alarmed at Iran's spreading influence in Lebanon. "There has been a serious increase in (Iranian and Syrian) activity in the rearming of HIzballah," says Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security advisor who is managing director of the Riyadh-based Saudi National Security Assessment Project, a consulting group that advises the Saudi government. Obaid contends that "a huge stream of trucks" has been crossing the border from Syria into Lebanon, ferrying thinly disguised shipments of arms.

Moreover, Obaid says, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and Iran's Ministry of Intelligence and Security (MOIS) are using the Iranian embassies in Damascus and Beirut as command and control centers -- an allegation that was also confirmed to TIME by Israeli military sources. Obaid says there appear to be direct communications links between the Iranians and Hizballah, via

Hizballah officers working inside the Iranian embassy in Beirut, and Iranian officers in the field with Hizballah fighters; in the past, some Middle East analysts have rejected the popular notion that Hizballah takes direct orders from Iran.

Iran's apparent efforts to destabilize Lebanon and to expand Shi'ite influence in Iraq and throughout the region are of major concern to the Saudi government, a leading power in the Sunni Muslim world that presumably would like to see the U.S. take a more active stance in Lebanon against its regional rivals. Obaid says that when Vice President Cheney visits King Abdallah bin Abd Al Aziz Al Saud Saturday in Riyadh, the Saudi king is expected to tell Cheney that "the Saudi leadership will not and cannot allow Iran, through Syria and Hizballah, to bring down the Lebanese government and overtake the levers of power in Beirut." Obaid says the Saudi king is also expected to discuss with Cheney the kingdom's worries about Iranian activity in Iraq and the Palestinian territories as well as its alliance with Syria.

All of the Iranian and Syrian activity is taking place against the backdrop of growing instability within Lebanon's government and Saturday's upcoming vote among government ministers to bring the assassins of the late Prime Minister Rafik Hariri before an international tribunal -- a process that is expected to implicate high-level Syrian officials. Hizballah pulled out of the country's coalition government recently after its push for greater representation was rebuffed; many observers viewed the push for effectve veto power as motivated by its concern that prime minister Fouad Siniora would try to begin the process of Hizballah's disarmament that was reaffirmed in the UN-brokered ceasefire that ended this summer's war. Moreover, some politicians in Beirut suspect that the assassination of Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel on Tuesday was plotted by Syria to scare cabinet ministers into voting against the international probe into Hariri's death by a massive truck bomb (other analysts argue the predictable fallout from the killing just ahead of such a crucial vote is precisely why Syria would not have ordered it). Saad Hariri, the prime minister's son and a supporter of the current government, told TIME, "Syria is waging a campaign of intimidation and assassinations to stop the tribunal."

If the Lebanese government approves of the tribunal, it will then go to the United Nations, which could slap an embargo on Syria. This process will drag on for months before it wends its way into the UN Security Council. Moreover, such a confrontational approach would run counter to the expected recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, commissioned by the White House, to engage with Syria. But after the assassination of Pierre Gemayel the notion of US talks with Syria may be off the table, at least for the moment.

Palestinians And Israel Say They Are Open To Truce (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 24 — After another surge of violence in and around the Gaza Strip over the past month, Israel and the Palestinians moved gingerly on Friday toward reinstating an often-broken cease-fire between them.

In Gaza, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas confirmed that the Palestinian factions — including Islamic Jihad, which had previously rejected any cease-fire with Israel — would halt their rocket fire if Israel halted its military operations in both the West Bank and Gaza.

Israel called the offer a media presentation, but said it was open to a more serious, formal proposal. “It’s not a question of, ‘You go first,’ ” said Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. “It’s a question of, ‘What are we talking about?’ ” A halt to all Israeli military operations in return for a halt to rocket fire alone would be unacceptable, she said.

On Thursday night in Gaza, the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, said that since the summer, Palestinians have been “victims of a barbaric Israeli offensive that has left more than 400 dead and 1,500 wounded while thousands of homes have been destroyed.” But he added, “All that on the pretext of homemade rocket fire, and unfortunately we are giving them such a pretext.”

In fact, Israel re-entered Gaza in late June in response to the capture of a soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, by a group of Palestinian militants that included Hamas. Hamas said that they were responding to Israeli shelling that had killed civilians; Israel said the shelling was in response to Palestinian rocket fire. Since Israel pulled its settlers and troops out of Gaza in September 2005, at least 1,100 rockets have been fired from Gaza, and four Israelis have died — two of them in the past 10 days.

Mr. Abbas, aided by Egypt, is negotiating with Hamas over a national-unity government that could meet the conditions for ending an international freeze on direct budget aid, as well as Israel’s withholding of tax and duties collected on behalf of the Palestinians. The government is also held up by disagreements over the release of Corporal Shalit and different demands about the number of Palestinian prisoners to be exchanged for him. Israel wants the corporal back before releasing prisoners. These issues are holding back the prospect of a meeting between Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to make an unannounced visit here to see both men next week. The United States is eager to break the bloody stalemate and at least have Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas talking again.

DOJ_NMG_0098637

Amid the negotiating, the shooting continued Friday, with Israeli troops in Gaza killing two Palestinians in Beit Lahiya, including a militant who served as a cameraman for Hamas's military wing. A 10-year-old boy, Abdel Aziz Salman, died from gunshot wounds, hospital workers said. Palestinians said he was hit by an Israeli sniper; the Israeli Army said its troops in Beit Lahiya had no knowledge of the boy's death.

Israel Rejects Palestinian Peace Offer (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

The Palestinian prime minister said Friday that militants were prepared to stop firing rockets at Israel if it would halt all military action in Palestinian territories. Israel rejected the offer, saying it would respond positively only to a total truce.

Similar proposals in the past have failed to curb fighting, and a spokesman for the ruling Hamas group quickly stepped back from the cease-fire talk, which came as fighting between militants and Israeli troops in Gaza claimed the lives of a 10-year-old Palestinian boy and a militant filming the clashes.

A third Palestinian died Friday of wounds sustained in earlier violence. It wasn't immediately known whether he was a militant or civilian.

Israeli launched a military campaign in Gaza five months ago, in an unsuccessful attempt to curb militant rocket fire on Israeli border communities.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said armed factions had agreed Thursday to halt rocket fire in exchange for a complete cessation of Israeli military operations in Gaza and the West Bank.

"The ball now is in the Israeli court," Haniyeh said. "It (Israel) must stop its aggression and escalation against the Palestinian people, then there will be no problem according to what the factions agreed in their last meeting."

After meeting with faction leaders again Friday night, Haniyeh urged the Israelis "to respect this positive readiness expressed by the Palestinian resistance factions." And government spokesman Ghazi Hamad suggested that a broader cease-fire was possible if Israel were to take up the militants' offer.

"After that, we (the Palestinians) will talk about a comprehensive truce," Hamad said.

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said the offer to trade a partial cease-fire for a suspension of all Israeli military operations in Palestinian territories was "ludicrous" and "a media stunt."

"Israel would respond very positively to the idea of a complete cease-fire in the Gaza Strip, which is what we hoped for in September 2005 when we left every inch of the Gaza Strip," Eisin said. "If the Palestinian factions have a proposal which is supposed to bring about the complete stopping of fire from the Gaza Strip, Israel would be very happy to stop all, all - and I'm going to say it again — all fire from the Gaza Strip."

A Hamas spokesman in Gaza, Ismail Radwan, watered down Haniyeh's talk of a cease-fire, saying the Palestinian factions had agreed to "alter their strategies of resistance" if Israel halted fire.

The Palestinian rocket fire, which over the years has generated more panic and anxiety than casualties, grew deadlier over the past week, claiming the lives of two Israeli civilians.

Eisin said Israel regarded recent efforts by moderate Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, to achieve a "complete stop of all violence" as a "very positive development."

Abbas has been trying to work out a package deal with Haniyeh that would include a total cease-fire and a more moderate government of professionals to replace the one led by Hamas, which doesn't recognize the Jewish state.

The two men met twice on Thursday, and aides to Abbas said the key sticking point in coalition talks was who would control the Interior Ministry, which is in charge of powerful Palestinian security branches.

Abbas hopes a more moderate government would encourage the West to restore vitally needed aid, cut off after Hamas took power in March. Western leaders have said the flow would not resume until the Palestinian government recognizes Israel and renounces violence.

Hamas' political chief, Khaled Mashaal, was in Cairo on Friday for talks with Egyptian mediators on the so-called national unity government, but no breakthrough was reported.

In Damascus, Syria, the Palestinian foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar, blamed Abbas' effort to create a government of technocrats for the failure in forming a unity government. He called it a "dangerous" idea that was unacceptable to Hamas.

Zahar, who spoke late Thursday after meeting with radical Palestinian factions, also repeated Hamas' stance that it will not agree to any government that would recognize Israel and renounce violence against the Jewish state.

In northern Gaza, hundreds gathered to bury a 64-year-old grandmother who blew herself up a day earlier as Israeli forces moved through the Jebaliya refugee camp.

Mourners shouting "God is great" draped her simple wooden coffin with a green Hamas flag on Friday before driving it off to a nearby cemetery.

"I knew she wanted martyrdom. She was brave. But I'm still surprised that she did it," said one of her 38 grandchildren, 13-year-old Leila.

Fatma An-Najar was by far the oldest of more than 100 Palestinian suicide bombers who have attacked Israelis over the past six years, killing hundreds.

Female suicide bombers were a rarity during the first several years of the current conflict, but have become more common over the years as women become more involved in the Palestinian struggle.

A Tumultuous World Tests A Rigid Pope (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn, Stacy Meichtry

The Wall Street Journal, November 25, 2006

On official trips, he rarely strays from the timetable or jokes with the crowds. He is wary of the mass media and disdains made-for-TV images like those that helped define the papacy of his predecessor, John Paul II. Friends describe him as a man who is shy in crowds and prefers thinking to talking. He is more likely to settle down with a book than sit down at a crowded dinner table.

In private, colleagues say, Pope Benedict XVI can demonstrate a disarming humbleness. Whereas John Paul would spend hours chatting with guests, Benedict is businesslike. He always seems to know what time it is, says Robert Spaemann, a conservative German Catholic philosopher who has known Benedict for years. "Then he'll stand up and say, 'Right, it's time,' and end the meeting."

Nineteen months after being selected pope, Benedict is transforming the Vatican with a different style and a different stance. Beneath his blunt words and rigid style lies a profound divergence from John Paul's buoyant optimism. Pope Benedict believes that the Roman Catholic Church must stand apart from the world of today rather than embrace it.

John Paul II was the master of the grand overture -- from praying at the Western Wall in Jerusalem to kissing a copy of the Quran -- which dissolved tensions with even his harshest foes.

For Benedict, the modern age is defined by growing secularism in the West and the rise of religious fanaticism most everywhere else. In order to fulfill its mission, he believes, the Church needs to shun both forces. Benedict is "pessimistic about the compatibility of the Church and the modern world," says Mr. Spaemann.

This vision has sweeping implications for the Church -- both in its approach to Catholic doctrine and liturgy and in its outreach to other faiths, particularly Islam.

Benedict preaches a renewal of the Church's fundamental teachings and rituals, and is considering expanding the use of the Latin Mass. Benedict's emphasis on tradition risks alienating a broad cross-section of Catholics who argue the Church needs to become more accessible to maintain its increasingly diverse flock. Only once the Church has reclaimed its own distinct identity, he says, can it mount an effective resistance against its chief foe, a "dictatorship of relativism."

Benedict's public call to arms fires the imaginations of many of the cardinals who elected him pope. They share Benedict's view of a Church that is under siege, and they want a leader who is ready to confront the dual challenges of secularism and Islam, even if such confrontation brings danger. Some cardinals insist that Benedict's brusque language on such delicate matters as the Church's relationship with Islam is necessary in order to set the stage for frank and constructive dialogue in the future.

Now, Benedict's approach faces the biggest test of his young pontificate as he travels to Turkey this coming week, his first papal trip to a Muslim nation.

Catholic-Muslim tensions have soared in recent months, in part because of Benedict's own actions. In a September speech in Germany, the pope cited a 15th-century Byzantine emperor's description of Muhammad's teachings as "evil and inhuman." The speech ricocheted around the Muslim world, leading to riots, church bombings and the killing of a nun.

The reaction unnerved both the Vatican and the pope. But the speech itself laid out one of Benedict's most crucial departures from John Paul's path of aggressive outreach. John Paul believed fervently -- some say foolishly -- that Christians and others faiths, even Islam, could always find common ground. Benedict, on the other hand, believes Catholics and Muslims are divided by an ideological chasm, and makes little effort to temper his conviction.

The approach risks provoking a backlash in Turkey, where devout Muslims are incensed by what they see as the pope's unjust criticism of their faith, and where Turkish nationalists view the pope as a Western provocateur bent on weakening the Turkish state. This past week, a group of right-wing Turkish nationalists stormed a former church in Istanbul as part of a protest against the pope's coming visit. "This attitude, which fuels division and lack of mutual trust, is seriously threatening world peace," Ali Bardakoglu, head of Turkey's religious affairs department, said recently, though he didn't specifically mention the pope. Mr. Bardakoglu, who is scheduled to meet with the pontiff during his trip, has vowed to make his views clear.

As tensions mounted late Friday, a Vatican spokesman said Benedict was considering a last-minute change to his travel schedule that would allow him to visit Istanbul's Blue Mosque.

FORMER STUDENTS from the pope's time as a university professor in Germany say that the pontiff's mind is spongelike, and that he can quote from memory works ranging from St. Augustine to Nietzsche. His scholarly stature creates such a sense of awe, colleagues say, that he often goes unchallenged within the Vatican. His texts are rarely edited, say those who work with him, and his ideas are seldom disputed. Many of the pontiff's close associates view him with trepidation.

"He's so head and shoulders above everybody else," says Father Joseph Fessio, who studied under him as a graduate student and now, as head of Florida-based Ignatius Press, publishes his works in English. "Who's going to be able to proof something or correct something?"

This leaves the pope with a level of intellectual isolation even within the Vatican. "Whom would he sit down with? Can you imagine being papal theologian? What are you going to say?" asks Father Fessio.

Many of Benedict's close colleagues say he only really unwinds when surrounded by his intellectual peers. Since his days as a professor in Germany he has hosted the Schülerkreis, or "student circle," where he gathers students and colleagues for free-flowing debate on an issue that is crucial for the Church.

"The first thing he said to us after his election as Pope was that we must continue our seminars," recalls Father Vincent Twomey, an Irish priest and professor who did his doctoral studies with then-Father Ratzinger at the University of Regensburg.

IN THE SUMMER OF 2005, four months after his election, the topic was Islam. The pontiff invited some of the Church's top Islam experts to attend the gathering.

In a speech at the meeting, German Jesuit Father Christian Troll discussed how Muslims might be able to reinterpret the Quran along the lines of modern thinking. The pope questioned whether such a shift was possible, according to Father Fessio, who attended the gathering.

Many of the themes from that meeting re-emerged in the pope's contentious speech at the University of Regensburg on Sept. 12. (Read the speech1.)

The 4,000-word speech delved into a theme present in many of his writings: the West's failure to accept the interdependence between faith and reason.

Benedict prefaced this reflection, however, with a meandering analysis of Islam that relied on obscure source material: the observations of Manuel Paleologos II, a Byzantine emperor who reigned in Christian Constantinople before its fall to the Ottoman Turks in the 15th century.

"Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached," Benedict quoted Manuel II as saying.

In the speech, Benedict advanced a bold position: True interreligious dialogue between Islam and Catholicism is blocked because of the two faiths' divergent interpretations of the role of reason. Catholicism views reason as integral to understanding and interpreting God; Islam, he argues, sees God as being beyond reason.

Father Fessio described Benedict's position on Islam in this way: "He's saying that if your view of God...is that he's so transcendent that he transcends all human categories, including rationality, well then you can justify the irrational, including violence, to spread religion, including terrorism."

"You can't dialogue with us because you won't accept reason as a basis. Because the God you are obeying is above reason," Father Fessio added.

As Muslim criticism of the speech grew, occasionally spilling into violence, the pope sought to quell the anger by expressing regret for the misunderstanding, and saying he was "deeply sorry for the reactions provoked by a few passages in my address." He resisted calls, however, for an unequivocal apology.

He also sought to calm tempers by posting an amended version of the address with footnotes on the Vatican's Web site. In one footnote, the pontiff wrote that his quotation of Manuel II "does not express my personal view of the Quran," but added, "I intended solely to draw out the essential relationship between faith and reason. On this point I am in agreement with Manuel II, but without endorsing his polemic."

Some saw the speech as evidence of the pope's political naiveté. At Regensburg, the university where he once taught and helped turn into a bastion of conservative Catholic thought, Benedict was in his intellectual comfort zone. "He thought he could slip back into the role of professor," says Mr. Spaemann. "Perhaps he didn't realize that every word would be weighed around the world, and that he can never again speak as non-Pope."

Despite the tensions, some Church elders see the Regensburg speech as actually offering an opportunity to restart dialogue on a more frank footing. Cardinal Angelo Scola, the patriarch of Venice, for example, says the Regensburg speech doesn't reject having mutual respect for other faiths but just recognizes their deep differences.

The speech, says Cardinal Scola, who has known Benedict for more than 30 years, "represents a foundation upon which interreligious dialogue will be built in the future."

EVEN BEFORE THE POPE ignited Muslim rage with his Regensburg address, he was well aware that relations with Islam had reached a boiling point. In the library of the Apostolic Palace last February, Benedict listened as Bishop Luigi Padovese recounted a grim tale: A few weeks earlier, a gunman had burst into a church in Trabzon, Turkey, near the Black Sea, and opened fire on a priest who had been kneeling in prayer. The gunman later claimed to have been driven to violence by cartoons published in a Danish newspaper that lampooned the Muslim prophet Muhammad.

At the pope's urging, Bishop Padovese described how the first bullet tore through the priest's lung. Moments later the gunman fired a second shot, and the priest collapsed dead.

The pope "wanted to know how everything happened in detail," recalls Bishop Padovese, a prelate whose Anatolia-based region includes Trabzon. Bishop Padovese now travels with a police escort in Turkey after a botched attempt on his life.

Benedict is also running the Vatican much differently than John Paul did, leaving him in many ways more removed from the rest of the world. He is traveling less and has cut down on the number of protocol duties, holding fewer meetings. As a result, his contact with people from outside the Church is more limited. He has filled top positions with people he has worked closely with for years, giving the Vatican an ideological homogeneity that didn't exist as much under John Paul, when top officials often sparred.

One appointment in particular surprised many: Benedict's choice of Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, his former chief deputy at the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, as the Vatican's secretary of state. Cardinal Bertone has stellar qualifications in matters of Church doctrine but practically no experience as a diplomat. He isn't a graduate of the Vatican's prestigious diplomatic school, the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy, nor does he have a strong command of English.

Sandro Magister, a veteran Vatican expert who writes for Italian newsweekly L'Espresso, says Cardinal Bertone's appointment is a sign that Vatican foreign policy is likely to be based more on ideals than on pragmatism.

In an essay recently posted on a Catholic Web site, 30 Days, Cardinal Bertone wrote that Vatican envoys to predominantly Muslim nations should take a more aggressive stance in promoting Christianity. "We must not cease to propose and proclaim the Gospel, to Muslims also."

Other key appointments have also elevated former top officials who worked alongside then-Cardinal Ratzinger at the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, though not all of the pope's appointments have come from his inner circle. In late October, Benedict tapped Cardinal Claudio Hummes, who heads the Roman Catholic diocese in São Paulo, Brazil's largest, to run the Vatican's Congregation for the Clergy, putting a moderate Latin American in charge of priests around the world.

Cardinal Julián Herranz, who was chosen by John Paul to head the Vatican's Council for Legislative Texts and who has remained in the post under Benedict, says that the reshuffle hasn't discouraged top officials from expressing their criticisms of papal policy. "If it occurs to me to say something, I will very delicately make the suggestion," he says.

Alberto Melloni, a Church historian at the University of Modena, says Benedict's "pessimistic" view of the modern world, and his tendency for homogeneity, may in some respects be a reflection of his generation, and his age. "He was 78 when he became pope, not 58" like John Paul, says Mr. Melloni.

Benedict is very conscious of his age, now 79, and comments on it frequently to colleagues. During a recent meeting with Mr. Spaemann, the German philosopher, he remarked: "I'm an old dog."

That makes Benedict more focused on changing the Church, instead of the world, and less concerned about whom he might offend in the process.

Last month several dozen top Catholic theologians crowded into a Vatican chapel for 7:30 a.m. mass with Benedict. The pontiff gave pointed marching orders:

"Speaking just to find applause or to tell people what they want to hear....is like prostitution," he told the theologians, according to a transcript. "Don't look for applause, but look to obey the truth."

A Tense Time For A Papal Visit (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY — To reach Turkey's most important Roman Catholic church, a visitor must scour a traffic-choked street to find the metal doors, walk down a flight of stairs, cross a courtyard and finally step into the consecrated basilica.

Inside the Holy Spirit Cathedral here, the lights remain low until a minute before evening Mass, and then reveal frescoed ceilings with gold-trimmed arches, 22 crystal chandeliers and blond-marble columns. On this night, 14 worshipers dot the pews.

In the Turkish capital, Ankara, the only Catholic church is even more discreet: It is marked simply by a French flag.

DOJ_NMG_0098641

When Pope Benedict XVI travels to Turkey next week, he will be making his first trip to a predominantly Muslim country at a moment of diplomatic fragility.

He also will be traversing some of the most ancient and revered milestones of Christianity, in a land where Christianity is disappearing and where non-Muslim minorities complain of systemic discrimination, harassment and violence against them.

It is a complex agenda. The pope's main purpose is to meet with the Istanbul-based spiritual leader of the world's 250 million Eastern Orthodox Christians in a show of ecumenical solidarity. But he must also use the visit to attempt to repair the damage from comments he has made that cast Islam in a negative light.

Among Turkey's nearly 70 million Muslims, reaction to Benedict's visit ranges from disinterest to intense anger. A man opened fire early this month on the Italian Consulate in Istanbul, telling police later that he wanted to "strangle" the pope. A nationalist gang called the Gray Wolves is staging regular demonstrations protesting the pontiff's arrival.

Among the estimated 100,000 Christians who live in Turkey, there is hope that Benedict's presence will cast light on their difficulties.

The Roman Catholic Church is not legally recognized in Turkey. It functions largely attached to foreign embassies; its priests do not wear their collars in public.

Most Christians in Turkey are of the Armenian, Greek and other Orthodox denominations, and although most of these are recognized in the Turkish Constitution as minority communities, they face severe restrictions on property ownership and cannot build places of worship or run seminaries to train their clerics.

Such hardships make it almost impossible for Christians to sustain and expand their communities, advocates say. The Greek Orthodox, for example, have dwindled to no more than 3,000, just 2% of the community's size in the 1960s.

Fueled by a vitriolic, and growing, potion of nationalism and Islamic radicalism, spasms of violence have led to the killing of one priest this year, the beatings of two others and the burning of a Christian prayer center. Christian tombstones are often vandalized and property frequently confiscated by authorities.

Turkey has come under repeated criticism from Western human rights organizations and the Vatican for its failure to promote religious freedom. Turkey is an Islamic but secular country; in reality, this means that all religious activity, including mosques and imams, is controlled by the government.

"Obviously, more needs to be done to promote religious freedom for all denominations," Ali Bardakoglu, president of Turkey's powerful Religious Affairs Directorate, said in an interview. But he defended the government's treatment of minorities, contending that Christians and other non-Muslims do not face serious problems.

Bardakoglu was one of the most emphatic critics of Benedict after the pope delivered a speech in Regensburg, Germany, in September that denounced Islamic violence and quoted a medieval Byzantine emperor who disdained Islam and its prophet, Muhammad. Adding insult to injury, as far as many Turks were concerned, the emperor was defending Constantinople, cradle of Orthodox Christianity, against the Muslim conquest that gave the city its name today: Istanbul.

Bardakoglu said the pope was welcome in Turkey despite the speech, which touched off outrage throughout the Muslim world. And although he said he accepted Benedict's subsequent explanations, Bardakoglu did not appear completely appeased.

"It is unfortunate that there are circles within Western society that attempt to blacken the name of our religion and are infected with Islamophobia," he said. "The role of the Vatican and the pope should be to help fight stereotypes. Rather than open debate, they should be seeking to heal wounds."

In a remarkable gesture, the pope will meet with Bardakoglu, the country's top religious figure, at his ministry, a modern, imposing building on Ankara's outskirts, on the first day of his Turkey visit. Bardakoglu's directorate commands a huge budget and oversees all of Turkey's imams.

Originally, the Vatican expected Bardakoglu to call on the pope at the Vatican Embassy, as protocol would have dictated. But the Turks refused. After a series of negotiations, the pope agreed to go to Bardakoglu. "It is a gesture of goodwill," a senior Vatican official said.

The pope's controversial presence in Turkey represents a balancing act for the government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, which regards itself a vital bridge between the West and East, a way for Westerners to deal with a modern and democratic Islam. But it also cannot appear too cozy with a pontiff who, in the view of many, is not fond of Muslims or Turks.

Erdogan is not scheduled to receive Benedict, citing a previous commitment to attend a NATO summit in Latvia on Tuesday and Wednesday. And there is no plan for the prime minister to see him off when the pope departs Dec. 1.

Both the Vatican and Turkish officials said this was not a snub, but Erdogan told visiting reporters in Istanbul last month, "You can't expect me to arrange my timetable according to the pope."

The frictions are rooted in history. The Ottoman Empire, which ruled the region for more than six centuries, was relatively tolerant of Jews, Christians and other non-Muslims. But before and during World War I, Western powers collaborated with

Christian and other minorities to bring down the Ottomans. In the carnage that followed, as many as 1.5 million Armenians were slaughtered, a similar number of ethnic Greeks expelled and 1 million Turks deported from Greece.

The 1923 Lausanne Treaty founded the Republic of Turkey and recognized minorities. But deep mistrust persists, and even today among ardent nationalists, Christians are seen as a potential fifth column.

"It's a kind of preemptive intolerance: Don't let it flourish because it might take over," said Mustafa Akyol, a writer and expert on interfaith relations. "Everyone is afraid of something."

Akyol, a Muslim, said he once wrote a column advocating that the museum of St. Sophia, or Aya Sofya, in Istanbul be returned to its original use, that of a church. The response was harsh: He was threatened and castigated as a "secret Greek." The pope is scheduled to visit St. Sophia, built in the 6th century as a Byzantine church and converted to a mosque in the 15th century by the Ottomans.

The mere rumor that the pope might say a prayer at the site has led to a bit of hysteria. Islamic newspaper Milli Gazete, in a front-page commentary last week, lashed out at the government for permitting the "Crusaders" to plan to bless the former church in a brazen attempt to "revive Byzantium."

For their part, Turkish officials have sought to minimize the pontiff's main mission on this trip: to worship alongside Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, head of the world's Orthodox Christians. The coming together of the two religious leaders is meant as a bridging of the 1,000-year-old rift between the two ancient branches of Christianity.

Such frictions notwithstanding, Turkey, compared with many Muslim countries, is relatively hospitable to non-Muslims. But its failure to make more progress on freedom-of-religion issues has been an important stumbling block in its years-long campaign to join the European Union.

It is EU pressure that has nudged Ankara along in easing some of the restrictions on minorities; for example, a Protestant group in Istanbul has for the first time been allowed to open a church.

"The EU reforms give people a sense of hope that there is light at the end of the tunnel," said Greek Orthodox Father Alexander Karloutsos. "It's been very dark here."

Discord Accompanies Bahrain Vote (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

MANAMA, Bahrain -- Friction between Sunni and Shiite Muslims in this strategic Persian Gulf kingdom, which is holding its second parliamentary elections in three decades, has clouded the voting set here for Saturday.

The campaign for the National Assembly's 40-member lower house has been marred by an alleged plot by a senior government official to rig the elections in favor of the ruling Sunni minority.

A 214-page report disclosed in September accused a senior official of secretly plotting to sideline the country's majority Shiites. The report, released by a former government adviser, is the latest in a series of events that have exacerbated Sunni-Shiite discord in this nation of 700,000, home to the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet.

The report has sparked demonstrations and calls for the prime minister's resignation and an international investigation. Its release coincides with simmering tensions caused by the sectarian violence in Iraq, fears of neighboring Iran's regional ambitions and the birth of a conservative Sunni political movement here.

Bahrain, a grouping of 33 islands, is the poorest oil-producing Gulf country and the only one with a Shiite majority. More than 200 candidates, including 16 women, will vie for seats in Saturday's elections.

The report was written by Salah al-Bandar, the former government adviser, and claims that a government minister and member of Bahrain's ruling al-Khalifa family planned and funded a plot to weaken the country's Shiites, who make up more than 60 percent of the population.

The 10-point plan, to be executed over a five-year period, called for paying a stipend to poor Shiites who convert; accelerating the naturalization of foreign Sunnis to alter the country's demographic makeup; and spying on Shiite organizations.

Bahraini officials have acknowledged a need for political balance between the country's sects but said the Bandar report was all lies. The government charged Bandar, a British citizen of Sudanese origin, with sedition and deported him days after the report's release.

Several of the people named in the report sued Bandar for defamation last month. He, in turn, is suing the government for wrongful termination.

Government officials said about 20 officials cited in the report have been suspended but have declined to comment further while the court cases are pending.

DOJ_NMG_0098643

Bandar, who worked for the cabinet affairs minister and the government statistics department, wrote the report on his own initiative with the help of government whistle-blowers. The report included copies of checks, bank statements showing large sums transferred to anti-Shiite figures and a memo calling for Shiites to be "cleansed" from Bahrain.

According to the report, more than $2.5 million was spent on the scheme, which also included plans to manipulate electronic voting to rig the upcoming elections in favor of Sunnis.

The report named people it said were hired to cause friction between the two sects by writing inflammatory articles, posting offensive comments on popular online forums, denigrating Shiite beliefs and casting suspicion on Shiites' patriotism.

Over the past couple of years, Bahraini Shiites have been accused by Sunnis and some in the government of allegiance to Shiite Iran, with which they have historic religious ties, and of ambitions to dominate the country, emboldened by the empowerment of Iraq's majority Shiites.

Shiite leaders say the government is trying to create a sectarian divide to deflect attention from the country's lack of democracy and political reform.

Wearing the long, dark cloak and rolled turban of the Shiite clergy, candidate Ali Salman, head of the largest Shiite opposition group, the al-Wefaq National Islamic Society, said the conflict is not between Shiites and a Sunni leadership, but between activists seeking political rights on the one hand and an autocratic regime on the other. "We are not asking for more Shiite mosques," said the 42-year cleric, who studied in Qom, Iran, and in Saudi Arabia. "We are not asking to set up an Islamic republic. All we're asking for is our full political rights."

At an election rally in Jid Hafs, a suburb of Manama, the capital, thousands of men and women sat on plastic chairs in a dusty lot to hear Salman speak.

Salman, who is widely viewed as the nation's most influential and moderate Shiite cleric, issued a warning to the government. "If this parliament is not able to give hope to the people, Bahrain will go through a very difficult time very soon," he said. "I will not be able to contain those who demand their rights."

In addition to the elected lower house, Bahrain's legislature includes an equally powerful, state-appointed upper chamber, and all legislation must be approved by the king. The opposition has called for constitutional amendments that would allow parliament to appoint the prime minister and for laws to be passed by elected representatives.

In a Shiite fishing village outside Manama, Mohsen Abdullah, a member of a local youth unemployment committee, sat cross-legged on the carpet in his living room and described a sit-in he plans to hold next week in front of the Interior Ministry. Abdullah, 24, who was released from prison last month after serving nine months for participating in an illegal demonstration, said he applied for a government job for more than two years and would keep protesting until he got one.

Now he lives with his parents, two brothers and a sister, and supplements his income by net-fishing near his home. He is enrolled in night school and said he is looking for any entry-level government job. "Why do they give foreigners jobs at the ministries and we don't get them?" he asked.

Despite police beatings and stints in jail, Abdullah still attends demonstrations and agitates for jobs for unemployed youths, most of whom are Shiites, he said. "I don't want to go to jail, but it's better than this," he said, gesturing. "Without a job, I can't get married, I can't buy a car, I can't get my own place."

Over lunch at an upscale Japanese restaurant, Information Minister Muhammad Abdul-Ghaffar Abdulla said that there was no poverty or discrimination in Bahrain and that jobs were awarded on merit.

"The government wants to build balance in the whole political system," he said. "Democracy is a long process. The most important thing for us is security and stability."

In Bahrain, A Referendum On Promises (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

MANAMA, Bahrain, Nov. 24 — For the past month, they have promised the world to voters in this tiny island kingdom off the east coast of Saudi Arabia: better housing, better jobs, higher salaries, and better services. One has even promised greater dignity.

But as more than 200 candidates vied for a seat in Bahrain's 40-member elected Parliament, the one thing that many were not prepared to promise was far-reaching political change.

"When I speak to supporters, I feel I have to acknowledge, yes, not much is going to change," said Sheik Ali Salman, the leader of the Wefaq National Islamic Society, Bahrain's leading opposition movement, which is predominantly Shiite and is vying for 17 seats in Parliament.

"But I try to emphasize to people that you are better off having someone looking out for your interests within the system, even if he wins only small victories," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0098644

Bahrain goes to the polls Saturday to elect a new Parliament in an atmosphere of growing sectarian division and disillusionment. Tensions have been running high here, fueled by a widening economic disparity between the country's minority Sunni population and its Shiite majority, as well as a growing frustration that long-promised changes have yet to materialize.

Just a few years ago, this island kingdom of 700,000 was hailed as a model of reform in the Arab world. King Hamad al-Khalifa ended a 25-year state of emergency in 1999, and was promising to turn Bahrain into a constitutional monarchy with a newly elected Parliament.

But the euphoria all but evaporated two years later, when the king broke his promises and imposed a constitution establishing a second, appointed legislative house that significantly curtailed the power of the elected one. Gerrymandering ensured a Sunni advantage in the elected house, too, prompting the predominantly Shiite opposition to boycott elections in 2002.

In the years since, Bahrain's Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of the population, have been sidelined. They allege that the government has backed Sunni Islamists and encouraged increasingly sectarian politics. Activists here say they have uncovered a systematic effort to naturalize Sunnis from other Arab countries as well as from Southeast Asia; as an indication of the government's intentions, they point to a polling place close to the causeway with Saudi Arabia where Saudis naturalized as Bahrainis can vote.

Tensions were heightened two months ago when a government adviser published a report outlining a conspiracy by senior government officials, including members of the royal family, to undermine the Shiites. Bahraini newspapers have been banned from discussing the so-called Bandargate scandal, named for the report's author, Salah al-Bandar, and Web sites mentioning it have been blocked.

Nevertheless, Sheik Salman and the rest of the opposition have entered the race, insisting that some representation is better than no representation at all. Sheik Salman said that many Shiites had realized that their being out of the political process only allowed the government to promulgate laws that hurt the Shiites' interests, including regulations limiting public gatherings and protests, as well as new terrorism laws that threatened to hamper the work of the opposition. "We won something and lost something by boycotting," he said "People are now convinced that it is better to take part even if it has small advantages."

Government officials hope the entry of the Shiites will serve to ease tensions. But opposition members say they intend to use their seats in Parliament as bully pulpits to goad the government into changing.

"I want to get inside to weaken the gates," said Ibrahim Sharif al-Sayed, a Sunni opposition candidate with the National Democratic Action Society, which has campaigned in alliance with Wefaq. "We will be there to expose the government, not to legitimize it. We want to show why we have no power in this country. I intend to be a Trojan horse."

But Mr. Sayed, a wealthy banker who has led a campaign to publicize the royal family's seizure of coastal lands for personal benefit, said liberal Sunnis like him had faced the greatest battles during this election. He was the subject of a relentless smear campaign, waged through cellphone text messages and e-mail messages. He alleges that the government is behind the campaign.

"The government wants a polarized Parliament based on sectarian grounds," he said. "They want to have a Sunni bloc and a Shia bloc which they can accuse of being tied to Iran. But we will get in the way of that agenda."

Sheik Salman says he hopes that his involvement will win at least some good faith gestures from the government. Otherwise, he warns, the current tensions could explode in the future.

"People rightly feel depressed because they know that the change will be very, very limited," he said. "But better slow, gradual advances than explosive change on the street."

Taiwan Leader Survives In Vote (WP)

By Jane Rickards

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan, Nov. 24 -- President Chen Shui-bian easily survived an impeachment vote in Taiwan's legislature Friday despite his wife's indictment on embezzlement charges and a prosecutor's statement that Chen could be indicted as well if he did not have presidential immunity.

The vote signaled that Chen, a combative champion of Taiwanese independence, is likely to remain in office until the end of his second four-year term in 2008 unless new irregularities are brought to light or new charges are filed.

But his mandate has been seriously undermined by the corruption indictment against his wife and similar indictments against his son-in-law and several senior aides. As a result, the political storm buffeting his leadership seemed unlikely to subside anytime soon.

The impeachment motion, brought by the opposition Nationalist Party, garnered 118 votes, 28 short of the 146 needed for a required two-thirds majority in the Legislative Yuan, or parliament. It was the third time since June that Chen's forces have defeated a recall motion, which if successful would precipitate a national referendum on whether the president should be ousted.

DOJ_NMG_0098645

The tally indicated that most lawmakers from Chen's Democratic Progressive Party and the allied Taiwan Solidarity Union remained loyal to the president, despite widespread discontent over the embezzlement scandal, including among his most loyal followers.

Two Democratic Progressive Party lawmakers quit parliament 10 days ago to protest the way the corruption scandals were being handled. But the party threatened to expel any members who cast ballots for impeachment, and with their own political futures hanging in the balance, Democratic Progressive lawmakers closed ranks and all 83 boycotted the vote.

On Nov. 3, a high court prosecutor charged Chen's wife, Wu Shu-chen, with forging receipts and embezzling about $450,000 from the president's discretionary funds. At that time, the prosecutor made his statement about presidential immunity preventing an indictment of Chen.

Chen, in a televised speech two days later, argued that the money in question was used for "secret diplomatic work," suggesting it went to pay off foreign leaders and lobbyists to further Taiwan's quest for diplomatic recognition. The rules governing receipts for such expenditures are complicated and unclear, he maintained, and at no time did he divert money for his own use. He said he would resign only if his wife was convicted.

Chen did not explain how his wife came to be involved in gathering receipts for such expenditures. The two have worked closely together since they married in 1975 and struggled side by side during the 1980s for native Taiwanese rights during martial law under the Nationalist Party government.

Ma Yingjeou, the Nationalist leader and the party's putative candidate for president in 2008, has reaped political benefits from the uproar for the past six months. But over the last 10 days, Ma, who is mayor of Taipei, has himself been accused of misusing official funds and has been interrogated by prosecutors. While Ma has denied the allegations, he acknowledged that a clerk in his office forged receipts to claim expenses.

Chen said Friday that he respected the legislature's democratic right to attempt impeachment, provided it followed constitutional procedures. "Democracy is nothing more than freedom and the rule of law," he told Therese Shaheen, the visiting former head of the American Institute in Taiwan, the government-sponsored organization through which the United States maintains quasi-diplomatic representation in Taiwan.

Corruption Scandal At Top Tests Taiwan's Democracy (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan, Nov. 18 — At times, Taiwanese politics is a blend of opera and blood sport, and this is one of those times. Scandal and outrage, lying and humiliation — all of it messy and delivered in a loud, public fashion — are consuming political life here, as a virtual death watch has settled over the second term of President Chen Shui-bian.

Mr. Chen, who once aspired to be Taiwan's George Washington, is now accused of being its Boss Tweed. Prosecutors have implicated him in a fake receipts scandal and are planning to put his wife on trial next month. The rival Nationalist Party, salivating over Mr. Chen's troubles, is facing its own scandal, as prosecutors say they are investigating the party's presumptive 2008 presidential candidate for his own fake receipts.

Taiwan's partisan newspapers have been filled with so many suggestive details — a reportedly ill-gotten Tiffany diamond ring, to name one — that the noise and acrimony have obscured the more elemental issue that the island's young democracy is being severely tested.

"In 10 years, when we look back, this could be a turning point for Taiwan's democracy to become mature," said Emile C. J. Sheng, a political science professor at Soochow University. "Right now, it is a disgrace, and it is quite humiliating. But once we get past this, I think Taiwan's politics will get a lot cleaner."

Politically, Taiwan's symbolic power has always been as a democratic counterpoint to China. But democracy in Taiwan remains a work in progress that has been repeatedly challenged during Mr. Chen's tenure. The pivotal recent event occurred Nov. 3 when a prosecutor in Taipei, the capital, indicted the first lady and also announced that Mr. Chen, immune from prosecution as president, could face charges after he left office. For a judicial branch regarded as a weak constitutional pillar, it was a historic moment.

"This is very hard evidence that at last we have a fair and independent-minded judicial branch," said Hwang Yih-jiau, an opposition legislator with the People First Party and a critic of the president. "The principle of separation of power has taken root in Taiwan."

Equally important, many analysts say the intense news media and prosecutorial focus on government accounts, and on how elected officials use them, has set a precedent that will bring more sunshine into the system. "I think members of future first families will be a lot more careful," said Chao Chien-min, a political analyst at a Taipei research institute.

DOJ_NMG_0098646

[For the immediate future, though, Taiwan's political scene will remain in turmoil. On Friday, the "pan blue" camp, made up of lawmakers from the Nationalist Party and the People First Party, tried to pass a motion for a nationwide recall referendum against the president. The bill failed to get the required two-thirds majority because lawmakers from Mr. Chen's Democratic Progressive Party remained unified behind him.]

Mayoral races on Dec. 7 in Taiwan's two largest cities, Taipei and Kaohsiung, will serve as barometers of the public mood toward Mr. Chen and his Democratic Progressive Party.

Then there is the corruption trial of the first lady, Wu Shu-chen, to begin Dec. 15. Mr. Chen has said he will leave office if his wife is convicted. Her trial will focus on the roughly $424,000 the couple collected from an executive "state affairs" fund.

To get the money, they submitted personal receipts gathered from friends and family. Mr. Chen has admitted initially lying to prosecutors about the receipts. But he has since explained on live television that the receipts were a bookkeeping necessity that enabled him to use state money for secret diplomacy — for which there are no receipts.

His defenders note that before Mr. Chen took office in 2000, presidents were not required to submit receipts to use such discretionary funds. They say prosecutors presented no evidence that Mr. Chen had used any of the money for personal gain. They also say Taiwan's unique international isolation, defined by its tense coexistence with China, makes confidentiality essential when a president wants to engage in diplomacy.

"Only the Taiwanese people and politicians can understand the importance of keeping things completely confidential," said Hsiao Mei-khim, a Democratic Progressive Party lawmaker who is an ally of Mr. Chen.

His critics, though, say the receipts scandal is just the latest example of what they describe as a pattern of corruption by the first family. This summer, prosecutors charged Mr. Chen's son-in-law with insider trading in a case that is still pending. The first lady has already been investigated — and cleared of any wrongdoing — after she received gift certificates from a department store seeking government approval for a change of ownership.

With so much baggage, Mr. Chen's secret diplomacy explanation in the receipts scandal has rung hollow to critics and much of the public. Polls place the president's approval ratings at record lows.

The scandal has also focused public attention on Mr. Chen's marriage, as several lawmakers have questioned the scruples of the first lady. She grew up as a doctor's daughter while Mr. Chen was dirt poor. Early in Mr. Chen's political career, Ms. Wu was paralyzed after being struck by a car during a political rally. The police ruled it an accident, but many people in the Democratic Progressive Party believe that it was an assassination attempt against Mr. Chen.

As first lady, Ms. Wu has attracted whispers for her penchant for luxury. One of the receipts in the scandal was for a Tiffany diamond ring valued at more than $30,000. Newspapers have reported that a Taiwanese sea cargo company had originally given jeweled watches to Mr. Chen's son for his wedding. But the family had returned the watches for a ring reportedly fitted for Ms. Wu.

Elected officials are allowed to accept gifts in Taiwan, but the ring has angered some of Mr. Chen's allies because the sea cargo company had business with the state. "It's a political question, it's a moral question, but it's not a legal question," Ms. Hsiao said. "We think it was very poor political judgment to take this kind of gift or live a lifestyle like that."

Public revulsion over the different scandals peaked late this summer when a former chairman of the Democratic Progressive Party organized enormous demonstrations in Taipei calling for Mr. Chen's resignation. At one level, the protests represented democratic free speech. But some here worried that they might overwhelm Taiwan's democratic institutions, the way similar protests prompted the recent "soft coup" in Thailand or have toppled presidents in the Philippines.

"We worried that if the demonstrations succeeded it would not be good for Taiwan's democracy," said Antonio Chiang, a former member of Mr. Chen's government who had been a dissident in Taiwan's pre-democracy era. "It would be like Thailand. But when the indictment came out, suddenly all these demonstrations went silent."

Mr. Chiang added: "Democracy without rule of law is very dangerous. Now, we are going to have rule of law."

Mr. Chen's election in 2000 was historic because it ended more than five decades of rule by the Nationalist Party. But many analysts say that many democratic values have not fully taken hold, and also blame the rival political camps for taking a zero-sum attitude toward politics and governing.

The Nationalists never seemed to accept Mr. Chen's legitimacy as president, political observers say, even as the Democratic Progressive Party, or D.P.P., remained deeply distrustful of its rivals. Political analysts say that Mr. Chen exacerbated this poisonous partisanship with his different political efforts to push for Taiwanese independence.

The question now is whether Mr. Chen will serve until his term ends in the spring of 2008. His party is disappointed, even disgusted, with him but has remained unified enough to fend off recall efforts. However, Mr. Chen's support could disintegrate if his party suffers in the mayoral elections, particularly in Kaohsiung, its stronghold.

For now, the D.P.P. is pointing at the Nationalist Party's likely 2008 presidential nominee, Ma Ying-jeou, who is also mayor of Taipei. Prosecutors are investigating whether Mr. Ma also wrongly submitted false receipts for public money. Mr. Ma has claimed his innocence and described the irregularity as an error by a clerk.

One way that some Taiwanese have reassured themselves is to note that none of this — a public demonstration against a president, an indictment against the first family — could have happened across the strait in nondemocratic China. Indeed, that point has been made by a handful of bloggers in China who have watched Taiwan's democratic convulsions not with disgust but with admiration.

Mr. Chiang, the former dissident, agreed but said Taiwan still had work to do. "We still have a lot to learn," he said. "Democracy is not so easy."

China And Pakistan Sign Free-trade Deal (LAT)

By Henry Chu And Mubashir Zaidi, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, November 26, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN — Chinese President Hu Jintao, visiting his country's staunchest ally in Asia, signed a free-trade deal here Friday and pledged to continue helping Pakistan build its civilian nuclear program.

But the Chinese leader stopped short of announcing the wide-ranging nuclear cooperation deal that many observers had expected him to unveil as a counterweight to a similar accord being hammered out between the United States and India, Pakistan's archrival.

Beijing already has supplied Islamabad with one nuclear reactor and is helping build a second at Chashma, in Punjab province. Pakistan is increasingly looking to nuclear sources as its energy needs grow in step with its expanding economy.

"We will continue to carry out such cooperation," Hu told reporters at a news conference here, during the first visit to Pakistan by a Chinese president in a decade.

Hu arrived in the Pakistani capital Thursday as part of a weeklong tour of South Asia that began with a four-day visit to India. China's communist government is eager to expand its political influence in the region and to improve its access to the area's abundant natural resources, including metals and natural gas.

Islamabad and Beijing have a long-standing "all-weather" friendship, based partly on a shared antagonism toward New Delhi.

Pakistan rolled out the red carpet for Hu, who was accorded the privilege Friday of addressing the country directly in a nationally televised speech. Relations between China and Pakistan, Hu said, were "higher than the Himalayas, deeper than the Indian Ocean and sweeter than honey."

China is Pakistan's chief arms supplier, and the nations signed a preliminary agreement for Beijing to outfit its ally with airborne early-warning systems.

But Hu's vaguely worded announcement of further collaboration regarding civilian nuclear energy probably was a disappointment for Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Islamabad had hoped China would commit to building as many as six more nuclear reactors.

Such an agreement would have served to counterbalance an accord, overwhelmingly approved by the U.S. Senate last week, that would allow American companies to sell nuclear fuel and technology to India, despite New Delhi's long-standing refusal to join the global Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Islamabad repeatedly has been rebuffed when seeking similarly favorable treatment from Washington. Last week, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher said in New Delhi that an exemption for India was warranted because of its "good track record" on nonproliferation and that those conditions did not exist elsewhere. He was referring to Pakistan, whose former chief nuclear scientist has admitted sharing information with Libya and North Korea.

As it was, Hu's pledge to continue civilian nuclear cooperation here did not appear to offer much more than the promise he gave India on Tuesday.

However, he got a free-trade agreement with Pakistan, a move India has rejected for fear unleashing of a flood of cheap goods. Officials in Beijing and Islamabad hope trade between their countries, which amounted to slightly more than $4 billion last year, can swell to $15 billion in five years.

"I am sure the free-trade agreement that we have signed with China will quadruple our trade and will give a boost to investments in Pakistan," Musharraf said. "We also look forward to the Chinese private sector taking advantage of the opportunities offered by Pakistan's vibrant and reformed economy."

Hu is scheduled to go on to the city of Lahore today before departing Pakistan on Sunday.

Times staff writer Chu reported from New Delhi and special correspondent Zaidi from Islamabad.

China Rejects Journalist's Appeal Of Spying Conviction (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 24 — A Beijing appeals court on Friday upheld a spying conviction of a prominent Hong Kong journalist in a case that has elicited criticism of China from human rights and press advocacy groups.

The journalist, Ching Cheong, faces a five-year prison sentence. He was arrested in April 2005 during a visit to Guangdong Province in mainland China and charged with taking payoffs in exchange for gathering information for Taiwan. A lower court in Beijing convicted him in August.

His family continues to dispute the charges.

"We feel very sad and shocked," Ching Hai, the defendant's older brother, told The Associated Press outside the courthouse on Friday morning. "We think it's very unfair. We question the fairness and transparency of this country's legal system."

Mr. Ching, 56, based in Hong Kong, is the chief China correspondent for The Straits Times, the leading newspaper in Singapore. His case, as well as the detention of a Chinese researcher for The New York Times, has prompted international concern about China's crackdown on press freedom. Earlier this year, the researcher for The Times, Zhao Yan, was acquitted of a charge of disclosing state secrets, but he is still awaiting a ruling on his appeal of an unrelated fraud conviction.

The Straits Times expressed disappointment with Friday's ruling. "As he is still not in the best of health, we appeal to the Chinese authorities to show him leniency and compassion while he is serving his sentence," the newspaper said in a statement. "We will continue to provide all necessary support and assistance to him and his family."

Family members have told reporters that Mr. Ching has been suffering from insomnia and stomach pains in prison. Born in southern China and raised in Hong Kong, Mr. Ching is a veteran journalist. His wife, Mary Lau, wrote an open letter in June that conceded that her husband played a dual role as a journalist and as a political adviser. But she said that he had advised Chinese leaders, not anyone in Taiwan, and she described him as a Chinese patriot who wanted to improve relations among China, Hong Kong and Taiwan.

Mr. Ching's arrest also raised questions about whether the Chinese authorities were trying to prevent him from writing about delicate political issues. Ms. Lau has said that her husband traveled to Guangdong in April 2005 to try to obtain tapes of secret interviews with China's former president, Zhao Ziyang, who had died three months earlier. The former leader had spent 16 years under house arrest in Beijing as a penalty for expressing sympathy for student protesters during the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations.

Ms. Lau has said that an intermediary entrapped Mr. Ching as he tried to collect the tapes.

On Friday, the official New China News Agency quoted an unidentified judge involved in the appeal as characterizing the August verdict as "accurate in application of the law and appropriate in meting out punishment."

Despite Setbacks, Blair Is Hopeful On Ulster Local Rule (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Nov. 24 — Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain on Friday held on to his hopes of restoring local rule across Northern Ireland next March, despite a day of high drama in which Protestant and Roman Catholic politicians failed to reach agreement on nominating leaders to a future power-sharing executive.

Echoing the province's recent violent past, the meeting was cut short after a notorious Protestant militant, Michael Stone, attacked the lobby of the parliament buildings here, carrying a gun and tossing inside a bag of homemade explosives. Shouting threats, he was wrestled to the ground by security staff members and arrested by the police.

Before the disruption, the Rev. Ian Paisley, Protestant leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, refused to nominate himself as first minister of Northern Ireland to serve alongside Martin McGuinness of Sinn Fein, the main Catholic republican party. Mr. Paisley explained his resistance by saying that Sinn Fein had yet to endorse Northern Ireland's police force and its courts. Friday was the nominal deadline to do so.

Mr. Paisley, who seeks to maintain the province's political ties with Britain, had for years based his political career on rejecting sharing power with Sinn Fein because of its links with the Irish Republican Army.

Speaking in London, Mr. Blair indicated that despite the setback the British and Irish governments would continue their efforts to restore local rule, a process that is contingent on the divided parties resolving crucial differences over power sharing and support for the police.

DOJ_NMG_0098649

"What is clear is this: If Sinn Fein agrees to the proper and full support of policing in Northern Ireland by the Police Service of Northern Ireland and to the rule of law, then the Democratic Unionist Party will share power with them," Mr. Blair said.

He also spoke of the need for the province to get away from its "wretched and divisive past."

The attack on the parliament buildings by Mr. Stone, a convicted killer, was a reminder of a more violent past that many in Northern Ireland now believe is behind them.

Mr. Stone became an iconic figure for Protestant militants when he killed three mourners in a gun and grenade attack on an Irish Republican Army funeral in 1988. He was released early in 2000 under the terms of the Good Friday peace accord for that attack and others. This year, Mr. Stone took part in a series of televised broadcasts in which Archbishop Desmond Tutu, the former head of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission, brought together victims and perpetrators from the sectarian violence in Northern Ireland.

The targets and motives for his attack on Friday remained unclear. Politicians and journalists evacuated the buildings. [A news agency], quoting a police official, reported that the British Army had defused the six to eight explosive devices in Mr. Stone's bag.

The level of distrust between political parties has remained high in the eight years since the negotiation of the 1998 Good Friday peace agreement, which ended much of the politically motivated violence and led to the first power-sharing local government to involve Protestant politicians and Catholic representatives from Sinn Fein. But local rule fell apart in 2002 amid distrust between Catholic and Protestant leaders.

In Scotland last month, Britain and Ireland acted to restore that local government, by putting forward a series of proposals and deadlines for the province's parties.

Under the proposals, elections to the 108-seat assembly were to be held early in March before the formation of a local executive later that month.

Sinn Fein, which has yet to call a full meeting of its party delegates to endorse policing, is seeking guarantees from the British government over what appears to be their central demand: that powers over policing and the courts will shift from London to the local executive in Belfast.

Bomb Threat Empties N. Ireland Assembly (WP/AP)

By Shawn Pogatchnik, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

BELFAST, Northern Ireland -- The Northern Ireland Assembly missed another deadline for forming a government Friday, then politicians fled the building after one of the province's most infamous Protestant militants tossed a bomb-filled bag into the entrance.

Police subdued Michael Stone, who killed three people at an Irish Republican Army funeral in 1988. The Northern Ireland police commander, Chief Constable Hugh Orde, later said Stone's bag contained at least six explosive devices that British army experts safely dismantled.

Politicians and journalists were ordered out of Stormont Parliamentary Building as the fire alarm sounded _ and two security guards pinned Stone by both arms to the main doorway. He was later wrestled outside, into pouring rain and wind, as he shouted a favored Protestant militant slogan: "No surrender!" Police later recovered a handgun and knife from him.

Stone had abandoned the bag near the building's security checkpoint staff, who operate metal detectors and search bags. He also appeared to have been spray-painting the entrance to Stormont with "Sinn Fein-IRA murderers" or "war criminals," but did not finish it.

Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Hain ordered an immediate investigation into what he called a "very serious breach of security. ... The chaotic scenes at Stormont were deeply disturbing."

Chief Constable Hugh Orde said the explosives inside the bag, which convicted killer Michael Stone threw into the lobby of Stormont Parliamentary Building during a debate on power-sharing, were "fairly amateurish in design. That does not make them any less dangerous."

Orde called Stone's action "a sad publicity act by a very sad individual."

Stone's incursion came minutes after Protestant leader Ian Paisley refused to accept a nomination as the future leader of Northern Ireland's power-sharing administration.

Paisley, whose Democratic Unionist Party is the largest in Northern Ireland, said he would work with Sinn Fein, the IRA-linked party that represents most Catholics, only when it begins to support the police force. If that happened, Paisley said, he would accept the post.

DOJ_NMG_0098650

"When Sinn Fein has fulfilled its obligations with regard to the police, the courts and the rule of law, then and only then can progress be made. There can and will be no movement until they face and sign up to their obligations," Paisley told the assembly.

The prime ministers of Britain and Ireland, Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern, said Stone's threat illustrated why rival British Protestant and Irish Catholic politicians should compromise and form a stable coalition as the Good Friday peace accord intended.

More than seven months ago, Blair and Ahern announced that Nov. 24 would be their final deadline for a power-sharing deal _ but both on Friday shrugged off this commitment and insisted that Paisley's statement contained the hope of future progress.

Both premiers said they expected Sinn Fein to clear the way for Paisley by accepting the authority of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Sinn Fein insists it will not take this step first, if at all.

"It seems that Michael Stone has gone on the rampage again, in a very dangerous way. But he was stopped," Ahern said in Dublin. "It just shows you exactly what we are trying to get away from in Northern Ireland."

"No move forward in Northern Ireland is easy. We've learned that over 10 years," said Blair, who has closely cooperated with Ahern in brokering compromise in Northern Ireland since both premiers rose to power in 1997. "And it's not because the people, or indeed, the leaders in Northern Ireland want it to be so, but because each step towards a different and better future is taken alongside the memory of a wretched and divisive past."

Stone was responsible for one of Northern Ireland's most dramatic days _ March 16, 1988, when he launched a solo gun-and-grenade strike on an IRA funeral. He killed three mourners, among them an IRA man, and wounded about 60 other people before a pursuing Catholic mob surrounded and badly beat him.

Stone was paroled from prison in 2000 under terms of the 1998 peace pact, which permitted early releases for more than 500 convicted members of the IRA and outlawed Protestant paramilitary groups. He took part in a televised discussion with relatives of a Catholic man he had shot to death in a different attack.

Despite Paisley's refusal, Hain said his words were sufficient to keep the assembly intact until the end of January, when Britain plans to dissolve it anyway.

An election to a new assembly is scheduled March 7. Britain expects the members to elect all 12 members of the administration, to be led by Paisley and McGuinness, on March 14. If this happened, Britain would transfer control of Northern Ireland's 13 government departments to the administration March 26.

Ecuador's Presidential Vote Too Close To Call (AFP)

By Patrick Moser

AFP, November 24, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador -- Leftist Rafael Correa gained ground over conservative Alvaro Noboa, but the margin remains too narrow to predict a presidential winner, pollsters said yesterday.

A Cedatos/Gallup Ecuadorean voter intention poll was made public yesterday.

"With such results, it is not possible to predict the final outcome of the November 26 election," the polling institute said of the survey, which has a three-percentage-point margin of error.

But the poll reflected a dramatic surge in support for leftist economist Mr. Correa, who had 41 percent to Mr. Noboa's 59 percent on Oct. 30. Last week the pollsters had Mr. Correa getting 48 percent, trailing his rival by four points.

Over the past days, both candidates have gone all out to attract undecided voters, which Cedatos/Gallup said accounted for 17 percent of the 9.2 million Ecuadoreans eligible to vote.

Each has warned that his rival's victory will have disastrous consequences for the South American country, which has had seven presidents over the past 10 years.

Mr. Noboa claims his leftist rival wants to install a communist dictatorship closely tied to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, a fiercely anti-American leader. That, he warned, would lead to a bloody uprising.

"Correa wants an insurrection, a civil war in which the poor will die," Mr. Noboa, 56, told cheering supporters at his final electoral rally on Thursday night.

Mr. Correa for his part claimed that Mr. Noboa, Ecuador's wealthiest man, would run the country as his private estate.

The leftist warned his supporters to be on the lookout for a repetition of the electoral fraud he claims marred the Oct. 15 first round, which was led by Mr. Noboa.

Both have run populist campaigns, vowing to improve the lot of the millions of Ecuadoreans who live on less than $2 a day in a country that pumps out more than half a million barrels of crude daily.

DOJ_NMG_0098651

Bible in hand, falling to his knees and invoking the name of God, Mr. Noboa has vowed that if elected he would build 300,000 homes a year for the poor -- an average of almost 1,000 a day.

Portraying himself as a champion of the poor and his rival as "a communist devil," the conservative billionaire handed out wheelchairs and food and openly distributed cash at his rallies.

Mr. Noboa has said he would encourage foreign investment, tighten ties with the United States and distance the country from Venezuela and communist Cuba.

He also said the 400 U.S. troops stationed at a base in the Pacific port of Manta would be welcome to stay when their lease runs out in 2009.

Mr. Correa, on the other hand, said he would not renew the lease, but insisted he wanted to stay on good terms with Washington and continue bilateral trade, as long as it is "just and mutually profitable."

His strong showing in opinion polls has stirred unease in financial markets worried about his promise to revise contracts with foreign oil companies and to renegotiate Ecuador's foreign debt.

After trailing Mr. Noboa by four points in the first round, Mr. Correa distanced himself somewhat from Mr. Chavez, but stressed he remained a friend of the Venezuelan president. He also eased up on his criticism of President Bush, after he had called the U.S. president a "dimwit."

Morales Steps Up Pressure For Land Redistribution (WT)

By Martin Arostegui

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

SANTA CRUZ, Bolivia -- Indians, coca farmers and landless peasants are heeding a call by leftist President Evo Morales to surround Congress to press for radical land redistribution that is opposed by landowners and farmers.

From Bolivia's highlands hundreds of miles away, protesters are descending on the capital, La Paz, for a series of demonstrations next week targeting the Senate, which refuses to pass the land measure.

"We have been struggling for years to regain control of our resources and are prepared to apply communal justice against the corrupt senators that stand in our way," said Juan Choque, the leader of a peasant group that started out two weeks ago for La Paz from the eastern town of Yapacani.

The new law is a centerpiece of government plans to redistribute millions of acres to Indian supporters.

It has been approved by the lower house of Congress, but the Senate has refused.

"We will not pass a law that destroys this country's productive system" said Senate Vice President Jose Villavicencio, who represents the northeast province of Pando. He accuses the government of financing the mobilization of 10,000 Qechua and Aymara Indians from around the country.

The measure is strongly opposed by landowners and farmers in Bolivia's fertile eastern lowlands.

Mr. Morales initiated the protest against the Senate, saying it "must be forced to approve this law that revindicates the original indigenous people of Bolivia."

Agriculture Minister Hugo Salvatierra has been giving away tractors donated by Venezuela to peasants rallying at various points along the marching routes stretching about 400 miles.

In the Senate, the rightist Podemos party and smaller centrist parties hold a majority of 15 seats over 12 controlled by Mr. Morales' Movement to Socialism (MAS).

MAS is drafting a new constitution that would abolish the upper chamber. Podemos leader Jorge Quiroga has charged that Mr. Morales is redesigning the system of government to perpetuate himself in power by "following the radical example of Hugo Chavez in Venezuela."

The Senate is also holding up final approval of a military agreement signed with Venezuela last August to build major army bases in eastern Bolivia, where an opposition-led referendum for regional self-rule won with more than 70 percent of the vote in July and separatist sentiment is growing.

"If they close down the Senate, the central government is finished for us, and we will have to fight to defend our own democracy," the Santa Cruz civic committee president, German Antelo, told 8,000 people in an anti-government protest earlier this week.

The rally was also attended by a group of independent miners from the western mountain province of Huanuni, where a revolt against the nationalization of the mines resulted in 17 deaths last month.

Colombian Senator Faces Down Paramilitaries (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, November 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098652

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA — Some may object to his politics, but few question the courage of leftist Colombian Sen. Gustavo Petro, whose five-year campaign to prod the government into investigating elected officials' links to illegal paramilitary groups finally bore fruit this month.

Colombia's Supreme Court issued arrest orders for three sitting members of Congress and one former member as well as an ex-governor on charges including murder, electoral fraud and diversion of public funds in collusion with right-wing militia leaders. All charged are from the northern state of Sucre and all but the ex-governor, Salvador Arana, are behind bars.

Arrests of as many as 20 more Congress members may take place soon, officials said this week.

From the floor of the legislature, Petro, a former guerrilla, has declared repeatedly that members of Congress are up to their necks in illegal activities with the right-wing militias in Sucre state and has called on President Alvaro Uribe's government to investigate them.

It has come at great personal risk in a country where opposition to the militias often is a death sentence. The Supreme Court also faces retribution for issuing the orders, as does Prosecutor General Mario Iguaran for requesting them.

Petro routinely receives death threats, and doesn't go anywhere without a security escort of as many as 10 police officers. "They can kill me at any time without the least moral or ethical reluctance," Petro said. "My assassin could be sitting next to me in the Senate."

One of those accused, Sen. Alvaro Garcia Romero, was charged with having ordered militia leaders to conduct a massacre in 2000 and murder an election monitor in 1997.

The arrests came at a delicate point in Colombia's demobilization process, after the surrender of about 31,000 paramilitary fighters since 2003 and as the Uribe government is beginning to prosecute their leaders.

The militias were formed in the 1980s by farmers and ranchers to defend against leftist guerrilla attacks. But some of the private armies took over much of the nation's drug traffic; they were labeled terrorist organizations by the United States in the 1990s.

Recent revelations indicate that although militia leaders gave up their arms, many retain control of criminal networks that run illicit businesses with the aid of the local and national politicians they have co-opted.

"What is happening is that a large part of Colombia now feels under attack by the paramilitaries, and business interests feel threatened," said Petro, 46, in an interview at his apartment complex in northern Bogota, as 10 police officers stood guard below. "Maybe this is why the charges are being brought now."

Another factor could be the information contained in a laptop computer, seized in a government raid this year, allegedly documenting the activities of paramilitary leader Rodrigo Tovar, alias "Jorge 40." Data in the laptop were said to chronicle several murders, continued militia activities and politician contacts made after Tovar demobilized, a sign to critics that demobilization has done little to curb the paramilitaries' power.

A Supreme Court official confirmed to The Times in an interview last week that evidence from the computer was considered in the cases. "It was just one element of evidence, but we had no reason to think it was all an invention," the official said.

In exchange for electoral support, politicians help the paramilitaries "accumulate wealth" by easing false documentation of property transfers, diverting or kicking back public works contracts, and putting the local police at the paramilitaries' service, Petro said.

Even fellow legislators who oppose Petro, a former M-19 guerrilla, credit him for bringing the debate over paramilitary ties to the public's attention.

"He brought these cases in Sucre to Congress, mounted the investigations and said publicly, 'This is happening,' " said Sen. Gina Parody, who sits on the opposite side of the aisle but has joined with Petro in denouncing the paramilitaries' cozy relations with some legislators. "Denouncing this illegality is very risky."

All of those charged are allies of President Uribe, whose administration is facing one of its biggest crises because of the political damage that further revelations and arrests could bring.

Much damage has been done. Prosecutor Iguaran told reporters that the crisis confronting the Uribe government was worse than that faced by then-President Ernesto Samper in 1994 when it was alleged that his campaign received money from the Cali drug cartel.

There is no public evidence linking Uribe to paramilitaries, but the arrests have fueled criticism that he has been too easy on militia leaders in the pacification process, promising lenient sentences in exchange for disarmament and confessions. Some wonder why allegations that surfaced five years ago have taken so long to lead to charges.

Back then, before demobilization began, paramilitary leader Salvatore Mancuso boasted that 35% of Congress was loyal to him and other paramilitary chiefs.

DOJ_NMG_0098653

"The issue facing Colombia is the nature and reach of paramilitarism," said Cynthia Arnson, head of the Latin American program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington. "It's a military force that has been demobilized, but it's also a mafia-like criminal organization that has penetrated the legal economy and begun to subvert legitimate political institutions."

Petro's detractors say he is inconsistent, and less troubled by infractions by left-wing guerrillas than those by right-wing paramilitaries. One high-ranking Uribe official, while expressing admiration for Petro's outspokenness, said the senator practiced "relative morality," adding, "There are no good deaths and bad deaths."

A native of Zipaquira radicalized in part by the overthrow of Chilean President Salvador Allende in 1973, Petro joined the urban guerrilla group M-19 at age 17. He was elected to his town's city council at 21, keeping his guerrilla membership a secret until then-President Belisario Betancur and rebels signed a peace accord in 1984.

But the peace was short-lived. Petro survived torture and spent 18 months in jail from 1985 to 1987.

Shortly after he was imprisoned, M-19 rebels seized the Palace of Justice in November 1985, a takeover that Petro says he knew nothing about beforehand. The army's retaking of the building left dozens dead.

Upon his release from prison, Petro spent three years in hiding. "If the army had found me, they would have killed me," he said.

Petro resurfaced in 1990, when President Virgilio Barco Vargas declared another peace accord.

Petro was elected to Congress from Bogota in 1991 on the M-19 ticket. But a series of slayings of his former comrades sent him fleeing again in 1994, this time to Europe.

He returned to Colombia and was elected again to Congress in 1998. He was reelected in 2002 before moving to the Senate this year as a candidate for the Democratic Pole, a party he co-founded. He got the second-most votes of any senatorial candidate.

Petro said his voice is no longer a lonely one. "Now there are many voices and many allies. Half the Congress wants this investigation to continue. The news media fill their pages with the allegations against the paramilitaries."

Uncovering the truth and proceeding with investigations are crucial to Colombia's democratic progress, he said.

"This is a crisis that either can lead us to national fragmentation, a Balkanization as in Yugoslavia, or to the construction of a real republic."

Chile's Student Activists: A Course In Democracy (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile -- When the Class of 2006 graduates in a few weeks, its members will look back at a year in which some of the most important lessons took place outside the classroom.

In their black and white school uniforms, they launched what became known here as the "Penguin Revolution," filling the streets, calling for educational reforms, occupying school buildings and sparking a nationwide debate that was quickly labeled a milestone for the nation's young democracy.

Extracurricular activities for student leaders this year meant negotiating with senior government officials. When they text-messaged friends, at times it was to organize rallies that attracted as many as 800,000 people. A few became nationally known public figures in their own right.

"Graduation will be hard, and there are going to be a lot of emotions that come back from this year," said Karina Delfino, 17, who became one of the voices of the student movement during her senior year. "All the friends made, the difficulties and the successes -- this was one stage in life that has been good, but very tough. The only thing I can do now is to try to end this stage as best I can and get ready for whatever is next."

That's the question many high school-age Chileans face, as the school year winds down with the approach of a Southern Hemisphere summer: How do they follow a year like this one?

The students' actions turned them into the most powerful social movement since the strict military dictatorship of Gen. Augusto Pinochet was replaced by democracy 16 years ago. They forced the government to increase education spending and -- more important for many of the protesters -- prompted it to reexamine the roots of an educational system flawed by vast inequalities between the country's rich and poor populations.

Not everyone has approved of the students' methods at all times, but it's difficult to find anyone who hasn't come to accept them as a significant part of the country's social and political landscape.

"I believe their greatest achievement was to change the way people think of the youth of the country," said Rodrigo Cornejo, with the Chilean Observatory of Educational Policy at the University of Chile. "A lot of people thought the young people were simply individualistic, selfish consumers. But the long-term changes the students were pressing for this year weren't going to directly benefit them -- it was for their younger brothers and sisters."

Many of the students don't think of the past year in such epic terms. As Delfino's school day ended on Wednesday, the 3,000 students at her school poured onto the sidewalks of central Santiago and lingered at bus and subway stops, naturally dividing themselves into the broad cliques that their school uniforms can't erase: jocks, Goths, drama kids, Barbies, hard-cores. Some sat on curbs and lighted cigarettes. Some jammed the headphones of MP3 players into their ears. Most talked, and the conversations did not, as a rule, address weighty matters of social justice.

They are all too young to remember Pinochet's dictatorship, which subdued opposition groups with tactics that ranged from intimidation to murder and torture. All their lives, their teachers, parents and government leaders have emphasized that they live in a hard-won democracy, where everyone has a voice.

Instead of plotting a grand revolution, the students said, they simply decided to take what they'd been taught at face value. If Chile's economy was so good -- as they had been hearing repeatedly during the presidential election campaigns in 2005 -- why did some schools lack essential supplies, like books and desks? Why should public schools be managed at the municipal level when that system encourages disparities between rich and poor neighborhoods? If Chile is a participatory democracy, why not participate?

"As the movement started to grow, we had everyone involved -- hippies, evangelicals, all the groups," said Delfino, who belongs to her school's social circle of organizers, those drawn to student government and academic organizations. "We all wanted the same thing, which was change. So we were trying to respect different opinions while at the same time working for consensus. That's all."

The movement began last year with inconclusive petitions to the government of President Ricardo Lagos. After the January election of Michelle Bachelet, a Socialist who won by campaigning for social justice and compassion for the poor and vulnerable, many student leaders began the new academic year with optimism. They waited for Bachelet to address education reform during a May state of the nation speech; when she didn't, a new sort of protest movement immediately blossomed.

"I'd leave school in the afternoons and go to the national student assembly," Delfino said. "Other days, when I had tests, I'd study at night and sleep three or four hours, then go to class in the morning and do the same thing again. My friends talked about 'The Ghost of Karina.' "

The day after Bachelet's speech, an all-girls public school was taken over by pupils. Thousands of students boycotted classes. Soon private school students joined in the protests, while university students and teachers unions also voiced support. The Education Ministry soon began holding negotiations with student leaders, and Bachelet eventually promised more funding to help the poorest students and created a panel, which included student representatives, to discuss broad reforms of the national educational system.

The strain of juggling all that with academics took a toll on some students, which they are confronting now. MarÃ-a Huerta, a movement leaders who attends a technical school here, isn't sure whether she will be able to get into a university next year.

"My mother was bothered by this, because I was spending so much time with the student organizations and not in class," said Huerta, 19. "We have a very close family, but they're all worried about me. My mom is worried about my future, my cousin is worried about my safety, and my uncle doesn't talk to me anymore -- he doesn't agree at all with what I'm doing."

Students such as Huerta and Delfino, who got a strong taste of civic involvement this year, are trying to figure out whether they want to make a career of social involvement. Both said they are considering studying sociology or public administration, but they still aren't sure how they will apply what they learned outside of class.

"The decision I have to make is whether I want to try to make changes through working directly with the community, or through politics," Huerta said. "If I work in the community, I can change the lives of a small group of people. With politics, you can do it on a macro level. But I don't want to join a political party."

Huerta continued to debate the advantages and disadvantages of each choice, coming to the conclusion that she'll have to give it more thought.

Like most leaders of the Penguin Revolution, she has more time to think about such questions now: Tensions have eased considerably as the end of the year approaches. Some students continue to periodically occupy schools because they believe the government is implementing its promises too slowly.

Public opinion of the students isn't as high as it was a few months ago, when polls indicated that about 75 percent of the country backed them, but it is still generally positive. Huerta said she hopes the movement she helped start will be able to regain its strength next year, as a new class of students takes over leadership posts.

"My age group started it, with the idea that you can be supportive of Chile and democracy without having to agree with everything the government does, that it's okay to be critical," Huerta said. "Now we have to see where the students in the first and second years of the high schools take it. I'm eager to see it."

Canada Arrests "Illegal" Spy From Russian Intelligence (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 25, 2006

Canada's security service recently arrested a deep-cover Russian intelligence officer posing as a Canadian citizen in what officials say is a rare capture of an "illegal" spy.

Court papers identified the man as Paul William Hampel and said he was a member of Russia's foreign intelligence service, or SVR, and an "illegal" spy operating without the protection of diplomatic cover.

A Canadian federal court report made public earlier this week stated that the Canadian Security and Intelligence Services thinks Mr. Hampel "is a danger to the security of Canada" and was thus "inadmissible" to the country.

Mr. Hampel was arrested at Montreal's Pierre Elliot Trudeau Airport on Nov. 14 and found to be carrying three passports that authorities said were obtained fraudulently using a Canadian birth certificate.

He also was found carrying about $6,876 worth of five different currencies, along with several bank and credit cards, index cards containing historical data on Canada, encrypted prepaid cell phone cards and a shortwave radio.

Mr. Hampel is being held on a little-used national security law and faces deportation or prosecution for fraud in a secret trial.

A U.S. official said the capture was a coup for the Canadians, since deep-cover spies are very hard to find.

"Identifying and subsequently catching an Illegal is the creme de la creme of the counterintelligence business," the official said.

The Canadian report noted that in 1996 two Russians were identified as an SVR illegal team and deported.

The FBI has not uncovered any SVR illegals in the United States, despite claims that spying by Russian intelligence in recent years is at Cold War levels.

The CIA identified a KGB illegal in 1989 posing as a Finnish national named Reino Gikman, who was photographed meeting State Department official Felix Bloch, a suspected Russian mole in the department who was never prosecuted.

"Hampel's infiltration into Canada and development of a Canadian legend based on an identity created by the SVR has permitted Hampel to abuse the integrity of the Canadian system, including citizenship and all its inherent privileges," the report said. "As a documented Canadian citizen, Hampel has been operating covertly on behalf of the SVR and, as such, poses a danger to Canada's national security and Canada's interests internationally."

The report said the use of Canadian documents "provided him with the ability to covertly further the interests of the SVR for over a decade both within Canada and abroad."

Georgi Mamedov, Russia's ambassador to Canada, told a Canadian television station that he had no information about the case, and he sought to highlight Russia's cooperation with Canada in the war on terrorism.

In Moscow, SVR spokesman Sergey Ivanov told the Interfax News Agency: "Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service, like any other foreign intelligence service, does not comment on whether an individual is or is not involved in its activities."

Bloc Quebecois Supports Canada PM (BBC)

BBC.com, November 24, 2006

The leader of Canada's separatist Bloc Quebecois has said his party will back a government motion that Quebecers form a "nation within a united Canada".

Gilles Duceppe said Prime Minister Stephen Harper's motion was a victory for separatist aspirations in Quebec.

Quebec, mostly Francophone, has held two referendums on separation, in 1980 and 1995, but rejected the idea.

Mr Harper's Conservatives won Canada's general election in January to end 12 years of Liberal rule.

In a parliamentary debate on Friday, Mr Duceppe said the Bloc will join Canada's other opposition parties in supporting the motion that Mr Harper announced on Wednesday.

"We are delighted by the fact that Canada will become the first country to officially recognise the Quebec nation," Mr Duceppe said.

The government motion says that the House of Commons should "recognise that Quebecers constitute a nation within a united Canada".

The Bloc Quebecois is the third-largest party in the national parliament after the Conservatives and Liberals.

The debate over Quebec's status was reopened earlier in the week when the Bloc announced it would table a motion in parliament calling for recognition of Quebecers as a nation.

Gilles Duceppe's Bloc Quebecois is Canada's third-largest party There was no mention of Canada.

Mr Harper then introduced his motion on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0098656

"The real question is simple," he said in the House of Commons. "Do Quebecois make up a nation of their own in a united Canada? The answer is yes.

"Do Quebecois make up a nation independent from Canada? The answer is no and will always be no."

On Thursday the Bloc tabled its motion but with an amendment to say that Quebecers should be recognised as a nation that is "currently within Canada".

On Friday, Mr Harper welcomed the Bloc's decision to back the government.

"This is the third position the Bloc has taken on this in three days," Mr Harper said.

"They moved a motion, they made an amendment to a motion and now they're supporting our motion."

He said the motion would not amend the constitution. "This is merely a declaration of recognition and an act of reconciliation."

Constitutional experts say the motion carries no legal weight and would be unlikely to give Quebec separatists a lever to extract more political powers from Ottawa.

The motion is expected to pass easily in parliament next week now that it has the backing of all the major parties.

Rwanda Ends Diplomatic Ties With France (AP)

By Angela Doland, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 25, 2006

Rwanda severed diplomatic ties with France on Friday in response to a French judge's decision to issue international arrest warrants for nine ranking Rwandans suspected of plotting the 1994 killing of the African nation's president.

The French Foreign Ministry said it regretted Rwanda's decision and was "taking all necessary arrangements."

France's ambassador in Rwanda, Dominique Decherf, will leave the country Saturday and the 29 other embassy personnel in the capital, Kigali, were leaving by Monday evening, embassy security chief Serge Kulmicht told The Associated Press.

On Wednesday, a French investigating judge issued arrest warrants for nine ranking Rwandans suspected of plotting the downing of then-President Juvenal Habyarimana's airplane on April 6, 1994 — an act that sparked the country's genocide.

Late Thursday, Rwanda withdrew its ambassador, Emmanuel Ndagijimanam, from Paris for consultations, diplomat Parfait Gahamanyi said. The officials targeted by the French judge are close to Rwanda's current president, Paul Kagame, and the decision has enflamed tensions.

Rwandan Justice Minister Tharcisse Karugarama said the move was a response to French "bullying."

"There is no reason why there should be diplomatic relations with a country that is actually attempting to destabilize the institutions of Rwanda's government," Karugarama told The Associated Press.

French anti-terrorism judge Jean-Louis Bruguiere suspects that nine Rwandans were responsible for plotting the assassination or actually shooting down Habyarimana's airplane.

Bruguiere — renowned for tracking down the renowned terrorist Carlos the Jackal — is investigating the case because the crew on the downed plane was French. The families of the pilot, co-pilot and mechanic, who all died in the crash, filed a suit in France in 1998.

After the attack, militants from the Hutu ethnic majority, known as interahamwe, quickly set up roadblocks across the capital, Kigali, and on April 7 began killing Tutsis and moderate Hutus. More than 500,000 people were killed in 100 days.

Kagame's Rwanda Patriotic Front, or RPF, toppled the Hutu extremists and ended the genocide.

The question of who shot down the plane has been a central mystery of the genocide. Speculation has focused on Kagame's largely Tutsi force, or hard-line Hutus hoping to encourage mass violence against Tutsis.

According to Bruguiere's order, Kagame allegedly instructed his group to down the aircraft.

"The final order to attack the presidential plane was given by Paul Kagame himself during a meeting held in Mulindi on March 31, 1994," Bruguiere wrote in the warrant request.

France grants immunity to acting heads of state, preventing judicial authorities from issuing a warrant for Kagame. Those targeted include armed forces chief James Kabarebe and army chief of staff Charles Kayonga. Warrants also were issued for those suspected by the French judge of attacking the plane — Franck Nziza, believed to be a captain in the presidential guard, and Eric Hakizimana, of the secret service.

Kagame called the judge "an impostor, a politician" in an interview Wednesday with France-Culture radio. He also promised that ties between both countries would suffer.

France annulled Rwanda's entire $57 million bilateral debt this year. But relations between France and Rwanda have been strained for years, with Kagame accusing France of doing too little to stop the genocide.

Associated Press writer Elizabeth A. Kennedy in Nairobi, Kenya, contributed to this report.

World Court Official Reports Evidence On Darfur Criminals (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

The International Criminal Court has found sufficient evidence to identify the perpetrators of some of the worst atrocities in Sudan's Darfur region, and the probe offers "reasonable grounds to believe" that crimes against humanity were committed, chief prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo told the annual meeting of the court's member states in The Hague.

"We selected incidents during the period in which the gravest crimes occurred," he said Thursday in a report on his activities over the past year. "Based on the evidence collected, we identified those most responsible for the crimes." Moreno-Ocampo did not name the targets of the investigation, which he said is nearly complete.

In a telephone interview before he addressed representatives of the 103 nations that have ratified the 1998 agreement creating the court, he said the atrocities included "rape, torture, willful murder, sexual and inhuman violent acts, extra-judicial killings and the forcible transfer and persecution of civilians."

Moreno-Ocampo's investigators have collected thousands of documents and conducted 70 visits in 17 countries, including Sudan, since June 2005. His teams have interviewed judges, prosecutors and Sudanese investigators, as well as a top Sudanese military official and a senior political official. Sudanese officials shared the outcome of a government inquiry, and the Sudanese army provided its analysis of what had happened, he said.

"To define the truth is important, and to define the responsibility is important, to prevent it from recurring," he said in the interview. He added that court procedures required him to investigate "incriminating and also exonerating circumstances."

Moreno-Ocampo said a priority was reaching victims, although he chose not to go to the Darfur region itself, so as not to endanger victims or witnesses. However, he was able to find them elsewhere, he said, including in neighboring Chad and in Sudan outside Darfur. Investigators screened 600 potential witnesses and conducted in-depth interviews with more than 100 people. The prosecutor must determine whether the Sudan government is carrying out an inquiry into the same incidents and individuals. If there are not "genuine national proceedings," he said, he will present his evidence to the judges.

"We are almost ready," he said.

Moreno-Ocampo added that other challenges involving health, development and security needed to be confronted simultaneously by other world institutions and states.

As many as 450,000 people have died from disease and violence, and 2.5 million have been displaced in the three-year-old conflict, which began when rebels from African tribes rose up against the Arab-led central government in a huge area of western Sudan. The government has been accused of supporting militias of Arab nomads known as Janjaweed in retaliation against civilians in Darfur. Government officials deny arming the militias, which the United Nations and others have accused of carrying out the worst atrocities.

Moreno-Ocampo's comments in The Hague coincided with charges by the top U.N. humanitarian official that Sudan is deliberately hindering relief efforts in Darfur and is arming militias.

The emergency relief coordinator, Jan Egeland, told the Security Council that the coming weeks might "be make or break for our lifeline to more than 3 million people. The situation in Darfur is closer to the abyss than I have witnessed since my first visit in 2004."

"Time is against us," Secretary General Kofi Annan said.

Officials from the United Nations, Europe and the United States have expressed concern about what they describe as a recent shift in Janjaweed tactics, from attacking rebels to targeting people in refugee and displacement camps. Egeland, who recently visited Sudan, said the burning of villages and attacks on women and children reminded him of 2004, when the push to drive Darfur civilians from their homes was at its most violent.

A tentative agreement to boost the 7,000-member African Union force with 10,000 more U.N. troops was reached last week in Ethiopia. Sudan, which has opposed deployment of U.N. troops, has asked for a delay until Wednesday.

A senior U.S. official who spoke on condition of anonymity said the Sudanese government fears that U.N. troops "will discover more evidence. What they don't realize is that there is more than enough evidence now."

Andrew Natsios, the U.S. presidential special envoy to Sudan, said the United States suspects that some Sudanese officials are bent on "a military solution," given three major defeats since August in their push against the rebels. He told a forum at the Brookings Institution this week that the Sudanese military has "now mobilized the Arab militias to attack soft targets, which is to say villages and the displaced camps." If this continues, he warned, no one in the United States would have faith in a negotiating process.

"There is no doubt that the Janjaweed and those who are committing atrocities are an extension of the Sudanese military," Natsios said.

DOJ_NMG_0098658

In the interview, Moreno-Ocampo said he was struck that Sudanese witnesses said they were pleased and "honored" to provide testimony. "The hope for justice is one of the few things that the victims of Darfur still have," he said. "It is very important for us to keep this hope alive and show there will be justice for them. We care about that."

Mass Graves Uncovered In Congo (AP)

By Eddy Isango

AP, November 24, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo -- The United Nations said yesterday its investigators had discovered three mass graves at a northeast Congo military camp containing the bodies of 30 persons -- including women and children -- who were thought to have been killed by soldiers.

The dead were found at the camp in eastern Ituri province after witnesses accused troops of killing dozens of people two months ago, U.N. spokesman Kemal Saiki said.

Mr. Saiki said the graves had been opened and the bodies would be exhumed for a team of investigators that includes U.N. human rights officials and Congolese military authorities.

It was not immediately clear what sparked the killings.

Much of Ituri province, home to dozens of powerful local militia groups, has remained lawless and violent despite peace deals to end the Democratic Republic of the Congo's 1998-2002 civil war. Tens of thousands of people have died as a result of the fighting there.

Congo's army has been accused by rights groups and residents of rape, pillage and forcing civilians into labor.

The government is struggling to rebuild the postwar force into a unified military composed of rebels, militias and soldiers who fought each other for years.

The discovery of the graves came at a time of increased tension in Congo over the results of last month's presidential runoff.

Interim President Joseph Kabila was declared the winner, receiving 58 percent of the vote, compared with nearly 42 percent for former rebel leader Jean-Pierre Bemba, who charged that the election was tainted by fraud.

A hearing on vote fraud charges has been delayed after part of Congo's supreme court was burned Tuesday during gunfire and street fighting among Mr. Bemba's supporters.

Fighters loyal to Mr. Bemba were leaving the capital yesterday after the government ordered those troops to return to barracks outside the city, officials and witnesses said.

A convoy of trucks filled with dozens of fighters could be seen rolling out of Kinshasa toward the nearby town of Maluku. Mr. Bemba's fighters first began leaving Thursday.

Mr. Kabila's government issued the order to leave earlier this week.

Mr. Bemba, whose forces have clashed in Kinshasa twice with those of Mr. Kabila in election-related violence, has hundreds of fighters here, many serving as his personal bodyguards.

Foreign Aid, Revised (NYT)

The New York Times, November 25, 2006

Like many of its predecessors, the Bush administration wants to reform foreign aid. These programs sorely need better coordination and predictability — and a clear way to measure whether they are working. Randall Tobias, the new director of foreign assistance, is a good manager and could impose much-needed coherence.

But there are worrisome signs that the administration is also planning deep cuts in antipoverty spending as aid is supposedly reoriented to promote democracy and fight terrorism. A little-noticed statement on the Web site of the Agency for International Development says the goal is to “focus all U.S. foreign assistance on helping to build and sustain democratic and well-governed states.”

Of the nearly $24 billion requested by the State Department for foreign aid this year, a little over $1 billion is devoted to democracy programs, including training legislative staffs, helping reform courts, and working with women’s and business organizations. Privately, officials say that number is likely to rise substantially in next year’s budget request, while the roughly $3.7 billion devoted to antipoverty programs — fighting disease, promoting education, providing microcredit loans — is likely to fall to make up the difference.

While foreign aid spending is up over all in the Bush administration, the increase has come almost entirely in four programs: aid to Iraq and Afghanistan, the 15-country global AIDS initiative and the new Millennium Challenge Corporation, which seeks to help well-governed poor countries.

In a worrisome sign, money for programs to address childhood disease and maternal mortality is down by one-third in this year's budget request. The administration is also cutting antipoverty spending in Latin America and Africa to pay for programs in Islamic countries, considered to be front-line states in the war against terror.

Promoting democracy and fighting terrorism are laudable goals. But such work needs to come on top of — not instead of — financing antipoverty programs, which save hundreds of thousands of lives and earn untold good will for the United States. There is also little indication that America knows how to build democracy. There are too many worrisome reports of programs to encourage privatization turning into boondoggles for contractors, or new anticorruption agencies dissolved or made toothless by those in power.

This is no time to cut off the world's poor, especially for programs with such an uncertain record. If the administration will not restore a sensible balance to foreign aid, the new Congress should.

Intolerance In Europe (WP)

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

EUROPE'S MUSLIM communities increasingly are portrayed -- especially by European media -- as havens for religious intolerance that flourish thanks to the overly tolerant policies of liberal governments. It's true that until relatively recently, some Western European governments shrank from confronting clerics or others who promoted extremist ideology or encouraged terrorism. It's also true that some European artists and politicians have been threatened or even killed for criticizing or mocking Islam. But another important part of the dangerous increase in tensions between Europeans and Muslims is the blatant bigotry of many mainstream political leaders, journalists and other elites against Islam and its followers.

Sometimes the bigots portray their crude attacks on Muslim beliefs and culture as a defense of freedom of speech -- as when a Danish newspaper last year chose to publish gratuitously offensive cartoons about the prophet Muhammad. Sometimes they claim to be promoting better communication, as when British parliamentarian Jack Straw recently asked Muslim women to remove their veils when visiting his office. Luckily for the enemies of cynicism and disingenuousness, there is also the Dutch government -- which no longer bothers to disguise its ugly prejudice.

On Nov. 17, just five days before Wednesday's hard-fought general election in the Netherlands, the incumbent center-right government promised that, if reelected, it would introduce legislation to ban the wearing of burqas and other facial coverings in most public places, including courts, schools, trains and even streets. The ruling Christian Democratic Appeal party finished first in the voting, but the makeup of the next government remains unclear. If enacted, the prohibition would affect no more than a few dozen of the country's 1 million Muslims, who make up some 6 percent of the population. But the point is symbolic: A country famous for tolerating prostitution, drug use, euthanasia and public nudity considers Muslim veiling beyond the pale.

Rita Verdonk, the immigration minister who is rapidly becoming the face of the new Dutch intolerance, claimed that the measure was needed for "reasons of public order, security and protection of citizens." Nothing subtle in that connection: As far as Ms. Verdonk is concerned, burqas and terrorism are synonymous.

Like other Europeans, the Dutch have reason to worry about terrorism; the country has been traumatized by the assassinations of a prominent right-wing politician and a right-wing filmmaker in the past few years. But attacking Muslim culture -- as opposed to those who practice or promote violent acts -- is no way to diminish the threat. It won't be surprising if more Dutch Muslims respond to their government by putting on burqas -- or by answering intolerance with intolerance.

What's At Stake In Mexico City (WP)

By Enrique Krauze

The Washington Post, November 25, 2006

Mexico is a country that is, all at once, pre-modern, modern, anti-modern and postmodern. This situation can have certain advantages, as those who appreciate the cultural mosaic of Mexico know, but there are times when it can be not just difficult but explosive.

Last Monday (the anniversary of the start of the Mexican Revolution of 1910, which lasted 10 years and cost a million lives) modern politics in Mexico was silenced by an alliance between the pre-modern and the anti-modern in a postmodern spectacle that could lead to widespread social revolt and that has impeded the country's democratic progress. Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador -- the charismatic caudillo who has come to believe himself Mexico's messiah incarnate -- gathered his faithful for his anointment as the "legitimate president" of Mexico.

Even though he has lost much support because of his post-election behavior, Lopez Obrador still controls several organizations that have shown themselves capable of paralyzing a part of Mexico City with demonstrations and sit-ins. They consist of state employee unions, peddlers of the informal economic sector, unofficial taxi drivers and hundreds of radical groups.

Where do they get their money? Until now the budgetary sources of the Federal District of Mexico City have sufficed, managed at the discretion of L?pez Obrador's PRD (Democratic Revolutionary Party), just as it was taught by its elder brother, the old ruling PRI. These groups mingle with anti-modern militant movements, which aren't exactly guerrilla forces but do represent a kind of "soft revolution."

It is a mobilization of salaried contingents that not only will harass incoming President Felipe Calder?n and his cabinet but will also try to disrupt everyday life for inhabitants of the country's most sensitive regions. This will be under the guise of a supposed "peaceful resistance" against the "usurpation" that many people still think took place in July's razor-thin election but that L?pez Obrador and his party (who won impressive victories in the legislature) were unable to prove in the courts.

This soft revolution is an enemy of democratic life and may even make dead letters of laws eventually passed in the National Congress. If the PRI (the third force but the counterbalance on the scales of Congress) decides to support Calderon and his National Action Party (PAN) in the reforms that the country needs to create jobs, Lopez Obrador's militants will still be able to boycott them by taking to the streets to block traffic and disrupt business. In its extreme version, it might try to replicate what's been happening over the past six months in Oaxaca, where a revolutionary group of teachers, infiltrated by the residual guerrilla forces that have always existed in the mountains of southeastern Mexico, has been reenacting on a small scale the scripts of Mao Zedong's Cultural Revolution.

There remains the possibility of the restricted, legitimate use of public force, but this is an extremely delicate point in Mexico because of the trauma of the student massacre of 1968. Thus the goal of L?pez Obrador's movement will be to make the country ungovernable and to achieve the eventual resignation of Felipe Calderon. It's unlikely that he'll succeed, but not impossible.

Part of the solution to this delicate situation lies in the hands of President Calder?n. If he quickly shows himself to be the leader that his predecessor, Vicente Fox, neither could nor wanted to be, Calderon will be able to remove the shadow of illegitimacy and establish the foundation for a stable government. He needs to surround himself with a capable cabinet that will carry out measures in the most sensitive areas (security, employment, corruption). Calder?n seems to be an intelligent politician, has parliamentary experience and has his priorities straight. But I'm convinced that much-needed concord depends on more than him.

In this regard, the left bears the greatest responsibility, especially that part of the left with ties to the PRD in the Federal District government and various state governments, the representatives and senators of Congress, and a multitude of journalists, academics and intellectuals. These people need to distance themselves from the caudillo and modernize their ideological platform along the lines of European social democracy.

There are precedents for this kind of transformation. In Spain, when Felipe Gonz?lez came to power in 1978, he renounced Marxist dogma and embraced the market economy, which was a condition for the country's eventual entry into the European Community and the impressive development that it has since achieved. In Chile, socialism evolved toward modern ideas and has presided over a period of impressive growth and social well-being. These are two very successful reforms, both of them counter to the anachronistic "21st-century socialism" of Hugo Ch?vez and Fidel Castro. But in both Spain and Chile, the process of maturing took place after civil wars and dictatorships. It would be a tragedy if Mexico had to go through that hell for its left to modernize. Unfortunately, at this moment at least, the possibility of such a transformation seems remote. I once said that the last Marxist in history would die at a Latin American university. I still believe it.

The postmodern spectacle that took place in the historical center of Mexico City is bizarre and ominous but also very serious. This is not a British "shadow cabinet," in which individual opposition politicians scrutinize various parts of the party in power. L?pez Obrador has said power belongs to him alone, in the name of the people. He is serious about his plans: to force the resignation of Calder?n and take power by proclamation, that ritual out of the Mexican past. The perfect date would be 2010, the 100th anniversary of the revolution.

If this nightmarish scenario actually happened, the implications for the United States could be ominous too: a stream of refugees that would dwarf the current illegal migration, pushed by the collapsing Mexican economy, capital flight and spreading Oaxaca-style violence.

The United States would do well to remember that there is a country, not on the Persian Gulf but on the Gulf of Mexico, that has taken a giant step toward political maturity by adopting a democratic system in the space of just one generation -- and has done so practically without historical experience. And it would do well to find tangible, direct ways to support Mexico's economy, just as the European Union supported Spain. Build bridges, not walls. Winning Mexico for democracy is the same thing as winning democracy for all of Latin America -- no small triumph in today's world and the world to come.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice IG To Examine Use Of NSA Surveillance. The Washington Post (11/28, A10, Eggen) reports, "The Justice Department's inspector general yesterday announced an investigation into the department's connections to the government's controversial warrantless surveillance program, but officials said the probe will not examine whether the National Security Agency is violating the Constitution or federal statutes." The Post continues, "In a letter to House lawmakers, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said his office decided to open the probe after conducting 'initial inquiries' into the program. Under the initiative, the NSA monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the United States and others overseas without court oversight if one of the targets is suspected of ties to terrorism. … The 'program review' will examine how the Justice Department has used information obtained from the NSA program, as well as whether Justice lawyers complied with the 'legal requirements' that govern it, according to Fine's letter. Officials said the review will not examine whether the program itself is legal."

The Washington Times (11/28, Seper) reports, "The Justice Department has described the surveillance program, initiated after the September 11 attacks, as 'an essential tool for the intelligence community' in its war on terror, adding that it 'ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack.' .. 'In the ongoing conflict with al Qaeda and its allies, the president has the primary duty under the Constitution to protect the American people,' the department said in a briefing paper. 'The Constitution gives the president the full authority necessary to carry out that solemn duty, and we believe the program is lawful and protects civil liberties.' … Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has called the program's scope 'very narrow,' saying it focused only on communications with al Qaeda. He said it had been 'very effective' in protecting the United States and that reviews of it by lawyers at the Justice Department and the NSA found it to be legal." The Times adds, "The White House has agreed to give investigators from the inspector general's office special clearances to probe the program, Mr. Fine noted in his letter, which was sent to Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, and the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan."

The AP (11/28, Jordan) reports, "Fine's investigation is not expected to address whether the controversial program is an unconstitutional expansion of presidential power, as its critics and a federal judge in Detroit have charged. … Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the agency welcomes the review: 'We expect that this review will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern the operation of the program.'"

McClatchy Newspapers (11/28, Taylor) reports, "Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., said a broader investigation was needed because Congress had been kept largely in the dark about the workings of the program and couldn't determine whether the administration's use of the program was legal. In January, Fine declined a request from Lofgren and other Democrats for a more sweeping probe, saying his office lacked jurisdiction. … 'Congress needs to craft legislation so that terrorists can be the subject of surveillance while the Constitution of the United States is honored,' Lofgren said. 'To do that, a full investigation into the program as a whole, not just the (Justice Department's) involvement, will be necessary.' … After turning down the request, Fine had referred it to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which reviews allegations of wrongdoing by Justice Department employees. But the Office of Professional Responsibility was denied security clearances to conduct the investigation. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales later revealed that President Bush had personally refused to grant the security clearances."

The New York Times (11/28, Lichtblau) reports, "Democrats said they saw the investigation as a welcome step that could answer questions about the operations and legal underpinnings of the program, which allows the National Security Agency to monitor, without obtaining court warrants, the international communications of Americans and others inside this country with suspected terrorist ties. … 'This is a long overdue investigation of a highly controversial program,' said Representative John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat who will take over as chairman of the House Judiciary Committee." The Times adds, "The review will have a somewhat different scope than the investigation sought and rejected last year. The review, Mr. Fine said in his letter, will examine the controls in place at the Justice Department for the eavesdropping, the way information developed from it was used, and the department's 'compliance with legal requirements governing the program.' … Officials said the investigation could examine the legal authority given to the Justice Department under a secret executive order first signed by Mr. Bush in October 2001, as well as the laws and procedures governing intelligence wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which was approved by Congress in 1978 after the Watergate scandal and required a special court warrant for wiretaps on Americans. The review could also look at how intelligence generated by the eavesdropping was used to seek traditional court warrants and to pursue criminal cases, the officials said."

ABC News (11/28, Ryan) reports, "Members of Congress have been asking for the internal Justice Department review since the program was first disclosed by the New York Times last year. … 'After trying for nearly a year to get DOJ to conduct an investigation of the NSA's warrantless spy program, I am very pleased to learn that the agency's inspector general is finally opening an investigation,' Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., said in response to Fine's letter."

Civil Liberties Board Impressed By Privacy Safeguards In NSA Program. The AP (11/28, Solomon) reports, "After a delay of more than a year, a government board appointed to guard Americans' privacy and civil liberties during the war on terror has been told the inner workings of the government's electronic eavesdropping program." The briefing for the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board "had been delayed because President Bush was concerned -- after several press leaks -- about widening the circle of people who knew the exact details of the secret eavesdropping program." Board members "told The Associated Press they were impressed by the safeguards the government has built into the NSA's monitoring of phone calls and computer transmissions and wished the administration could tell the public more about them to ease distrust. 'If the American public, especially civil libertarians like myself, could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy while still protecting us from attacks, we'd be more reassured,' said Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House lawyer who is the board's lone liberal Democrat." Davis "said he believes the administration could tell the public more about the program's protections without compromising national security." Alan Raul, "a former Reagan White House lawyer and the board's vice chairman, said he too was impressed."

High Court Allows US Review Of Records In NYTimes Leak Case. The New York Times (11/28, Liptak) reports, "The United States Supreme Court refused yesterday to stop a federal prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two reporters for The New York Times. The records, the newspaper said, include information about many of the reporters' confidential sources." The Times continues, "In a one-sentence order offering no reasoning and noting no dissenting votes, the Supreme Court rejected a request from The Times to stay a lower court's decision while the paper tried to persuade the justices to review the case. … Yesterday's order effectively allows the United States attorney in Chicago, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, to begin reviewing the records, which he has already obtained from the reporters' phone companies, as early as this week." The Times adds, "The Justice Department told the Supreme Court on Friday that Mr. Fitzgerald was under enormous time pressure. 'The statute of limitations,' the government said, 'will imminently expire on Dec. 3 and 13, 2006, on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating.' … The grand jury, in Chicago, is looking into who told the reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government was planning to take in December 2001 against two Islamic charities in Illinois and Texas. The disclosures to the reporters, the government lawyers wrote on Friday, may have amounted to obstruction of justice."

The AP (11/28, Yost) reports, "The case marks the second refusal by the court in as many years to sort out a clash between the federal government and the Times over press freedom. … In June 2005, the Supreme Court refused to take up the Times' request to hear an appeal in the CIA leak investigation involving the outing of Valerie Plame. In that case, Miller, who retired from the Times a year ago, spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a federal grand jury. Fitzgerald, in a role as a special counsel, conducted that leak investigation as well." The AP adds, "Monday's rejection 'is just further indication that we're getting absolutely nowhere with the court when it comes to protecting confidential sources,' said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. … The case points out a growing problem of reporters trying to protect their sources in the information age, press advocates say. Rather than threatening reporters with jail if they don't testify, the government can go through the back door to hunt down confidential sources by amassing phone records and credit card receipts."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A4, 2.04M) reports the order deals with the "records of two Times reporters in a leak investigation of a terrorism-funding probe. The one-sentence order came in a First Amendment battle that involves articles written in 2001 by New York Times Co. reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The articles revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation." The dispute "stems from Mr. Shenon and Ms. Miller calling two charities for comment after learning of the planned freeze on their assets from confidential sources." The Justice Department "says the reporters' calls tipped off the charities to coming government raids." The Washington Post (11/28, A4, Barnes, 690K) also reports the story.

Gingrich Says Terror Threat May Necessitate Curtailing Freedom Of Speech. The New Hampshire Union Leader (11/28, Yates) reports that former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, in Manchester, NH, on Monday, "said the country will be forced to reexamine freedom of speech to meet the threat of terrorism." Gingrich said that "a 'different set of rules' may be needed to reduce terrorists' ability to use the Internet and free speech to recruit and get out their message. 'We need to get ahead of the curve before we actually lose a city, which I think could happen in the next decade,' said Gingrich," who "spoke to about 400 state and local power brokers last night at the annual Nackey S. Loeb First Amendment award dinner, which fetes people and organizations that stand up for freedom of speech." In his speech, Gingrich also "sharply criticized campaign finance laws he charged were reducing free speech and doing little to fight attack advertising," and "said court rulings over separation of church and state have hurt citizens' ability to express themselves and their faith."

PATRIOT ACT:

Muslim Charity Sues Bank, Argues Patriot Act Unconstitutional. The AP (11/28) reports, "A Muslim charity raided by federal agents in September has sued a bank, saying it violated the charity's civil rights by planning to close its accounts." The AP continues, "The charity, Life for Relief and Development, based in Southfield, Michigan, also seeks an injunction to stop Comerica Bank from giving other banks any information it might have about the organization. The charity is challenging the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act, which allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity." The AP adds, "The Patriot Act, approved by Congress shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, was designed to give law enforcement agencies more tools to combat terrorism, but some provisions were challenged on constitutional grounds for restricting civil liberties. … Comerica had told the charity that it planned to terminate the accounts Nov. 15, but granted an extension, according to the lawsuit." The AP notes, "FBI agents assigned to a terrorism task force searched Life's offices Sept. 18, seizing computer servers, donor records and other financial documents. They also searched the homes of the charity's chief executive, an ex-employee and two board members. .. The FBI would not say what agents were looking for, but charity officials have said it might be related to relief work the group did in Iraq. The international humanitarian organization also is active in Afghanistan. .. No charges have been filed. The charity has sought to reassure the Detroit area's Muslim community that it is legal to donate money to the organization, which was founded in 1992 by Iraqi immigrants." The Detroit Free Press (11/27, Warikoo, 373K) reported, "The filing occurred days after a senior vice president with Comerica, James Garavaglia, met with Arab-American leaders to explain how the Patriot Act requires banks to work with the government. Charity officials worry that Life's reputation would be harmed if Comerica officials spread allegations about the group to other banks."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Religious Leaders Stage "Pray-In" Over Muslim Clerics' Removal From Flight. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, A10, Miller) reports, "Imams, ministers and a rabbi staged a pray-in yesterday at Reagan National Airport and demanded an apology from US Airways for barring six Muslim clerics from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight last week. The religious leaders called for an end to racial profiling, saying it was unacceptable in the United States." A US Airways spokeswoman said "prayer was never the issue," and that suspicion was sparked over what one passenger "thought were anti-US statements." The spokeswoman "also said the men got up and moved around the airplane, so the flight crew consulted with the airline about whether they might pose a security risk. Local law enforcement and the FBI thought they did, she said." USA Today (11/28, 11A, 2.27M) also runs a brief report on the "pray-in."

Under the headline "How The Imams Terrorized An Airliner," the Washington Times (11/28, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Muslim religious leaders removed from a Minneapolis flight last week exhibited behavior associated with a security probe by terrorists and were not merely engaged in prayers, according to witnesses, police reports and aviation security officials." The article offers no new information about last week's incident, but quotes "a federal air marshal who asked to remain anonymous" as saying that the clerics moving to seats throughout the plane would have alarmed him. "They now control all of the entry and exit routes to the plane," said the air marshal. Robert MacLean, a former air marshal, said the clerics "should have been denied boarding and been investigated. It looks like they are trying to create public sympathy or maybe setting someone up for a lawsuit." A "pilot with another airline who talked to The Washington Times on condition of anonymity, said he would have made the same call as the US Airways pilot."

Threat Note, Containers Prompt Temporary Closure Of Lincoln Memorial. The Washington Post (11/28, B3, Sheridan, Dvorak, 690K) reports the Lincoln Memorial was closed for more than two hours yesterday after authorities received "reports of a suspicious liquid and a threatening note on the grounds, officials said. Tests showed no evidence of a harmful substance. DC firefighters received a call at 12:40 p.m. reporting that a bottle believed to contain a liquid was found in the women's restroom in the base of the memorial, fire and federal homeland security officials said." Before a hazardous materials unit arrived, a letter asking, "Do you know what anthrax is?" and "Do you know what a bomb is?" was found on the statue, according to officials. "In addition, a thermos that police found on the memorial steps was initially considered suspicious, officials said."

In an article appearing on at least 40 news websites throughout the nation, the AP (11/27, Takruri) reported, "An official from the Department of Homeland Security, who asked to not be identified because his agency was not in charge of the incident, quoted the questions about anthrax and bombs."

Union Hopes Democratic Congress Will Allow TSA Screeners To Bargain Collectively. In his "Federal Diary" column appearing in the Washington Post (11/28, D4, 690K), Stephen Barr writes, "Proposals to allow TSA screeners to unionize have not gained traction in Congress, but [American Federation of Government Employees] officials hope that will change when Democrats take control of the House and Senate next year. Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), who lost a vote on an amendment that would have let screeners engage in bargaining, plans to push the issue, her spokeswoman said."

Intelligence Agencies Investing Millions In College Programs. USA Today (11/28, 8A, Willing, 2.27M) reports, "The US intelligence community pours millions into higher education, paying for hundreds of scholarships, intelligence-related courses and fellowships at nearly a dozen universities, public documents and interviews with officials show. … The sponsoring agencies, including the CIA, say the programs help ensure they get enough recruits skilled to wage the war on terrorism." However, they have also "revived a decades-old debate about the proper relationship between intelligence agencies and academia," prompting "comparisons to the 1950s, when the FBI sometimes encouraged students to report on professors' political leanings, and the 1960s, when the CIA paid for the National Student Association and tapped its members for intelligence work."

In New Book, CIA Agent Describes Training Of First Post-9/11 Class. In a Washington Times (11/28, 88K) column, Gary Anderson writes, "Among the agencies of the federal government, three are legendary: the Marine Corps, the FBI and the CIA. … If they have anything in common it is that their field officers all go through a similar basic training and education course." In his new book, "Class 11," agent T.J. Waters describes his CIA training, and Anderson notes that until he read the book, "I was not aware of how closely the basic schooling of CIA officers is to that of the Marines and the FBI. Class 11 was the first post-September 11 class at the CIA. Consequently, it was larger and much more diverse than its predecessors." Anderson adds that Waters "does a creditable job," and "the reader comes away with a deeper understanding of one of our most misunderstood organizations."

WAR NEWS:

White House Insists Iraq Conflict Not A "Civil War." On the day NBC Nightly News (11/27, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 9.87M) announced it would start referring to the Iraq conflict a "civil war," the White House continued to dispute the use of that term. However, comments by the President on the issue appeared to be at odds with the case made by his National Security Adviser to describe the White House's stance . The AP (11/28, Riechmann) reports on a Bush news conference this morning in Estonia. The President said "the sectarian violence rocking Iraq is not civil war but part of an al-Qaida plot to use violence to goad Iraqi factions into repeatedly attacking each other." Bush also "said the latest cycle of violence does not represent a new era in Iraq. The country is reeling from the deadliest week of sectarian fighting since the war began in March 2003. 'We've been in this phase for a while,' Bush said." The AP adds, "This comment appeared at odds with the assessment of the president's national security adviser, who told reporters on the way to Estonia that Iraq is in a 'new phase' that requires changes."

National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley's comments had gotten plenty of play in the media. NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 2, 2:30, Gregory) reported Hadley said whether Iraq is in "a civil war or not, there are certainly a great deal of a wariness in the United States and beyond that the sectarian violence is out of control, that there is not enough progress quickly enough for the President's satisfaction." Hadley "called it a new phase over the past few days where the violence has sparked and reached new heights in Iraq -- a new phase of that violence the President wants to address."

The CBS Evening News (11/27, lead story, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) said Hadley offered his "most ominous assessment yet of the violence in Iraq." CBS (Axelrod) went on to comment on what it deemed a "dramatic shift in rhetoric by…Hadley." The advisor, said CBS, had "to acknowledge reality." CBS also reported the White House "still doesn't want to use the words 'civil war' because that's the next category of chaos. But this is new." CBS quoted Hadley saying, "We are clearly in a new phase, characterized by this increasing sectarian violence. That requires us obviously to adapt to that new phase and these two leaders need to be talking about how to do that."

ABC World News (11/27, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "You can call it anarchy, you can call it chaos you can call it a civil war, whatever you call it, the events of recent days demonstrate that the situation in Iraq is at a critical juncture." ABC (Raddatz) added "the White House acknowledged that Iraq is quote, 'In a new phase and new solutions are urgently needed.' With Iraq continuing its descent into civil war after a wave of deadly sectarian violence, a White House official said things are not 'proceeding well and are not going fast enough in Iraq' and the US must find ways to, quote, 'adapt.'" The AP (11/28, Raum) quotes Hadley as saying, "Obviously everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough."

The Washington Post (11/27, Wright, Ricks, 690K) also notes Hadley's comments, and goes on to quote a statement by National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe, "While the situation on the ground is very serious, neither Prime Minister [Nouri al-] Maliki nor we believe that Iraq is in a civil war. The Iraqi government is making slow but sure progress on important issues that will help stop the violence and bring the country together." The Post adds, "At least one Iraqi leader says otherwise. 'It's worse than a civil war. In a civil war, you at least know which factions are fighting each other,' lamented a senior member of Iraq's government in an interview a few hours after Johndroe's comments. 'We don't even know that anymore. It's so bloody confused.'"

A number of media reports, however, see political calculations behind the White House's rejection of the term "civil war." Typical of the coverage was the Baltimore Sun (11/28, Davis, 257K), which reports President Bush "has said he would not allow US troops to be caught 'in the crossfire between rival factions.' Conceding that a civil war has broken out in Iraq could undermine that promise and increase pressure for a quick withdrawal of American forces." That is why, adds the Sun, "the White House continued to resist the notion that Iraq had descended into civil war." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (11/27, lead story, 2:15, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "there's a huge difference when talking about a US troop involvement between doing something noble like bringing democracy to a region and being caught in another country's civil war." And on CNN's The Situation Room (11/27), correspondent Michael Ware reported from Baghdad, "If this is not a civil war, then I don't want to see one when it comes."

The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Gold, 850K) says NBC's decision "makes it the first television network to officially adopt the term 'civil war,' a description the Bush administration has resisted." The LATimes "was the first major news organization to formally adopt the description when it began to refer to the hostilities as a civil war in October, without public fanfare. No other major media outlet has made the phrase a matter of policy, although it has cropped up in various news reports." The White House, adds the Times, "has exerted pressure on the media not to use the term, journalists said, which led to newsroom caution over the issue. … Political analysts said NBC's public embrace of the term further complicated the administration's efforts to maintain that the violence had not spun out of control." USA Today (11/28, 2.27M) reports the "politically charged use of the term 'civil war'" put "the network at odds with the White House…and prompted renewed discussion among news outlets." CBS, ABC, CNN and Fox News "said that as sectarian violence has risen, their reporters have called the conflict a civil war, and will continue, though they plan no formal change in policy. On CNN Monday, correspondent Michael Ware said, 'If this isn't a civil war, I don't know what is.'" USA Today adds, "Recent dispatches in outlets such as the Los Angeles Times and New York Times also have referred to a civil war. USA TODAY calls the conflict 'the war in Iraq' and refers to 'sectarian violence' or 'religious fighting.'"

Annan Says Iraq On Brink Of Civil War. The AP (11/28, Ben Feller) reports, "UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said Monday that Iraq is close to civil war, as the Bush administration stepped up diplomatic efforts to stabilize the war-torn country." Annan "talked to reporters in New York as members of the Iraq Study Group were to discuss recommendations for changes in US war strategy. … Asked by reporters at the UN if Iraq is in a civil war now, Annan replied, 'I think given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there. In fact we are almost there.'" The Washington Post (11/27, Wright, Ricks, 690K) calls Annan's comments "a sign of the growing global concern about Iraq's fate."

Carter Says Conflict Not A Civil War. Former President Jimmy Carter on CNN's Larry King Live (11/27) said, "I don't think there's anything wrong with calling it a civil war. It doesn't change the character of it just because NBC has said that. I don't think it's a misnomer for it." Pressed whether he would characterize it as a civil war, Carter replied, "No, I don't think so. I think this brings it up to a level that doesn't quite reach the level of most other civil wars. I just -- we helped at the Carter Center to monitor a election in the Republic of Congo which had a civil war where 4 million people died. We tried to bring peace to Sudan and two million people died in that civil war. Some civil wars are much more costly in historical terms than it has been in Iraq. But it's serious and the prospect for immediate secession of violence is completely absent."

More Commentary. Iraq Deputy Ambassador to the UN Feisal Istrabadi on CNN's The Situation Room (11/27) was asked whether Iraq was in the middle of a civil war. Istrabadi downplayed that terminology saying, "There are sound technical reasons for why this is not a civil war, including most clearly, because the population of Iraq, regardless of ethnicity or sectarian attachment or sect, overwhelmingly rejects this violence. What you have are death squads operating on each side, operated by extremists, targeting the civilians of the other side. In that sense, you don't have, for instance, the militias which is a real problem right now, you don't have the militias fighting each other. Rather, you have them operating as death squads, murdering the other side civilians."

Sen. Jack Reid on CNN's The Situation Room (11/27) reported, "I have been saying for years Iraq has been a low-level civil war. I think it is a civil war. You have different groups vying for political power which is one thing -- very good definition of a civil war."

Bush Reaches Out To Arab Leaders Ahead Of Meeting With Maliki. The New York Times (11/28, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that as President Bush "and his top diplomats try to halt the downward spiral in Iraq and Lebanon, they seem intent on their strategy of talking only to Arab friends, despite increasing calls inside and outside the administration for them to reach out to Iran and Syria as well." Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "are traveling to Jordan this week for talks that are to include Iraq's prime minister and a number of Sunni Arab leaders but exclude the Iranians and Syrians, despite the influence they wield in Iraq and Lebanon." When Bush and Rice "arrive in Amman on Wednesday, they will try to enlist help from Sunni Arab leaders to try to rein in the violence in Iraq by putting pressure on Sunni insurgents. That was part of Vice President Dick Cheney's message to King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia during a brief visit on Saturday, administration officials said, and Mr. Bush will repeat that entreaty with King Abdullah II of Jordan, as will Ms. Rice when she meets for talks with Persian Gulf foreign ministers at the Dead Sea on Thursday and Friday." The Times adds, "Specifically, the United States wants Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt to work to drive a wedge between the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and the anti-American Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr." The Financial Times (11/28, Dinmore, Khalaf) notes "officials close to…al-Sadr are reported to have said the radical Shia cleric is threatening to pull out of the national unity government if Mr Maliki does not put a stop to attacks on the Shia. They have also warned him against meeting Mr Bush in Amman, Jordan, tomorrow and Thursday."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/27, Malveaux) reported "Arab allies, Iraq's neighbors here, they want some sort of international regional conference, a way to look at the big picture here to get everyone involved, those players, as well as the United States. So that is why you're seeing this diplomatic offensive taking place" with Vice President Cheney "reaching out to Saudi Arabia and Jordan, as well as some of those other moderate allies. If the United States can't make some sort of impact with Iraq, then they want Iraq's neighbors to try to help out." CNN's Wolf Blitzer added, "By almost all accounts, it will be linked to a renewed US effort to try to jump-start Israeli/Palestinian peace process as well."

Maliki Expected To Ask Bush For US Withdrawal Timetable. The AP (11/28, Abdul-Zahra, Mroue) reports Iraqi officials said discussions between Bush and Maliki "will focus on giving Iraqis more control so U.S. forces can withdraw. … Iraqi officials believe the summit will deal with giving Iraqi forces more control over security. The Iraqis expect President Bush to agree to such an arrangement, and they say al-Maliki will then ask for the Americans to start discussing a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, according to one of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity." However, national security adviser Stephen Hadley "said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. 'We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan,' Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One." An Iraqi official, "who spoke anonymously…said American officials had indicated in preparatory talks in Baghdad that Bush was open to increasing the pace of the security hand-over."

Talibani Asks Iran For Help Ending Violence. The Washington Post (11/28, A15, Trejos, 690K) reports, "In the latest sign of a budding diplomatic relationship, Iraq's President Jalal Talabani arrived in Iran on Monday to seek his neighbor's help in ending his country's sectarian conflict, as Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of troops by the end of next year." Talabani's visit to Iran "was delayed by a three-day curfew imposed after a series of car bombs exploded in the Shiite Muslim stronghold of Sadr City on Thursday, setting off a wave of reprisal killings. There were reports of sporadic violence Monday as the curfew was lifted."

The New York Times (11/28, Fathi, Semple, 1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "pledged Monday in a meeting with the Iraqi president that Iran would do all it could to stop the growing violence in Iraq." In a televised press conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, Ahmadinejad said, "The Iranian government and people will stand by their brothers in Iraq and will do anything to help bring peace into Iraq."

Hezbollah Reportedly Trained Mahdi Army Fighters. The New York Times (11/28, Gordon, Filkins, 1.16M) reports, "A senior American intelligence official said Monday that the Iranian-backed group Hezbollah had been training members of the Mahdi Army, the Iraqi Shiite militia led by Moktada al-Sadr. The official said that 1,000 to 2,000 fighters from the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon. A small number of Hezbollah operatives have also visited Iraq to help with training, the official said. Iran has facilitated the link between Hezbollah and the Shiite militias in Iraq, the official said. Syrian officials have also cooperated, though there is debate about whether it has the blessing of the senior leaders in Syria. The intelligence official spoke on condition of anonymity under rules set by his agency, and discussed Iran's role in response to questions from a reporter." The Times adds, "The claim about Hezbollah's role in training Shiite militias could strengthen the hand of those in the Bush administration who oppose a major new diplomatic involvement with Iran." However, "Some Middle East experts were skeptical about the assessment of Hezbollah's training role. 'That sound to me a little bit strained,' said Flynt Leverett, a senior fellow at the New America Foundation and a Middle East expert formerly on the National Security Council staff."

Sadr Militia Said To Have Grown Eightfold. The Washington Post (11/27, Wright, Ricks, 690K) reports that "in a reflection of the growing new dimension of civil strife, a senior US intelligence official said yesterday that the militia of radical Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr has grown eightfold over the past year and now fields 40,000 to 60,000 men. That makes it more effective than the Iraqi government's army, the official indicated." Sadr "is so powerful that if provincial elections were held now, he would sweep most of the south and also take Baghdad, said the intelligence officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his position."

The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Moore, 850K) reports "besieged Iraqis, many with no previous affiliation with established militias, are taking up arms, barricading their communities and joining new Shiite Muslim militia cells or increasingly militant Sunni Arab neighborhood-watch groups."

Baghdad Curfew Didn't Stop Killings. ABC World News (11/27, story 2, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that in Baghdad, "a three-day curfew that began after last week's devastating attacks has now been lifted." ABC (Brown) added, "Life returns to the streets of Baghdad, today. For many, that meant taking care of the dead. Because, in spite of a 3-day curfew, at least 30 people were killed, Sunni and Shiite, in almost equal number." In Sadr City, "a Shiite stronghold, a memorial service was held for 10 people killed on Sunday, in what police said was a shootout between gunmen and US soldiers. The mourners chanted 'No to America.' In the wake of the massacre last Thursday that killed 230, people are now living in a new climate of fear, of another, more vicious wave of revenge killings." NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 3, 1:45, Aspell, 9.87M) said "with the curfew over people can move around the city. So can militias and bombers. Baghdad is bracing for more violence."

Marine Document Says US Can't Defeat Anbar Insurgents. In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/28, Linzer, Ricks, 690K) reports from Anbar province, "The US military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter al-Qaeda's rising popularity there, according to newly disclosed details from a classified Marine Corps intelligence report that set off debate in recent months about the military's mission in Anbar province." The Marines "recently filed an updated version of that assessment that stood by its conclusions and stated that, as of mid-November, the problems in troubled Anbar province have not improved, a senior US intelligence official said yesterday. 'The fundamental questions of lack of control, growth of the insurgency and criminality' remain the same, the official said." The Post adds, "The Marines' August memo, a copy of which was shared with The Washington Post, is far bleaker than some officials suggested when they described it in late summer. The report describes Iraq's Sunni minority as 'embroiled in a daily fight for survival,' fearful of 'pogroms' by the Shiite majority and increasingly dependent on al-Qaeda in Iraq as its only hope against growing Iranian dominance across the capital."

Iraq Study Group Discusses Draft Report. The Washington Times (11/28, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The Iraq Study Group met yesterday at an undisclosed location to discuss its first draft report that calls for increased diplomatic engagement in the region and new military moves to rescue Iraq from a descent into civil war." The panel's co-chairmen, James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton "finished work on the draft during the weekend. It contains an assessment of where violence-racked Iraq stands more than three years after the U.S. ousted Saddam Hussein. It also includes a list of recommendations on diplomatic and military fronts. A final report to President Bush is expected next month." Baker, adds the Times, "is said to be pushing a recommendation for the Bush administration to engage in direct talks with Syria and Iran, two U.S.-designated state sponsors of terrorism who are supporting various insurgencies and terrorist attacks in Iraq."

ABC World News (11/27, lead story, 3:00, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "officials tell ABC News that one of the central recommendations from the Iraq Study Group is that the US engage in talks with both Iran and Syria, to help stem the flow of foreign fighters, and stop the more lethal bombs from entering Iraq. … An Administration official says that it is unlikely that President Bush would accept that recommendation. But there are two other recommendations that the President would look at favorably. One -- to double or triple the number of US soldiers embedded with Iraqi security forces. Two -- give the Iraqi government a strong message that the US military support will not go on indefinitely. As for timetables for withdrawal, the President has been adamant that will not happen. An official tells ABC News that the ISG is quote, 'Massively divided on the question of timetables or whether or not to suggest additional troops for a short period of time.'"

The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 2, 2:30, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "The most dramatic option on the table is an increase of up to 20,000 American troops in an effort to keep a lid on the violence. The Army is now studying how it could accomplish the buildup and how long it could sustain it. Just two weeks ago, the commander of US forces in the Middle East told Congress he didn't want more American troops but in a subsequent interview with '60 Minutes,' General John Abizaid put the option back on the table." But "there is no agreement on whether to set a timetable for American withdrawal which some members of the Iraqi Study Group see as the only way to put pressure on Prime Minister Maliki to make the political concessions needed to head off civil war." CBS added "one source says the panel hasn't hit any deal breakers so they could deliver their report as early as next week."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, Chaddock, 59K) says the ISG "illustrates those rare moments when a crisis reaches such a point that official Washington temporarily loosens hold of the reins. It's in those moments that experienced outside voices -- think the 9/11 and Warren commissions -- can make themselves heard. The Iraq panel, in particular, may prove particularly influential because of the escalating chaos in Iraq." But not all is praise for the ISG in today's press. Also in the Christian Science Monitor (11/28, 59K), Andrew J. Bacevich, professor of history and international relations at Boston University, writes, "Even as Washington waits with bated breath for the Iraq Study Group (ISG) to release its findings, the rest of us should see this gambit for what it is: an attempt to deflect attention from the larger questions raised by America's failure in Iraq and to shore up the authority of the foreign policy establishment that steered the United States into this quagmire. This ostentatiously bipartisan panel of Wise Men (and one woman) can't really be searching for truth. It is engaged in damage control." The ISG "will provide cover for the Bush administration to shift course in Iraq. It will pave the way for the Democratic Congress to endorse that shift in a great show of bipartisanship. But it will hold no one responsible. Above all, it will leave intact the assumptions, arrangements, and institutions that gave rise to Iraq in the first place."

Carter Says Bipartisan Consensus Key Goal Of Iraq Study Group. Former President Jimmy Carter on CNN's Larry King Live (11/27) said, "When I talked to Jim Baker last week he made it plain to me that his major goal, Larry, is to have unanimity within the committee. He think the mix of Democrats and Republicans, all very prominent, all very qualified, should be a unanimous recommendation to have maximum impact."

UK Plans To Withdraw 7000 Troops From Iraq By End Of 2007. The AP (11/28, Quinn) reports Britain "said Monday it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year." British Defense Secretary Des Browne "was the second senior official in recent days to talk of reducing the number of British troops in Iraq. … Last week, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Britain may be able to hand over security responsibility in the southern port city of Basra by the spring of 2007. Britain also hopes to hand security control over to the Iraqis in the province of Maysan on the Iranian border in January."

Poland, Italy Announce Plans To Pull Remaining Troops. The AP (11/28, Quinn) reports Poland and Italy "announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops" in Iraq. Polish President Lech Kaczynski "said his country…would pull its remaining 900 soldiers out of Iraq by the end of 2007." Italian Premier Romano Prodi "said the last of Italy's soldiers in Iraq - some 60-70 troops - will return home this week."

Democratic Congressman-Elect Maintains There Were Some Saddam-Al Qaeda Links. The New York Times (11/28, Risen, 1.16M) reports, "In early 2002," rep.-elect Chris Carney, "a Naval Reserve officer, was assigned to work in a tiny intelligence unit created by Douglas J. Feith, then the under secretary of defense for policy, to search for links between terrorist groups and their possible state-sponsors, most notably Iraq. After the 2003 invasion, the Feith unit, the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group, was caught up in the debate over the Bush administration's handling of prewar intelligence, and the office was investigated by a Senate committee and an independent presidential commission." Carney "says he still believes there were links between Iraq and Al Qaeda, although he is careful not to overstate them. 'On a scale of 0 to 10, where 0 was no connection and 10 was operational control, I would say it's about a 2½,' he said in an interview. 'It was a relationship of keeping your friends close and your enemies closer,' he added. 'Saddam was a savvy guy, and I think he wanted to make sure that if Al Qaeda someday became a force, that he wanted to keep his options open. I thought that there was a relationship. Whether it was strong enough to go to war, that's the president's decision.'"

Kristoff Says Pentagon Erred In Disputing Media Reports From Iraq. The New York Times' Nicholas Kristoff (11/28) writes, "For several years, the White House and its Dobermans helpfully pointed out the real enemy in Iraq: those lazy, wimpish foreign correspondents who were so foolish and unpatriotic that they reported that we faced grave difficulties in Iraq. … As we try to extricate ourselves from Iraq, a basic lesson for the administration is that it should deal with bad news in ways more creative than clobbering the messenger. From the beginning of the war, the Pentagon has had an incredibly sophisticated news operation (now including its own news channel, carried on some cable networks), but it has often seemed more concerned with disseminating propaganda than with gathering facts."

Waning Support For War In Iraq Blamed On Unrealistic Expectations. In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) Dominic Johnson, a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson School at Princeton, and Dominic Tierney, an assistant professor of political science at Swarthmore, write, "Tet and Somalia suggest we should be very careful before concluding that Iraq is a defeat. There is real evidence of failure, especially the escalating sectarian violence. But our perceptions are nevertheless easily manipulated. Iraq looks like a defeat in part because the Bush administration fell into the same trap as President Johnson: raising expectations of imminent victory by declaring 'mission accomplished' before the real work had even begun. And as with Somalia, fighting shadowy insurgents in Iraq while propping up a weak government engenders negative memories of Vietnam. … With the stakes so high, Americans must be certain that their perception of failure in Iraq is not a mirage."

Australian Government Cleared In Oil-For-Food Probe. The Washington Times/AP (11/28, McGuirk) reports, "An inquiry cleared Australia's government of wrongdoing in an Iraqi oil-for-food scandal Monday, but recommended top officials of the monopoly wheat exporter face charges for paying more than $200 million to the Saddam Hussein regime." Prime Minister John Howard "promised the inquiry's key recommendations would be acted upon immediately and said the findings vindicated him and other top government officials who denied having prior knowledge of the kickbacks."

The New York Times (11/28, Bonner, 1.16M) notes the "commission investigating corruption in the United Nations oil-for-food program released a long-awaited report on Monday stating unequivocally that a major Australian wheat company paid more than $224 million in kickbacks and bribes to Saddam Hussein's government. The commission also found that the company, ABW Ltd., had 'deliberately and dishonestly' devised a scheme for the payments -- from 1999 until the overthrow of Mr. Hussein in 2003 -- that would deceive the United Nations. … The Australian commission's report was the most thorough -- and damning -- investigation of corruption in the United Nation's oil-for-food program. It is certain to have repercussions for politicians in Canberra as well as in Washington, where incoming Democratic lawmakers have pledged to hold their own hearings."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A9, Adam, Brindal, 2.04M) reports "the findings could increase pressure on the government to dismantle the country's powerful wheat-export monopoly. US and European growers have long tried to persuade Australia to end its wheat-marketing system, whereby growers sell their export wheat through a 'single desk' managed by listed AWB Ltd., which then handles sales to foreign buyers."

WPost Protests Termination Of Special IG For Iraqi Reconstruction. The Washington Post (11/28, A18, 690K) reports, "In the mess that is Iraq, there's one entity that has done an unquestionably good job: the special inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction. Under the leadership of Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the inspector general's office has found that the Coalition Provisional Authority could not account for almost $9 billion distributed to Iraqi ministries. … Its audits have saved the government more than $400 million. Now there's a move to close down Mr. Bowen's shop. More than a move, actually: A mischievous provision, slipped into the defense authorization bill by House Republicans without the knowledge of key senators, set an October 2007 termination date for the office. The bill was signed into law last month, but a number of senators, including Susan Collins, chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee; Joseph I. Lieberman, the committee's ranking minority member; and Russell Feingold, are trying to reverse this foolish plan during the lame-duck session."

Bush To Seek Renewed NATO Commitment To Afghan Mission. USA Today (11/28, A6, Jackson, 2.27M) reports from Estonia, "President Bush arrived here Monday to promote freedom and democracy, using this small Baltic nation, a former republic of the Soviet Union, as a model. Bush came to the seaport of Tallinn in advance of this week's NATO summit on Afghanistan and meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan." Estonia and Latvia, site of the two-day summit, "are US allies in the war on terrorism."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (11/28) says "one issue will dominate this week's NATO summit: Afghanistan. The 26 presidents and prime ministers know that the future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is playing out in the deserts of Kandahar and mountains of Uruzgan rather than in their conference hall on the Baltic Sea." The Washington Post (11/28, A1, Abramowitz, Constable, 690K) reports Bush "will seek fresh troops and equipment for the fight in Afghanistan, and fewer restrictions on how they can be used, when he sits down this week with NATO allies to review the state of the dangerous mission there, according to senior US officials." The Afghan mission "is shaping up as the major issue for discussion among Bush and the leaders of the 25 other NATO member countries, who are gathering for the first time in two years. A failed operation in Afghanistan would threaten NATO's ambition to one day play a more robust role in helping address the world's crises." The Post adds, "Briefing reporters on Air Force One on the way to Estonia, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley cited 'an increasing awareness at how important this is for the war on terror, how important it is for Afghanistan and how important it is for NATO not to fail.'" The Washington Post (11/27, A12, Constable, 690K) runs a second report on NATO, titled "A NATO Bid To Regain Afghans' Trust," in which it gives mixed reviews to the alliance's efforts at reconstruction in Panjwai.

The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, LaFranchi, 59K) says Afghanistan "is something the president dare not disregard even in the midst of Iraq developments. Not only is the NATO-led war in Afghanistan facing its own mounting challenges, with potentially deep consequences for the international war on terror, but of the two wars, it is also the one where the United States has important allied assistance." Bush "will press the 26-nation alliance for both more money and more troops for Afghanistan, according to White House officials. To make his case, Bush will emphasize the connection between international security and the battle to defeat a resurgent Taliban and elements of Al Qaeda." NATO "already commands more than 30,000 foreign troops in Afghanistan. Gen. James Jones, the supreme allied commander, is looking for summit leaders to add 2,500 troops to the total. The challenge for Bush, however, will be skepticism about his leadership in the wake of perceived defeat in the midterm elections, and what is viewed internationally as his lame-duck status."

But the Washington Times (11/28, Dinan, 88K) reports "expectations for the NATO summit are low." Europeans "are resisting Mr. Bush's push for committing more troops to the dangerous areas of Afghanistan, and want to go slowly on expanding the alliance's ties to non-NATO nations who are assisting with security operations." Hadley "said the difficulties are understandable but said the leaders at the summit will make some announcements on those issues."

More Commentary. The New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) editorializes, "NATO is failing its most significant post-Soviet test: stabilizing Afghanistan. ... Unless NATO's members commit to sending in more troops and more resources, Afghanistan could go the way of Iraq." Some reluctant countries have imposed an "unfair division of labor. Canadian, Dutch, British and American forces in southern Afghanistan are doing most of the heavy fighting, while the French, Germans and Italians patrol relatively quiet northern regions." Bush "can't do much more than cajole the allies. Iraq has deprived him of both international credibility and the military forces to do more. It is now up to the rest of the alliance. All NATO members must acknowledge that the Afghan war is not just some post-9/11 gesture ... There is a life-and-death struggle under way against terrorists and extremism that is in all their national interests to win."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M) editorializes, "The NATO forces battling resurgent Taliban in southern Afghanistan call to mind the Normandy landing. Once again, mostly Canadian, British and American troops are fighting and dying. ... With a few exceptions, such as the Dutch and Danes, most NATO members prefer the by now traditional division of labor: The Anglo-Saxons do the fighting while the others compete for popularity as armed aid workers. ... If NATO can't muster the forces to defeat the remnants of al Qaeda's original state sponsor, what is it good for?"

UN Report Finds Afghan Poppy Eradication Campaign Failing To Make Progress. USA Today (11/28, 1A, Leinwand, 2.27M), in a front-page article titled, "Afghan Opium Fight Hurts Poorest," reports, "U.S. and European efforts to end heroin production in Afghanistan have done little to hamper the drug industry and have hurt the country's poorest people, according to a new report by the United Nations and the World Bank." The report "says the production of opium…permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades. The opium trade accounts for about $2.7 billion in Afghanistan's economy — equal to more than one-third of the nation's gross domestic product — and is responsible for thousands of jobs, the report says. The Taliban government, which had harbored al-Qaeda, virtually eliminated opium production in 2001, before U.S.-led forces toppled it. Production has soared since, even as the United States and its allies have stepped up efforts to kill fields of opium and persuade farmers to grow other crops."

Rangel Urged To Apologize For Comment About US Troops. The Washington Times (11/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The national commander of the American Legion called on Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, to apologize for suggesting that American troops would not choose to fight in Iraq if they had other employment options. 'Our military is the most skilled, best-trained, all-volunteer force on the planet,' National Commander Paul A. Morin said yesterday. 'Like that recently espoused by Sen. John Kerry, Congressman Rangel's view of our troops couldn't be further from the truth and is possibly skewed by his political opposition to the war in Iraq.'" The Times adds, "According to Mr. Rangel, 'If a young fellow has an option of having a decent career, or joining the Army to fight in Iraq, you can bet your life that he would not be in Iraq. If there's anyone who believes these youngsters want to fight, as the Pentagon and some generals have said, you can just forget about it. No bright young individual wants to fight just because of a bonus and just because of some educational benefits.'"

New York US Attorney Faces Tough Calls. The New York Law Journal (11/28, Hamblett) reports, "Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia knew there would be some tough calls to make when he accepted an appointment to one of the most high-profile law enforcement jobs in the country." The Journal continues, "Garcia, 45, was sworn in as U.S. Attorney on Sept. 6, 2005. During a little more than a year as the top federal prosecutor in Manhattan, he had to pull the plug on several celebrated cases to defend subordinates from almost unprecedented criticism over their handling of a non-prosecution agreement with KPMG. … But Garcia does not take refuge in the fact that the cases he has had to clean up were launched well before he took office last year. … 'We don't measure the value of this office in terms of wins and losses,' he said in a recent interview in his office at One St. Andrew's Plaza in lower Manhattan. 'The value is in the type of cases we bring and the example we set for the rest of the country.'" The Journal adds, "Garcia said that the Southern District has always taken 'hard cases, cutting edge cases,' that come with some risk attached. … 'We go in because we believe the case is strong and we do the right thing,' he said. 'We have some assistants saying "I'm 11-0," but what does that mean? A guy might be 5-5 but he's bringing very tough, important cases.'" The Journal notes, "When Garcia took office, he emphasized his great respect for its traditions and national reputation, and said he had no intention of radically changing the way the office does business. … Garcia indicated he would pay particular attention to public corruption, announcing a higher profile in the district's northern counties by establishing a corruption hotline."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

ACS Ousts Officials After Accounting Probe. Bloomberg (11/28, Kammel) reports, "Affiliated Computer Services Inc., the world's biggest processor of student loans, ousted Chief Executive Officer Mark A. King and finance chief Warren D. Edwards after a probe showed that stock options were backdated." Bloomberg continues, "King, 49, and Edwards quit yesterday after violating the company's code of ethics with options awards, according to a statement today. Chief Operating Officer Lynn Blodgett, 52, will become CEO and John Rexford, 49, will be chief financial officer." Bloomberg adds, "The two managers at the Dallas-based company are among more than 60 executives that have left their jobs after investigations into whether options grants were backdated and compensation costs misreported. Options probes to see whether grants were retroactively dated to increase their value to executives and other recipients have affected at least 187 companies. … The incorrect accounting unearthed in the probe, which scrutinized option practices between 1994 and 2005, will lead to about $51 million in costs plus tax-related expenses, the company said. The sum may be higher or lower depending on the final outcome. Affiliated Computer said it has yet to determine whether it will need to restate earnings as a result of the adjustment."

Corporate Counsel Positions Draw More Scrutiny, Higher Pay. The Financial Times (11/28, Masters) reports, "Becoming a corporate general counsel used to be something leading American lawyers did to slow down. … The jobs were considered relatively low-key, low-profile and low-paid, at least in comparison to a partner at a big law firm, and lawyers who went in-house often held their jobs until they retired or got bored." The Times continues, "Not any more. In the wake of the 2002-03 corporate scandals and the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate accountability law, general counsels are now central figures at most US companies, often reporting directly to the board and often appearing on the list of the five highest paid corporate officers. … The post has also become a much riskier assignment. In the past six months, 12 public companies have changed chief legal officers amid investigations into whether the firms illegally backdated stock options grants to pump up executive compensation." The Times adds, "Between the departures over stock options and ordinary turnover, the American market for in-house lawyers is hopping, search firm executives say. In-demand candidates are fielding multiple inquiries and compensation packages are rising. … The average bonus for the nation's 100 highest-paid general counsels was $906,820 last year, up 16 per cent, and the average restricted stock grant was nearly $1m, up 35 per cent, according to a study of Securities and Exchange Commission filings by Corporate Counsel magazine. … When salaries were included, the total average package reached nearly $2.5m." The Times notes, "Worried boards are asking for candidates with a different set of skills than they did 15 years ago. Back then, companies wanted merger-and-acquisition experience and investment banking ties. … Now even companies not facing immediate regulatory problems want former prosecutors and SEC enforcement lawyers. … Search firms date the shift to the Enron and WorldCom scandals, which put corporate fraud on the public radar. Since then, Fortune 500 companies PepsiCo, Lockheed Martin, Boeing and Estée Lauder have all turned to lawyers with Justice Department experience."

Judge Sets January Date For Milberg Weiss Trial. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, Simons) reports, "The trial of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, a prominent class-action law firm, and two of its top partners, will get under way (in Los Angeles) Jan. 8, 2008, a federal judge said at a hearing Monday." The Journal continues, "The setting of the trial date came amid further questions from defense lawyers about whether government prosecutors would file additional indictments, a subject that has been a sticking point in setting a firm trial date." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors had been aiming for a trial date in October 2007, while defendants were seeking a February 2008 setting. … Federal Judge John Walter started Monday's hearing suggesting an October trial date. Defense attorneys balked, saying that wasn't enough time to prepare for a case if more indictments were filed against Milberg Weiss. … 'October is unrealistic to get this done in an orderly way,' said Bill Taylor, the lead attorney for Milberg Weiss." The Journal notes, "So far, the government's efforts to obtain further indictments have remained under seal at the request of prosecutors, and Judge Walter said at the hearing that the efforts were 'a red herring' in the case. … In May, a federal grand jury here indicted the firm on fraud charges. According to the 20-count indictment, the firm paid plaintiffs millions of dollars in exchange for filing more than 150 lawsuits. Two of the firm's top partners, Steven Schulman and David Bershad, also were charged with participating in the alleged kickback scheme."

Epstein Decries Deferred Prosecution Agreements. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/28, A14), Richard A. Epstein, who is the James Parker Hall Distinguished Service Professor of Law at the University of Chicago and the Peter and Kirsten Bedford Senior Fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University, writes, "Corporations suffer a peculiar vulnerability. The rules of criminal liability allow federal and state prosecutors to unduly punish those corporations that fall within their crosshairs. But the recent emergence of deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) to force major changes in corporate governance should give pause to even the most ardent populist." Epstein continues, "A DPA is a provisional settlement of a criminal lawsuit whereby the prosecutor agrees to suspend -- but not to dismiss -- any prosecution in exchange for the corporation's promise to reform its internal operations in specified ways. A sensible settlement can split the difference, by having a defendant pay half the maximum fine or sentence. But with corporations they take on an entirely different -- and sinister -- complexion. … The last thing a corporation fears (since it cannot be imprisoned) is the maximum fine from a successful criminal conviction. Rather, the deadly force of the DPA rests in a combination of two key factors: vicarious corporate criminal liability, and the collateral consequences of the initial indictment prior to, and independent of, any eventual conviction." Epstein adds, "Writing in January 2003, Larry Thompson, then deputy U.S. attorney general, exhorted federal prosecutors to use vicarious liability to extract favorable settlements to reform corporate defendants from the outside. The Thompson memorandum insisted that corporations receive a temporary reprieve only if they purge themselves of individual wrongdoers and agree to extensive government oversight to make them walk the straight and narrow path. … In pursuing Mr. Thompson's strategy, prosecutors face both a dilemma and an opportunity. Their only credible threat against a recalcitrant corporation is the criminal indictment -- yet simply filing an indictment triggers huge collateral repercussions sufficient to drive the firm out of business, as teams of state and federal regulators are now duty-bound to suspend the licenses and permits under which the corporation does business. Thus, the corporation that has strong protections against false convictions -- proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the elements of the crime, the ability to examine evidence or cross-examine witnesses -- is helpless to protect itself. A conviction carries at most a million-dollar fine, but simple indictment, which lies wholly within the prosecutor's discretion, imposes multibillion-dollar losses. … Faced with that kind of pressure, the indictment is all that matters. Yet given these weird incentives, DPAs no longer serve the public interest. … At bottom, corporations are just individuals tied together by an elaborate network of contracts; and we don't need yet another sorry reminder of how mindless government policies harm the innocent shareholders whom they are supposed to protect. The government has a vital role in criminal enforcement. So let it go after real, i.e., human, criminals the old-fashioned way, by careful investigation and skilled prosecution."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US To Appeal Reversal Of Ex-San Diego Councilman's Conviction. The AP (11/28) reports, "The Justice Department said Monday that it will appeal a federal judge's ruling that overturned a jury conviction of a former City Council member accused of taking money from a strip club owner in exchange for political favors." The AP continues, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam poured significant resources into winning a conviction against Michael Zucchet in July 2005, forcing the councilman to resign and relinquish his position as interim mayor. Four months later, U.S. District Court Judge Jeffrey Miller acquitted Zucchet, saying the evidence against him on charges of fraud and extortion was insufficient. … 'Because it is rare for a trial judge to overturn a jury's unanimous finding of guilt, it should not surprise anyone that the government would seek to defend the jury's verdicts on appeal,' Lam said in a statement." The AP adds, 'Zucchet's attorney, Jerry Coughlan, insisted on Zucchet's innocence. … 'They've got an uphill battle ahead of them to convince an appellate court that one of the best judges around was wrong,' Coughlan said. … Zucchet and fellow former Councilman Ralph Inzunza were convicted of taking money from Las Vegas strip club owner Michael Galardi in exchange for trying to ease restrictions on touching dancers at San Diego strip clubs."

Fan Accused Of Hacking Cell Phone Of Rock Singer. The AP (11/28) reports from Albuquerque, NM, "A woman is accused of using a computer at a national laboratory to hack into a cell phone company's Web site to get a number for Chester Bennington, lead singer of the Grammy-winning rock group Linkin Park." The AP continues, "According to an affidavit filed by the Department of Defense Inspector General, Devon Townsend, 27, obtained copies of Bennington's cell phone bill, the phone numbers he called and digital pictures taken with the phone. … Investigators said she also hacked into the e-mail of Bennington's wife, Talinda Bennington, and at one point called her and threatened her." The AP adds, "Talinda Bennington told federal authorities last month that someone had accessed their Verizon Wireless account online, according to the affidavit, and expressed concern that a 'stalker' had access to personal information. .. .Townsend waived her right to a preliminary hearing Tuesday in U.S. District Court and was released to her mother's custody. She is accused of using a computer at her former workplace, Sandia National Laboratories, to access Bennington's cell phone information. Lab spokesman Michael Padilla said Wednesday that she no longer worked there."

New York Man Faces Death Penalty For Killing Two Detectives. The New York Times (11/28, Brick) reports on the 2003 fatalities of two detectives and writes, "The man on trial for their killing in federal district court in Brooklyn, Ronell Wilson, 24, faces the death penalty on charges of murder in furtherance of racketeering. Prosecutors have dropped charges of obstruction of justice murder, because a witness crucial to those charges rescinded his earlier account that Mr. Wilson knew the men were detectives. That witness, like several others in the case, was a member of the so-called Stapleton Crew, a street gang that prosecutors said sold drugs and guns, shot, robbed and terrorized a path across Staten Island."

The New York Sun (11/28, Goldstein) reports, "A federal prosecutor told a jury yesterday that the Staten Island man accused of executing two undercover detectives during a gun sale in 2003 had considered that his victims might be police and simply 'did not care.'" The Sun continues, "The defendant, Ronell Wilson, now 24, could face the death penalty if convicted in a trial that opened yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn. But the judge, Nicholas Garaufis, instructed the 12 jurors and six alternates not to think about sentencing Mr. Wilson during the first stage of the trial, as they decided the factual question of his guilt or innocence of the federal racketeering crimes he is charged with." The Sun adds, "Mr. Wilson is a reputed leader of the Stapleton Crew, a gang named after the Staten Island housing project of the same name. Mr. Wilson is accused of killing detectives James Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews as he gave them driving directions from the back seat of the car. … The car, a Nissan Maxima, is at the center of the case. The ride began at about 7:15 p.m. on March 10, 2003, when the detectives pulled up in front of Wilson, then 20, and his 17-year-old associate Jesse Jacobus at the housing development." The Sun notes, "The aim of the detectives, both members of the elite Firearms Investigation Unit, was to purchase a TEC-9 submachine gun for $1,200 and get 'one more gun out of the hands of one more violent criminal,' an assistant U.S. attorney, Colleen Kavanagh, said. A half-hour later, the bodies of detectives were found in a nearby street. Both men had been shot in the head."

FBI Expands Investigation Of Former Newark Mayor. The Newark Star-Ledger (11/28, Shearn, Martin) reports, "A federal investigation into the administration of former Newark Mayor Sharpe James has expanded, with more subpoenas delivered to City Hall and agents now scrutinizing real estate deals that benefited some of the ex-mayor's biggest supporters, according to sources close to the probe. FBI agents in recent weeks have interviewed a number of city employees, and prosecutors also have demanded additional records from Newark City Hall, among them personnel files of at least four current and former city employees, including James' son, Elliot." The Star-Ledger adds, "While investigators continue to look at travel-related expenses, they are also probing the administration's sale of surplus city lots to developers at cut-rate prices, according to sources familiar with the investigation. Among those winning the no-bid contracts were several people with close ties to James, including some with little or no development experience, a Star-Ledger investigation found in 2005."

Investigators Identify Third Victim Of New Jersey Serial Killer. The New York Times (11/28, Kocieniewski, Schweber, 1.16M) reports, "Investigators yesterday released the identity of the third of four women found dead last week in a ditch near a squalid strip of motels just outside Atlantic City. They noted that like two other victims, she, too, had a history of prostitution arrests. The victim, Barbara Breidor, 42, is believed to have been dumped into the ravine about two weeks before pedestrians discovered the women's bodies on Nov. 20, according to a statement by the Atlantic County prosecutor, Jeffrey S. Blitz. … All four victims were found in several inches of water behind a $15-a-night motel, barefoot and with their heads facing in the same direction, a few hundred feet apart, Mr. Blitz has said." The Times notes, "Local authorities have formed a task force with the New Jersey State Police and the F.B.I. to try to solve the killings."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/28, Anastasia, Urgo, 385K) reports, "Earlier this year, three suspected prostitutes were attacked" in Atlantic City. "All three were slashed across the throat," and the "unsolved crimes have attracted the attention of investigators" in the current case. "'Major Crimes, the FBI and the state police have been in,' said Atlantic City Police Detective Richard Johnson, a city arson investigator who worked on the Georgia Avenue cases. Johnson was quick to point out that there was no hard evidence linking the Georgia Avenue slashings to the marsh killings, which some have attributed to a serial killer. Investigators are interested because all of the victims were apparently prostitutes, Johnson said."

Fairfax County To Seek FBI Help In Investigation Of Similar Murders. The Washington Times (11/28, Cella, 88K) reports, "Fairfax County police plan to ask for help from the FBI as they investigate the recent killings of two similar-looking elderly women who shared the same first name and lived two miles apart." Police spokeswoman Camille Neville "said that officers canvassing the Springfield neighborhood near where the women were killed received some 'promising' tips." The Times adds, "Police said that they have not connected the two killings through physical evidence but are investigating the similarities. Officer Neville said police are planning to ask for help from the FBI's Quantico, Va.-based Behavioral Science Unit, which develops profiles of suspects based on evidence patterns."

FBI Investigating Kentucky Prison Slayings. The Lexington (KY) Herald-Leader (11/28, Mueller) reports, "Federal authorities are investigating the second slaying in less than three weeks at a maximum security prison in Eastern Kentucky. Prison authorities Monday confirmed the stabbing death of Shamoni Peterson, 32, on Nov. 13, three weeks after the U.S. Penitentiary-Big Sandy in Martin County reported the first slaying since it opened in 2003." The Herald-Leader adds, "Prison spokeswoman Mashelle Arisman said that no charges have been filed in either case, but that the FBI is investigating. Arisman said the prison, which houses 1,600 high-security inmates near the Johnson County line, has been placed on lockdown status during the investigation."

Iowa Man Pleads Guilty To Lying To FBI In Murder Probe. The Cedar Rapids Gazette (11/28, de Souza Guedes) reports, "In a small federal courtroom crowded with reporters, investigators and members of Evelyn Miller's family, Danny Slick pleaded guilty to lying during a July 3, 2005, interview with the FBI about Evelyn's disappearance. … Slick was accused of lying to FBI agents…about a drug dealer known as 'Porky' and where 'Porky' lived. Slick's friend Randy Patrie, 34, told Slick that he had stopped to get 'dope' at 'Porky's' after he dropped off Slick at their residence…after the two men left the apartment where Evelyn lived with her family. At the time of Slick's arrest, authorities said it was an important step forward in piecing together the events that led to the disappearance of Evelyn and her death." The AP (11/28) also reports on the plea.

Investigators Have No Idea What Befell Missing Minnesota Boys. The Minneapolis Star-Tribune (11/28, Collins, Meryhew) reports, "Now that the air and ground crews are gone, the question on everyone's mind is: If Tristan and Avery didn't wander away from their home, then what happened to them? 'We just don't have any indicators one way or another,' on whether the brothers wandered off or whether foul play was involved, FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said Monday." The Star-Tribune adds, "After five days of intense searching, McCabe said they haven't ruled out the possibility the boys might still be on the Red Lake Reservation in northern Minnesota. 'Whenever you do a ground search, you can't always be sure,' he said. 'There's never a guarantee every area has been covered, even after a thorough search.' … The FBI has set up a tip hot line at 1-866-333-4969."

New York Woman Pleads Guilty To Online Extortion Plot. The New York Post (11/28, Mangan, 631K) reports, "A pretty, young swindler who first met a top Pepsi Bottling Group executive online later anonymously shook him down for $125,000 by threatening to tell his wife, children and bosses he was trolling the 'Net at work for women, shocking court papers reveal. 'I'm sure this will be an unpleasant surprise. I'm sure when your wife finds out that you've been looking for a fill-in for her . . . it will be unpleasant for her, too,' Jessica Wolcott, 22, e-mailed multimillionaire exec Gary Wandschneider, 54, in August." The Post notes, "Wolcott eventually got the funds transferred to her online account - but only after Wandschneider alerted the FBI, which provided the money and set up a sting to nail her. … When Wandschneider learned her name from FBI agents, he told them he had met her last February through the craigslist.org Web site. … Wolcott pleaded guilty to the extortion scheme in White Plains federal court last week."

Massachusetts Man Pleads Guilty In Corruption Probe. The Springfield (MA) Republican (11/28, Flynn) reports, "A former Springfield Housing Authority maintenance foreman yesterday became the 25th defendant to be convicted or admit guilt in Springfield's corruption probe. He pleaded guilty to two felonies for his role in building the Rhode Island summer home of ex-City Councilor Francis G. Keough III." The Republican continues, "Daniel J. McNamee, 40, of Springfield, pleaded guilty to one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false federal tax return during a hearing before Judge Michael A. Ponsor in U.S. District Court." The Republican adds, "The guilty pleas were part of a deal with the U.S. Justice Department that will spare McNamee a trial but potentially expose him to 12 to 18 months in prison, Ponsor said. Sentencing was set for March 1. … The pace of the six-year federal corruption offensive has picked up since August, with 10 defendants pleading guilty and two others accepting plea deals in the housing authority scandal."

Music Star Pleads Guilty To Shooting Tame Bear. The St Paul Pioneer Press (11/28) reports, "Country music star Troy Lee Gentry admitted Monday that 'Cubby,' the bear he killed on a Minnesota farm in 2004, wasn't a wild beast after all." The P-P continues, "Appearing in federal court in Duluth on the day his trial was to start, Gentry pleaded guilty to a charge of falsely claiming the animal was wild. The charge, a misdemeanor, was the result of a plea bargain reached last week with federal prosecutors. … 'He's glad to get it over with,' said Gentry's attorney, Ron Meshbesher, of Minneapolis. 'Obviously, he's saddened by all the publicity in this case, which inferred all kinds of improper conduct.'" The P-P adds, "Gentry, 39, and Lee Marvin Greenly, 46, who owns Minnesota Wildlife Connection near Sandstone, were charged in August with conspiracy and falsely 'tagging' the 'trophy-caliber' bear by claiming it was shot in the wild. In reality, the tame bear was shot in a fenced area of several acres. … After the indictment, Gentry's Nashville agent shifted the blame for any improper conduct to Greenly, and online fan discussion forums were abuzz with debate over whether Gentry was a bona fide big-game hunter or a wannabe." The P-P notes, "Gentry, in a statement released by his management company, said he regrets what happened, but he stops short of accepting any culpability other than relying on Greenly's guidance. … Meshbesher and the U.S. attorney's office worked out the plea bargain last week, and Gentry entered his new plea Monday morning before U.S. District Judge Paul Magnuson, sitting in Duluth. … In return for the guilty plea, prosecutors dropped a felony count against Gentry."

SCOTUS Will Not Reinstate $10.1 Billion Tobacco Verdict. Bloomberg (11/28) reports, "The Supreme Court refused to revive a $10.1 billion award against Philip Morris USA yesterday, rejecting an appeal from smokers who said they were misled about the health risks of 'light' cigarettes." Bloomberg continues, "The justices, without comment, left intact an Illinois Supreme Court decision that threw out the case against Philip Morris, which is a division of the Altria Group and is the nation's largest cigarette maker. … Antismoking activists had hoped the verdict would be the first in a series of awards around the country against the industry over light cigarettes. … 'It's clearly the end of lights litigation in Illinois,' said David Adelman, a Morgan Stanley analyst who has an overweight rating on Altria. Altria shares fell 33 cents, to $83.42, in New York Stock Exchange composite trading." Bloomberg adds, "In overturning the award last year, the Illinois Supreme Court said smokers could not invoke a state consumer protection law because the Federal Trade Commission had endorsed the 'light' and 'low tar' descriptions in settlements with other cigarette makers. Like many states, Illinois bars claims over actions specifically authorized by a government agency."

The AP (11/28) reports, "The case involved 1.1 million people who bought 'light' cigarettes in Illinois. They claimed Philip Morris knew when it introduced such cigarettes in 1971 that they were no healthier than regular cigarettes but hid both that information and that light cigarettes actually had a more toxic form of tar. … An Illinois judge ruled in favor of the smokers in March 2003, saying the company misled customers into believing they were buying a less harmful cigarette. … A separate case involving Philip Morris is pending before the Supreme Court. Justices are considering whether to allow a punitive damages award of $79.5 million to the widow of a longtime smoker."

States Move To Protect Children From Second-Hand Smoke. USA Today (11/28, Bazar) reports, "Anti-tobacco forces are opening a new front in the war against smoking by banning it in private places such as homes and cars when children are present." USA continues, "Starting Jan. 1, Texas will restrict smoking in foster parents' homes at all times and in cars when children are present, says Darrell Azar of the Department of Family and Protective Services. … Vermont, Washington and other states and counties already prohibit foster parents from smoking around children in their homes and cars. … Arkansas and Louisiana passed laws this year forbidding anyone from smoking in cars carrying young children. Courts are ordering smoke-free environments in custody and visitation disputes. … 'We are very rapidly moving to protect children from secondhand smoke,' says John Banzhaf, executive director of Action on Smoking and Health. 'Even from their own parents and grandparents.'" USA notes, "Former surgeon general Richard Carmona said in June that children exposed to secondhand smoke suffer an increased risk of respiratory ailments and sudden infant death syndrome. … Most smoking bans apply to workplaces and spots like bars and restaurants. … Smokers' rights groups liken banning smoking in private to the 'Salem witch hunt,' says Gary Nolan, spokesman for The Smoker's Club, Inc. He says secondhand smoke is not dangerous. 'If we don't reverse this, they'll be telling us what we can eat and what we can feed our children,' Nolan says."

US Pushes For Conviction Of Driver In Human Smuggling Deaths. The AP (11/28, Lozano) reports, "A prosecutor on Monday described the truck driver at the center of America's deadliest human smuggling attempt as a 'vile and heartless person' who ignored the pleas of the illegal immigrants stuffed in his trailer as the temperature inside rose." The AP continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors in closing arguments that Tyrone Williams, a Jamaican citizen, was concerned only with getting paid, not the welfare of the illegal immigrants he was transporting during the failed 2003 smuggling attempt. Nineteen people died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation. … Williams' attorney, Craig Washington, acknowledged Williams is guilty of transporting illegal immigrants, but he insisted Williams never meant to hurt them." The AP adds, "Rodriguez said Williams failed to turn on his vehicle's air conditioning, which would have prevented the deaths. When Williams found out his passengers had punched holes through the trailer's back doors in an attempt to get fresh air and call for help, his only concern was getting more money to pay for the damage, Rodriguez said. … During his closing statements, Rodriguez showed the jury crime scene photos of the 19 victims. .. 'This government takes no pleasure in showing you these horrific photos,' Rodriguez said. 'These deceased individuals can only testify through these photos.' … Williams is charged with 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting illegal immigrants. He faces a possible death sentence if convicted."

Informant Denies Buying Drugs At Home Of Slain Elderly Atlanta Woman. CNN.com (11/28) reports, "An informant cited in a search warrant as having purchased narcotics at an elderly Atlanta woman's house denies buying drugs there, authorities say." CNN continues, "Undercover officers raiding the 88-year-old woman's house shot her to death last week after she fired on them while they broke down her door in a high-crime neighborhood. … Federal prosecutors will investigate the case, Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington announced Monday." CNN adds, "Pennington said the eight-member narcotics squad that took part in the raid has been placed on paid leave while investigators look into the informant's story and the circumstances surrounding the Nov. 21 death of Kathryn Johnston. The informant also told investigators from the Atlanta police internal affairs bureau that he was told to lie about the matter, the chief said. … 'The FBI will investigate his statements, along with the police officers' statements as well,' Pennington said. … Police said Johnston opened fire on police who tried to enter her home, prying off burglar bars and forcing open her door, during a "no-knock" drug raid last Tuesday. Officers returned fire, killing her. … Relatives put Johnston's age at 92, but Fulton County medical examiners said she was 88."

McKinney Calls For DOJ Probe Of Shooting. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/28, Gentry) reports, "U.S. Rep. Cynthia McKinney has added her voice to a growing chorus of prominent Americans concerned about a spate of high-profile police shootings, including one that killed a New York man the day of his wedding." The AJC continues, "The congresswoman has asked the Justice Department to investigate police-involved shootings around the nation, including in her home district of DeKalb County, where police have fatally shot a dozen people this year. … 'There is a belief by some citizens that the police-involved shootings are steeped in the intentional use of excessive force, even deadly force,' McKinney said in a Nov. 25 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. 'There definitely appears to be a developing national pattern of police misconduct and abuse resulting in an inordinately high number of serious injuries and deaths to the victims.'" The AJC adds, "McKinney has also asked the House Judiciary Committee to conduct hearings on 'the state of America's law enforcement agencies' use of force and deadly force and the impact on Americans on the basis of race and economic standing,' her letter said."

New York Mayor Calls Police Shooting "Unacceptable." The New York Times (11/28, Cardwell, Chan) reports, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg convened an extraordinary meeting of black religious leaders and elected officials at City Hall yesterday to calm frayed tempers over the fatal police shooting of an unarmed black man in Queens, calling the circumstances 'inexplicable' and 'unacceptable.' … 'It sounds to me like excessive force was used,' the mayor said of the conduct of the officers, who fired 50 shots outside a Queens nightclub early Saturday, killing Sean Bell, 23, hours before he was to be wed, and injuring two others. 'I can tell you that it is to me unacceptable or inexplicable how you can have 50-odd shots fired.'" The Times continues, "Mr. Bloomberg made the remarks after meeting with some of the city's most influential black politicians and community leaders, including Representative Charles B. Rangel, the Rev. Al Sharpton and dozens of others. … The mayor's decision to meet with Mr. Sharpton and other black leaders was a stark turnabout from the approach of Mr. Bloomberg's predecessor, Rudolph W. Giuliani, who did not reach out to black leaders in the immediate aftermath of the fatal 1999 shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant who died in a hail of 41 police bullets." The Times adds, "Mayor Bloomberg's blunt assessment of events still under investigation was striking, although he took pains to point out that the facts were not all in, saying several times that he did not yet know what happened in the shooting, but that he expected that a grand jury would be impaneled by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown. … In a move that suggests the officers feel their actions were justified, the lawyer representing the men said he had contacted Mr. Brown's office and offered to have the officers speak to prosecutors and appear before a grand jury voluntarily without immunity. The police have not released the officers' names, saying they are trying to protect them from retaliation or harassment."

The Washington Post (11/28, A3, Powell, Shulman) reports, "Once again a hail of police bullets has ended the life of an unarmed black New Yorker, and the city's mayor finds himself walking an uncertain line between reassuring black and Latino residents and defending his police force." The Post continues, "With a City Council member saying that black people are being 'murdered' and some black clergy signaling their discontent with Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R), who is white, walked into a news conference Monday and spoke of his profound unease with the shooting by undercover police that claimed the life of a bridegroom on his wedding day. … In a visible symbol of Bloomberg's concern, he was accompanied by a number of prominent black pastors and politicians, including activist preacher Al Sharpton and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.). The night before, Sharpton journeyed to the Community Church of Christ in the Jamaica neighborhood of Queens and vowed that he was going to 'keep this in the street.'"

The AP (11/28, Hajela) reports, "An angry crowd shouted 'No justice, no peace!' Some called for the ouster of the city's police commissioner. Many counted off to 50, the number of rounds that are estimated to have been fired by police at three unarmed men, killing one on his wedding day." The AP continues, "Several hundred people gathered Sunday for a vigil and rally to demand answers about why officers let fly a flurry of bullets at 23-year-old Sean Bell early Saturday, hours before he was supposed to marry the mother of his two young children. … The five officers were placed on paid administrative leave and stripped of their guns, said Paul Browne, chief spokesman for the NYPD. Police and prosecutors promised a full investigation. … But none of that stemmed the fury of a community outraged by the shootings. … 'We cannot allow this to continue to happen,' the Rev. Al Sharpton said at the gathering outside Mary Immaculate Hospital, where one of the two wounded men was in critical condition. 'We've got to understand that all of us were in that car.'" The AP notes, "Some in the crowd called for the removal of Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly, yelling 'Kelly must go!' … Kelly has said that police shot at the car after it drove forward and struck an undercover officer and an unmarked police minivan. The information was based on interviews with witnesses and two officers who did not fire their weapons, he said. … But a witness account emerged Monday disputing that version of events."

NYTimes Says Police Department Must Account For Shooting Of Unarmed Man. The New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Mayor Michael Bloomberg and his police commissioner, Raymond Kelly, are dealing differently with their own Diallo-style disaster. Police officers firing 50 rounds early last Saturday killed Sean Bell, an unarmed man who was to have married his high school sweetheart later in the day." Mayor Michael Bloomberg has "rightly called for a quick and impartial investigation. The officers must be held accountable for what has happened. But the Police Department must also confront the fact that a disaster that everyone swore to prevent seven years ago has repeated itself in Queens."

LAPD Probe Assigns No Blame In Shooting Death Of Toddler. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Mcgreevy, Winton) reports, "So many bullets were discharged during a siege last year at a South Los Angeles auto shop that investigators cannot determine which Los Angeles Police Department officer fired the shot that killed 19-month-old Suzie Pena, Chief William J. Bratton said Monday." The Times continues, "The finding, which comes after a 15-month investigation that used top outside weapons experts, complicates the Police Commission's task Tuesday in deciding whether the officers should be disciplined. … Suzie Pena was shot twice as her father held her in front of him as he exchanged gunfire with LAPD officers in July 2005. The fatal shot hit Suzie in the head but did not lodge there, and investigators could not determine which bullet fragment they recovered had hit her." The Times adds, "Her death set off a debate about LAPD tactics, prompting investigations by the FBI and Los Angeles County district attorney's office as well as calls for better rules in the way SWAT officers respond to hostage standoffs. … Bratton described the investigation as one of the most complex in LAPD history. It involved microscopic analysis of 250 fired bullets and casings, involving 13 firearms, and more than 80 interviews with witnesses and 36 DNA tests."

High Court Hears Pay-Bias Case. The AP (11/28, Sherman) reports, "Employees must complain about pay discrimination within six months or forfeit their claim, the Supreme Court was told Monday in a case closely watched by companies and civil rights groups." The AP continues, "Justices engaged in a lively but inconclusive debate about how to apply a 180-day deadline for complaining about discriminatory pay decisions under Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964." The AP adds, "Lilly Ledbetter sued Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., claiming that after 19 years at the company's Gadsden, Ala., plant, she was making $6,000 a year less than the lowest-paid man in the same job. .. Ledbetter claimed the disparity existed for years and was primarily a result of her gender. A jury agreed, but an appeals court overturned the verdict." The AP notes, "Lawyers for Goodyear and the Bush administration argued against her claim. … Glen Nager, Goodyear's attorney, said the appeals court was correct. … 'Bring that claim or lose it,' he said. … Justice Department lawyer Irving Gorenstein said if the court were to side with Ledbetter, 'it would undo the statute of limitations in pay cases.' … But Ledbetter's lawyer, Kevin Russell, told the justices that each smaller paycheck should be treated as a new act of discrimination."

The New York Times (11/28, Greenhouse) reports, "Federal law prohibits discrimination on the job, requiring employers to pay their employees without regard to race, sex, religion or national origin. Many complexities lie behind that simple statement, as a Supreme Court argument on Monday made abundantly clear." The Times continues, "The question for the court was how to treat a discriminatory action that happened long ago, beyond the statute of limitations for the federal Civil Rights Act, but that has effects that continue to the present day. Is each new paycheck, reflecting a salary lower than it would have been without the initial discrimination, a recurring violation that sets the clock running again? Or does the passage of time, without fresh acts of intentional discrimination, render the initial injury a nonevent in the eyes of the law?"

EEOC Seeks To Block Discovery In Sidley Age Bias Case. The New York Law Journal (11/28, Lin) reports, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which is suing law firm Sidley Austin for allegedly demoting around 30 partners on the basis of age, is seeking to block discovery concerning the subsequent job performance of several of the former partners, as well as the mental health of one." The Journal continues, "Chicago-based Sidley has denied having a mandatory retirement policy and claims that the partners at issue were demoted in 1999 due to performance factors, including low billable hours and poor business development skills. The firm is hoping to show that new employers encountered similar performance from demoted partners who left Sidley. … But in a motion for a protective order filed Nov. 17 in Chicago federal court, the EEOC asked that Sidley be denied discovery relating to the billable hours, equity status and business development efforts of six former partners now working at other firms. The agency, which is arguing that performance reasons for the demotions were pretextual, called the information sought by Sidley 'not relevant to any disputed fact' in the case. … 'Evidence concerning the Former Partners' hours, billings, business development and time devoted to specific clients at the Subsequent Firms would not have any tendency to prove or disprove whether such factors actually motivated Sidley's decision to change Former Partners' status in 1999,' the EEOC said in its motion before Judge James Zagel of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois." The Journal notes, "The agency, which has agreed to stipulate that Sidley's records concerning billable hours and other performance metrics are accurate, also highlighted a potential hazard to former partners of permitting the firm to seek such records from those partners' current firms."

Groups Plan To Press For ERA As Democrats Take Over Congress. The Washington Times (11/28, Wetzstein, 88K) reports, "The Democratic takeover of Congress should revive interest in an issue many Americans think is settled -- adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment -- as new bipartisan groups pursue the Republican-leaning states needed for its ratification. … Supporters say that despite advancements for women's rights since the ERA's official death in 1982 -- primarily prohibitions against sex discrimination -- the constitutional amendment is needed because women lag in career advancement and pay equity." The Times adds, "The ERA has its veteran supporters, such as the National Council of Women's Organizations. But in recent years, at least two new groups have emerged with the mission of getting three more state ratifications." The Time specifically cites the ERA Campaign Network and www.4ERA.org.

ANTITRUST:

Supreme Court Hears Arguments In Telecommunications Antitrust Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, Bravin, 2.04M) reports that in a "case with implications for antitrust enforcement, the Supreme Court heard arguments on how specific a plaintiff's allegations must be to claim anticompetitive behavior." The 1996 Telecommunications Act "gave the Bell system's regional successors, the Baby Bells, the right to sell long-distance service in return for opening their local networks to competitors. Despite Congress's expectation the law would create a competitive market, the Baby Bells have remained dominant in their respective regions." The plaintiffs, "a group of individuals who bought local telephone and Internet service since the law was enacted and represented by the class-action firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, filed suit in 2003, alleging the Baby Bells conspired to restrict entry into their territories of competitors in local telephone and Internet service." The plaintiffs had "no direct evidence of such a conspiracy, however, and instead based their claim on circumstantial indicators of anticompetitive behavior, such as the parallel conduct of the Baby Bells in declining to compete in each other's territory and allegedly impeding other carriers from connecting to their networks. The Baby Bells argued that without more -- such as an allegation of a specific meeting in which a deal was made to restrain trade -- the case should be dismissed without allowing the plaintiffs discovery of internal documents."

Market Watch (11/28, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court Monday pressed both sides in its search for how much evidence plaintiffs must provide to litigate a private antitrust conspiracy lawsuit against several Baby Bell companies." Market Watch continues, "Verizon Communications Inc., BellSouth Corp., AT&T Inc.'s SBC Communications Inc. unit, and Qwest Communications International Inc. have all been trying to block a class-action lawsuit alleging they engaged in an anticompetitive conspiracy to restrict competition in the local telephone and broadband Internet markets. … The lawsuit is still in its early stages. The companies and the U.S. Justice Department, at oral arguments on the appeal, urged the Supreme Court to set private antitrust lawsuit standards that ends the case before expensive legal discovery takes place."

The Deal (11/28, Lindell) reports, "U.S. Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer on Monday didn't seem too impressed with the notion that competitors taking similar actions is enough to file a lawsuit charging antitrust violations. … 'If you're right,' Breyer told J. Douglas Richards, attorney for respondent William Twombly, who filed a class action against Bell Atlantic Corp. and the rest of the telecommunications companies, 'I guess we can engage in a major restructuring of our economy.'" The Deal continues, "Twombly charged the phone companies had violated the Sherman Act -- which prohibits conspiracies -- by agreeing not to compete outside the regions in which each was essentially the dominant phone provider. The proof that there was an actual agreement was a statement in the initial brief that said that the same decision by all the companies was contrary to the interest of the firms, Richards told the court. … 'Conduct against self interest is a way [for the court] to infer a violation' of the Sherman Act, Richards said. … But he was having a hard time arguing with eight justices who appeared incredulous and at times jockeyed for a chance to ask more questions, with only Justice Clarence Thomas remaining apart from his querulous brethren. … 'You have a suspicion and you want to use the discovery process to see if that is true, isn't that the case?' Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg asked Richards." The Deal notes, "The high cost of discovery, which would trigger class actions that businesses would have to settle rather than litigate, is the big fear of the various companies and individuals filing friend of the court briefs in this matter, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, The Commonwealth of Virginia and 15 other states, a group of economists, and MasterCard International Inc."

The AP (11/28) reports, "The case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, stems from the deregulation of the telecommunications industry in the 1980s and 1990s, with some experts citing it as the most important antitrust case to reach the Supreme Court in 20 years. … The case is being closely watched by numerous companies, including airlines, credit card issuers and trade associations representing the wireless communications and pharmaceutical industries, all of whom have submitted or signed onto friend-of-the-court briefs." The AP adds, "A federal district court dismissed Twombly's case, finding that Twombly did not allege sufficient facts to indicate that a conspiracy would likely be proven during a trial. But Twombly argued that a conspiracy could be inferred from the so-called 'parallel conduct' or behavior of the defendants. … The Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court, however, finding in October 2005 that a plaintiff must submit only a 'short and plain statement of the claim' and not a detailed set of facts in order to survive a motion to dismiss. .. .The Baby Bells appealed to the Supreme Court. A low standard, corporations say, would enable 'meritless' and 'abusive' cases to go forward, forcing many businesses to settle those cases rather than endure the expense of litigation, including the discovery process in which defendants must produce documentation of certain facts for the plaintiff."

The Financial Times (11/28, Washington) reports, "The case could be the most important antitrust case before the court in 20 years, legal sources say. Big business has won all 11 of the court's recent decisions in antitrust cases. A decision in yesterday's case is expected by June." The Times adds, "The case turns on the question: how high a hurdle must private plaintiffs clear to force big companies to reveal private documents that might prove they conspired with others to commit an antitrust violation? … Ruling in the case, a federal appeals court set a fairly low hurdle, arguing that federal law makes no attempt to discourage such lawsuits. But the telephone companies who are the defendants in the suit argued that such a low standard would give plaintiffs' lawyers a powerful new weapon to force big companies to settle even frivolous lawsuits, since the high cost of 'discovery'…makes it very costly to fight such suits."

Bloomberg (11/28, Stohr) reports, "Business groups are backing the appeal. DuPont Co., MasterCard International, Visa USA, Northwest Airlines Corp., UAL Corp., Louisiana-Pacific Corp. and several industry trade groups all signed briefs siding with the phone companies. … It's one of two antitrust cases the high court will hear this week."

Russian Firm Emerges As Potential Buyer Of Former Weirton Steel Plant. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (11/28, Napsha) reports, "Steelworkers at the former Weirton Steel plant are anticipating that a new owner will be announced this week, one that might restart its steelmaking facilities and add 400 jobs, a union official said Monday." The PTR continues, "Russia's largest steelmaker, OAO Severstal, is the latest to surface as a potential buyer and is said to be in negotiations to acquire the mill, according to published reports in a Moscow newspaper. … Both Severstal and Arcelor Mittal, the current owner at Weirton, declined to comment on the report, which was in the same Moscow newspaper that recently said Severstal wanted to buy Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp. … 'There have been numerous interested parties ... and hopefully we'll have an announcement in the next few days,' said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union at Weirton. Glyptis said he had no firsthand knowledge of the Russian steelmaker's interest in acquiring the former Weirton Steel plant." The PTR adds, "The union is expecting a deal to surface because an agreement expires today between Arcelor Mittal and the U.S. Justice Department for Arcelor Mittal to divest itself of the tinmaking plant at Weirton, or one at Sparrows Point, Md., Glyptis said. .. .The Justice Department reached the deal because of Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor S.A., would give it a corner on tinmaking production in the eastern region of North America. Arcelor Mittal was unable to sell Dofasco Steel of Canada, which also has a tinmaking plant. … If a deal is not reached today, Arcelor Mittal could request a 60-day extension, Glyptis said." The PTR notes, "While the antitrust investigation into the Arcelor Mittal merger remains open, the Justice Department will not comment on the agreement, Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said yesterday. Talamona said she could not comment on whether Arcelor Mittal requested an extension."

Swift Rejects Buyout Offer From Former CEO. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, C4, Vuocolo) reports, "Swift Transportation Co. rejected a $2.2 billion bid from its largest shareholder, former Chief Executive Officer Jerry Moyes, and said it will try to negotiate a higher offer from him or other parties." The Journal continues, "Mr. Moyes is offering $29 a share for the Phoenix truckload carrier, which represented a 21% premium at the time it was made. A special committee of independent board members said the offer was inadequate. … The board committee, which is being advised by Goldman Sachs Group Inc., said it will negotiate with Mr. Moyes for a higher offer. The committee also said it has begun talks with 'other potential financial and strategic buyers.' The term financial buyers typically refers to private-equity firms. The term strategic buyers usually refers to corporations."

Google Gears Up For Antitrust Fight Over Search Rankings. The National Law Journal (11/28, Maclean) reports, "Relegated to electronic Siberia by the Google Inc. search rankings, KinderStart.Com Inc. saw its Web traffic plummet and ad revenue evaporate, so it fought back with an antitrust lawsuit challenging Google's popular ranking system." The Journal continues, "The 2006 suit in federal court in San Jose, Calif., has been dismissed once, and some observers say that the new amended version's antitrust and free speech claims may face an uphill battle to survive. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel indicated in an Oct. 27 hearing that he may not issue a written ruling until early next year on Google's motion to toss the case. … But the suit raises larger questions about Google's future susceptibility to antitrust claims as the ubiquitous Internet search engine gains steam. … 'Google is so large it runs the risk of slamming into the kind of situation that Microsoft found itself in, in terms of bundling its services together,' said Robert B. Reich, former labor secretary in the Clinton administration and now professor at the University of California's Goldman School of Public Policy. … 'All this means is Google needs to be ready for litigation, even if ultimately it comes out in Google's favor. As a big dominant company playing the pivotal role it plays, it is a sitting duck for all sorts of potential litigation,' Reich said. … As such a big player in the Internet industry, 'not only do you become a target of antitrust plaintiffs, you also can easily use your market heft in such a way as to impose burdens, or disadvantages, on other players,' said Reich." The Journal notes, "Others who watch the high-tech industry closely don't foresee serious antitrust clouds looming on Google's horizon. … 'There is no question Google does have market power in its space,' said Eric Goldman, law and technology professor at Santa Clara University School of Law in Silicon Valley. 'That is a predicate' in antitrust."

Supreme Court To Hear Landmark Patent Case. The Legal Times (11/28, Mauro) reports, "When Kenneth Bass III clerked at the Supreme Court in 1969, his justice, the late Hugo Black, told him confidentially what he thought of patents. … 'He told me that in his lifetime, he had seen only one real invention -- the airplane -- and he wasn't even certain about that one,' says Bass. 'He just didn't like patents.'" The Times continues, "Bass has to hope the current justices don't share that view today, when the Court takes up what he thinks could be the most important patent decision in 40 years. … Now a partner in the D.C. firm Sterne, Kessler, Goldstein & Fox, Bass is part of the legal team that will be defending a disputed patent in the case of KSR International v. Teleflex, which will be heard today. And Black would probably not like the side Bass is on." The Times adds, "Bass represents Pennsylvania auto-parts manufacturer Teleflex, the owner of a patent on an adjustable automobile gas pedal. Teleflex argues in favor of a controversial standard, used by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit to varying degrees for decades, that enabled Teleflex to get and keep the patent. By requiring patent challengers to produce hard evidence, the standard makes it harder to topple a patent based on the assertion that the new product was an obvious extension of prior ideas. … Critics say the standard protects even the most thinly documented patents, opening the floodgates to junk patents for minor innovations and dubious inventions. … Too many easily won patents, critics say, slow creativity and the exchange of ideas, putting 'glue, not grease, into the gears of innovation,' in the words of a brief by the Progress & Freedom Foundation. … But if Teleflex loses and the Supreme Court devises a less-patent-protecting standard, says Bass' co-counsel Thomas Goldstein of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, it will open a very different floodgate. Because 'many millions' of patents were granted under the disputed standard and patents can be challenged at any time, Goldstein says, 'If the Supreme Court does decide to make a substantial change, it will call into question innumerable patents.'"

High Court More Willing To Decide Patent Law Issues. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A1, Bravin, 2.04M) reports that with the economy "increasingly dependent on technological innovation, the Supreme Court is scrutinizing more patent rulings made by a special court that critics say has tilted too far in favor of intellectual-property rights and could be stifling competition." The court on Tuesday "hears arguments in one of three patent cases on this term's docket," and it has "ruled in recent cases on the side of more flexibility in enforcing such rights. If that trend continues, it could translate into weaker protections for patent holders and promote greater access to inventions." The Supreme Court's "newfound assertiveness on core issues of patent law -- after hearing only a handful of cases in the field over 20-plus years -- comes amid a sharp debate over how to maintain American industry's competitive edge while upholding the protections that reward the risk-taking behind cutting-edge inventions." Critics – "including the Bush administration in today's case -- assert that the Federal Circuit has shifted too far toward patent holders, expanding the types of inventions that can be patented and broadening the scope of monopoly a patent affords its holder. The court's defenders say the Federal Circuit was created in part to strengthen patent protections, and that it has succeeded in clarifying the law."

States' Suit To Force EPA Action On Global Warming Reaches Supreme Court. The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, Richey, 59K) reports that seven years ago, a "group of state officials and environmentalists" asked "the EPA to get involved - to take an initial step in response to scientific evidence that suggests greenhouse gases are causing global warming." EPA "refused, saying there were too many unresolved questions about the causes and effects of global warming. The state officials took their case to court, charging that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to take immediate action." This Wednesday, the dispute "arrives at the US Supreme Court, where the justices must decide whether the EPA is required to take action or whether the agency retains the discretion to decide for itself how best to respond to world-wide environmental threats." The case will "test the authority of special interest groups and state governments to sue federal agencies and force them to adopt certain regulatory policies that they favor. The case could also establish important legal precedents that might help or hinder state efforts to regulate greenhouses gases on their own in the absence of federal action."

The AP (11/28, Hebert) reports, "A dozen U.S. states as well as environmental groups and large cities are trying to convince the court that the Environmental Protection Agency must regulate, as a matter of public health, the amount of carbon dioxide that comes from vehicles." The AP adds, "Carbon dioxide is produced when fossil fuels such as oil and natural gas are burned. It is the principal 'greenhouse' gas that many scientists believe is flowing into the atmosphere at an unprecedented rate, leading to a warming of the earth and widespread ecological changes. One way to reduce those emissions is to have cleaner-burning cars. … The Bush administration intends to argue before the court on Wednesday that the EPA lacks the power under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant. The agency contends that even if it did have such authority, it would have discretion under the law on how to address the problem without imposing emissions controls." The AP notes, "The states, led by Massachusetts, and more than a dozen environmental groups insist the 1970 law makes clear that carbon dioxide is a pollutant - much like lead and smog-causing chemicals - that is subject to regulation because its poses a threat to public health. .. .A sharply divided federal appeals court ruled in favor of the government in 2005. But last June, the Supreme Court decided to take up the case, plunging for the first time into the politically charged debate over global warming. The ruling next year is expected to be one of the court's most important ever involving the environment."

NYTimes Says States Taking Right Course. The New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "A plain reading of the Clean Air Act shows that the states are right. The act says that the E.P.A. 'shall' set standards for 'any air pollutant' that in its judgment causes or contributes to air pollution that 'may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare.'"

Groups Launch Effort To Monitor Appalachian Trail For Environmental Problems. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, A17, Smith) reports, "The Appalachian Trail gives hikers a nearly 2,200-mile trek through mountains, meadows and forests stretching from Georgia to Maine. But to scientists and land managers, it is also a living laboratory that could provide warnings of environmental problems while there is still time to fix them." The AP continues, "A diverse collection of organizations have launched a project to begin long-term monitoring of the trail's environmental health, with plans to tap into an army of volunteer 'citizen scientists' and professionals." The AP adds, "Together, they will collect information about air and water quality, the health of plants, and animal migration patterns to build an early environmental warning system for the 120 million people along the Eastern Seaboard. … The Appalachian Mountains are ideal for the project because they are home to one of the richest collections of temperate-zone species in the world. They also have a variety of ecosystems that blend into one another -- hardwood forests next to softwood forests next to alpine forests. The trail along the mountain chain passes through 14 states and eight national forests." The AP notes, "The idea for the project, the Appalachian Trail Mega-Transect, is in its infancy, but it has support from the National Park Service, the U.S. Forest Service, Cornell University, the National Geographic Society and Aveda Corp., an environmentally conscious beauty-products company."

WPost Calls On Virginia To Guarantee Revenue For Chesapeake Cleanup. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/28, A18, 690K) notes recent improvements in the Chesapeake Bay's "overall health." The Post opines, "[B]ay states are improving their record on protecting the estuary, if too slowly, and they have time to expand their programs. … Virginia, which lags behind Maryland in its bay cleanup efforts, should guarantee revenue to do the same -- so that farmers will be able to rely on timely support over many harvests. Both states should also expand programs that help farmers pay for other agricultural improvements, such as the construction and maintenance of riparian buffers, which are effective and natural pollution trappers."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Technical Glitch Repeatedly Crashes FBI Gun Background Check System. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/28) reports, "An FBI computer system that quickly screens gun buyers' backgrounds for criminal activity crashed several times over the past two days, officials said Monday. At times, the National Instant Criminal Background Check System was on the blink for up to a half-hour on Sunday and Monday -- potentially allowing buyers to purchase firearms without being screened if sellers gave up on making the required check. The computer crash was blamed on a technical glitch that was being worked on Monday evening, said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson. 'It's a performance issue that we've never encountered before,' he said."

Supreme Court Declines To Hear Case Over Professor's FBI File. The AP (11/28) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider the case of a Nobel Peace Prize-nominated law professor who wants the U.S. government to expunge his FBI file." The AP continues, "A federal appeals court found that information the government gathered on Cherif Bassiouni is pertinent to authorized law enforcement activity as part of President George W. Bush's campaign against terror. The records are important for evaluating the reliability of FBI intelligence sources, the appeals court found." The AP adds, "The government argued in the lower courts that even though Bassiouni is not a member of any terror organization, agents probably will continue to receive information about him because of his travels in the Middle East. … Bassiouni, an Egyptian who teaches in the United States, is serving the United Nations as an independent expert on human rights in Afghanistan and was chairman of the U.N. Security Council's commission to investigate war crimes in the former Yugoslavia. … In 1999, Bassiouni was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize for work on international criminal justice and for his contribution to the creation of the International Criminal Court." The AP notes, "Bassiouni was among the U.N. human rights experts expressing concern about possible irreversible psychiatric symptoms in some terrorism suspects from virtual solitary confinement at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba."

Former Virginia Sheriff Pleads Not Guilty To Drug-Scheme Role. The AP (11/28, Lindsey) reports from Roanoke, VA, "A former sheriff pleaded not guilty Monday to federal charges that he took part in a scheme to sell drugs seized from criminals with a dozen former and current officers." The AP continues, "H. Franklin Cassell, 68, and two Henry County sheriff's deputies and a captain in the economically distressed county pleaded not guilty. The other defendants will be in court Wednesday. … The indictment returned Oct. 31 said Cassell looked the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations, stole guns and other evidence and then resold cocaine, steroids, marijuana and other drugs to the public." The AP adds, "Cassell is charged with impeding a federal investigation and money laundering. If convicted, he faces up to 53 years in prison and a $1.25 million fine. … Charges against the other defendants include racketeering conspiracy, drug distribution, weapons counts, obstruction of justice and perjury. … A former sergeant, James Alden Vaught, agreed to cooperate with investigators. His planned guilty plea Monday was delayed because his lawyer was ill, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant."

There are more than 130 media references to former Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell's plea in a federal drug case in which he is accused of hindering the investigation. For example, the Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch (11/28) reports Cassell "pleaded not guilty yesterday to trying to thwart a federal investigation into a drug-dealing ring allegedly run by some of his deputies. Later, in the same federal courtroom where Cassell pleaded not guilty, the Henry man whose arrest prompted the indictment of Cassell, along with 12 of his employees, pleaded guilty to a single count of participating in a racketeering conspiracy. … Federal agents began their investigation of Cassell's department in March 2005, when U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Philadelphia tipped off their counterparts in Roanoke that a package containing 2 kilograms of ketamine, a sedative used as a date-rape drug, was in the mail and on its way to a Martinsville house."

The Roanoke (VA) Times (11/28) reports DEA agents "conducted an undercover delivery of ketamine, a date rape drug, at a Henry County residence in March 2005. According to court records…acceptance of the package served as the springboard for the investigation, which eventually resulted in the indictment of…Cassell, 12 current and former deputies and seven civilians."

The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (11/27) reported Cassell "faces five counts alleging his participation in a money laundering scheme, obstruction of justice, false statement to a federal agency and misprison (failing to tell law enforcement of a felony)."

Local TV Coverage. WRIC-TV, Richmond-Petersburg, Virginia (11/27, 12:00 p.m.) aired, "Cassell and 12 other current and former officers are accused of scheming to sell drugs seized from criminals. The other officers have also pleaded not guilty. Cassell stepped down from his post earlier this month."

WDBJ-TV, Roanoke-Lynchburg, Virginia (11/27, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Former Sheriff Frank Cassell was back in federal court this morning for arraignment. The 68-year-old…was indicted last month for trying to cover up alleged drug dealing on the part of his deputies. They're among 22 people- in and out of the department- caught up in a DEA investigation that began a year and a-half ago. Cassell entered a plea of not guilty."

WFXR-TV, Roanoke-Lynchburg, Virginia (11/27, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "Former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell pleaded not guilty to federal charges he laundered drug money and lied to investigators. Federal law required Cassell to go before a judge today for his arraignment in the case. No trial date has been set."

California Supreme Court Ruling Said To Expand Protections For Medical Marijuana Users. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Dolan) reports people "charged with transporting marijuana may avoid conviction if they can show that the drug was for their personal medical use, the California Supreme Court ruled Monday. In a 6-1 decision, the state high court said California's medical marijuana law protects patients who transport even relatively large quantities of the drug if they can show that the amount was consistent with their medical needs and recommended by a licensed physician. … Monday's decision 'expands the defenses that can be used for medical marijuana,' including transportation and possession for sale, said Maureen J. Shanahan, who represented the defendant in the case."

Bay City News Wire (11/28) reports the ruling, "issued in San Francisco, concerns a 2003 state law that clarified California's medical marijuana law, which was passed by state voters in 1996 as the Compassionate Use Act. The Compassionate Use Act protects seriously ill patients from being prosecuted in state court for using marijuana when they have a doctor's approval. The protections apply only to state court prosecutions and not to criminal prosecutions in federal court. Federal drug laws do not allow an exception for California's medical marijuana law."

Conviction Upheld In Marijuana Case. In Santa Ana, the AP (11/28) reports an Orange County man's felony conviction for "transporting marijuana was upheld Monday by the California Supreme Court despite its ruling that later law allowing a medical marijuana defense for transportation applies retroactively. The decision in the case of Shaun Eric Wright, 43, resolves an important question regarding the Medical Marijuana Program, legislation adopted in 2004 to promote the implementation of Proposition 215 that in 1996 legalized marijuana for medicinal use, Nathan Barankin of the state Attorney General's office said. That question, Barankin said, is whether the law applies retroactively 'and it does resolve that issue for state law purposes.'"

Court Ruling In Marijuana Case Seen As Legally Correct, Morally Wrong. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/27) editorialized, "The Washington [State] Supreme Court, for hardly the first time in judicial history, has rendered a ruling that is at the same time legally correct and morally wrong. Yes, as the court ruled Thursday, state law enacted by the 1998 passage of Initiative 692 does require that anyone mounting a 'compassionate use' defense in a marijuana-related crime must meet specific criteria. And, yes, Sharon Lee Tracy failed that test. … Where the cops and courts failed, lawmakers can succeed, by rewriting the law to recognize medical marijuana prescriptions from any licensed physician."

FDA Issues Methadone Advisory. The AP (11/27) reported people "starting treatment with methadone have died and suffered life-threatening side effects, health officials said Monday in warning of the dangers of overdosing on the painkiller. Overdoses of the increasingly popular narcotic can cause slow or shallow breathing and dangerous changes in heart beat that patients might not feel, the Food and Drug Administration said. … The FDA warned that methadone only provides pain relief for four to eight hours, but can linger in the body for eight to 59 hours. That can lead patients to take more of the drug before it has been eliminated by the body, causing the drug to build up in the body to toxic levels, the FDA said."

The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (11/27) reported the FDA "has issued a health advisory for methadone after it reviewed reports of death and life-threatening side effects in patients taking the pain drug, the agency said Monday. … According to the advisory, posted on the FDA's Web site, methadone can cause slow or shallow breathing and 'dangerous changes in heart beat that may not be felt by the patient.' In addition, accidental overdose could happen because the substance stays in the body for more than eight hours, when pain relief from a dose lasts about four to eight hours."

Afghanistan's Anti-Drug Efforts Said To Be Ruined By Corruption. The Financial Times (11/28, Morarjee) reports, "Afghanistan's war on drugs has been marred by corruption that has strengthened the grip of an increasingly powerful mafia on the country's narcotics trade, a report by the World Bank and United Nations said. Over the past five years, the British-led counter-narcotics strategy had penalised the country's poorest farmers and strengthened networks of organised crime, consolidating the trade among a tiny elite of traffickers, the damning report said." The report claimed that the Afghan interior ministry had been "captured" by traffickers. The Financial Times continues, "To achieve long-term success in the battle against drugs eradication, the report found that efforts should be concentrated in the six Afghan provinces where there was relatively little opium cultivation to build up a line of defence against the spread of the trade. ... Even in this record year, opium took up less than 4 per cent of the total cultivated area in Afghanistan, with only an estimated 13 per cent of the population involved in poppy cultivation, which the report said was cause for hope."

The Financial Times (11/27, Burns, Morarjee) also reported Afghan government plans to "eradicate poppy farming in southern Afghanistan risk drawing British troops into fierce fighting with an already embittered local population, military officials and diplomats in the country have warned. The governor of Helmand has promised to push ahead with a drug eradication program early in the new year in the southern province where British troops faced unexpectedly fierce battles during the summer."

USA Today (11/28, Leinwand) says the report, "released today, is the latest indication of the difficulties faced by the British-led effort to eradicate Afghanistan's opium crop, which drives the economy in parts of the embattled nation and has helped to fund a resurgence of the Taliban. The report says the production of opium, whose poppies are used to make heroin, permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades."

Officials Search For Cause Of Fatal Missouri Group Home Fire. The AP (11/28, Kabel) reports from Anderson, MO, "An early morning fire broke out in a group home for the elderly and mentally ill Monday, killing 10 people and injuring two dozen others in a blaze that the governor said was being treated as a crime." The AP continues, The blaze reduced the privately run Anderson Guest House to a skeleton of cinder blocks and stunned this rural community of about 1,800 people tucked in the Ozark hills of southwest Missouri. … Gov. Matt Blunt said investigators were treating the fire as suspicious. … 'We're not saying it is definitely a crime scene, but we are treating it as if it is and trying to determine if the fire was set by somebody who had a nefarious motive,' Blunt said." The AP adds, "The home had 32 residents and two employees inside when the fire was reported around 1 a.m. The dead ranged in age from early 20s to elderly. Another 18 people were taken to hospitals, and six were treated at the scene, authorities said. … One of the dead was a worker in the home, and the other nine were residents, Blunt said. Authorities did not plan to release names until Tuesday because relatives of two victims haven't yet been notified. … Officials refused to say how the victims died or whether they had any warning. The home had fire alarms but no sprinklers."

Marshals To Help Track Maine Sex Offenders. The AP (11/28) reports, "The federal government will soon get involved in tracking down sex offenders in Maine who avoid registering with police." The AP continues, "The U.S. Marshals Service in Maine is being trained in the new responsibilities as part of a federal sex offender law passed in July, said John Cooper, the chief deputy U.S. marshal for Maine." The AP adds, "The new law creates a national sex offender database to allow law enforcement and communities to know where convicted sex offenders live and work. It gives the Marshals Service the task of tracking down offenders who dodge their obligations. … 'We have resources and databases that local agencies don't have,' Cooper said." The AP notes, "Maine and other states in recent years have created registries that list people convicted of certain types of sex crimes. The registries are viewed as informational and safety tools for police and the public. .. .But officials say there are a number of weaknesses in the system. … In Maine, failing to register with local police or the state is a crime, but only a misdemeanor that hasn't been listed on national databases that alert police to people who are wanted in other states. … Police say another weakness in the system is figuring out who should take the lead in searching for a sex offender who fails to register or report to police as required."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Communities Cool To Planned Fence. USA Today (11/28, Johnson, 2.27M) reports "ranching magnate Bill Moody" would "seem to be the type of person who would embrace the federal government's most provocative effort to stop illegals from entering this country: A plan to build 700 miles of fence along the 2,100-mile Southwest border, including Moody's land. Instead, Moody is a powerful voice in a growing alliance of border landowners and local law enforcement officials who oppose a fence." Most "everyone here agrees that more border security is needed to curb illegal immigration. Ranchers such as Moody and Dob Cunningham, who has a 700-acre spread north of here with 2 miles of river frontage, say they often give Border Patrol agents access to their land to help the agents track down illegals." But the "fence plan — the centerpiece of an immigration bill President Bush signed last month — has come to reflect the disconnect between many landowners here and officials in Washington who see the project as a key part of the nation's strategy to slow illegal immigration. Here, where the impact of illegal immigration is greatest, the fence is widely viewed as an economic and environmental threat. In Eagle Pass, a city of 25,000 that is 95% Hispanic, it's also seen as a rejection of the region's tradition of shared cultures and open ranges."

Thompson Warns Firm Of Criminal Charges Over Illegal Immigrant Crackdown. The Washington Times (11/28, Seper, 88K) reports Rep. Bennie Thompson, "in line to become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee," has "warned the nation's largest uniform supplier it faces criminal charges if it follows a White House proposal to recheck workers with mismatched Social Security numbers and fire those who cannot resolve the discrepancy in 60 days." Thompson said "in a letter to Cintas Corp. it could be charged with 'illegal activities in violation of state and federal law' if any of its 32,000 employees are terminated because they gave incorrect Social Security numbers to be hired." Thompson said, "I am deeply troubled by Cintas' recent policy change regarding the Social Security Administration's 'no match' letters. It is my understanding that hundreds of Cintas' immigrant workers have received these letters. I am extremely concerned about any potentially discriminatory actions targeting this community."

Democrats' Conflict Over Immigration Expected To Surface. In a New York Times op-ed (11/28), Thomas Edsall says, "The success of candidates attacking outsourcing and trade agreements like Nafta, combined with high Democratic margins among economically pessimistic voters, clearly point to middle-class wage stagnation and growing inequality as significant factors in the election this month." But the "result has shifted the balance of power within the Democratic Party in favor of the protectionist wing, and especially in favor of such major unions as the Teamsters, the steelworkers and the autoworkers, all key party supporters with money and manpower." The "strengthening of the Democrats' protectionist wing is virtually certain to force to the surface a second, and closely related, internal conflict between the party's pro- and anti-immigration wings. This conflict among Democrats remained submerged while President Bush and the Republican House and Senate majorities fought without resolution over the same issue."

Biden Blames Mexico's "Corrupt System" For Illegal Immigration, Drug Problems. The AP (11/28) reports Sen. Joe Biden "wants to get tough with Mexico, calling it an 'erstwhile democracy' with a 'corrupt system' responsible for illegal immigration and drug problems in the U.S. Biden, D-Del., was in Columbia [South Carolina] on Monday in his first post-election trip to this first-in-the-South presidential primary state as he continues to line up support for his presidential bid. … An even bigger problem are illegal drugs 'coming up through corrupt Mexico,' he said. 'People are driving across that border with tons, tons -- hear me -- tons of everything from byproducts for methamphetamines, to cocaine, to heroin.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Gates Likely To Start As Defense Secretary Before End Of Year. The AP (11/28, Burns) reports officials said Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates "is likely to assume the Pentagon post before year's end if he is confirmed by the Senate as expected." Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff "said Gates will have his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee early next week, with a vote expected by the full Senate by Dec. 12 or 13." Ruff added that in "preparation for the hearing, Gates is receiving a series of briefings by senior Pentagon officials." Even if Gates "is confirmed as expected, it is unclear when he would be sworn in to his new duties, Ruff said." The AP adds another Administration official, "who would discuss the Gates matter only on condition of anonymity, said that if confirmation goes as expected, then Gates would be sworn in well before the end of the year. No date is set."

Carter Expects Gates To Be Confirmed. Former President Jimmy Carter on CNN's Larry King Live (11/27) was asked whether Robert Gates would be an improvement over Secretary Rumsfeld. Carter said that Gates "was in the intelligence agency working for the Stansfield Turner when I was president. Stansfield Turner thought a lot of him. Everything everybody who has worked with him since that time have had accolades for him. I think he's certainly going to be an improvement and I think the nation is going to give him full support and I would presume the Congress will approve his appointment without any hesitation."

Missile Defense Makes Advances, But Undermined By Technical Glitches. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A1, Karp, 2.04M) reports that under President Bush, "the US has poured nearly $50 billion into" the missile defense program. The Pentagon "says it has put the system on alert more than 10 times and the US already has a 'limited' ability to shoot down enemy warheads. Yet the program's high-tech breakthroughs are at times undermined by technical snafus, and real missile defense always seems off in the future." A "big step forward came in September, when U.S. military personnel using satellite sensors, radar and long-range interceptor missiles that are part of the real missile shield shot down a test warhead in space over the Pacific. The success went some way toward answering critics in Congress who have demanded tests that resemble real-world situations." For "defense contractors and the Pentagon, which is spending $9.3 billion this year on missile defense, the September test was a vindication." Critics "nowadays generally concede the feasibility of knocking missiles out of the sky. But many believe the idea is either too expensive or too error-prone to make it worth rushing into operation." The Journal also examines the potential and problems of the SBX, or sea based X-band radar, that would be a vital link in the system."

Portman Says Bush Prepared To Veto Spending Bills. The Washington Times (11/28, Dinan, 88K) reports Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman says President Bush "will try to work out a deal on spending with the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill, but will be prepared to veto bills that exceed his total budget or that slice away at defense needs." In an interview, Portman said, "With the Democrat leadership, we'll try to be transparent and we'll try to be clear in our concerns upfront, and I hope we can work things out without resorting to a veto. But if necessary we will resort to a veto." The Times adds Portman, "a former six-term congressman from Ohio, has assumed the role of go-between, making use of his relationships with many of the top lawmakers to find areas of cooperation on annual spending and on thorny issues such as Social Security." He has "spoken with incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate budget committees, and Sen. Max Baucus, who will head the Senate Finance Committee. He also has a meeting scheduled with Sen. Robert C. Byrd, the West Virginia Democrat who will head the Senate Appropriations Committee."

Government Contractors Face Stiffer Oversight Under Democratic Majority. The Washington Post (11/28, D1, Witte, Merle, 690K) reports that after "riding high for five years, government contractors are bracing themselves for increased oversight, tighter budgets and stepped-up regulations as Democrats take over on Capitol Hill and vow to keep a closer eye on how companies spend taxpayer dollars." While all companies that do "business with the government could feel the impact, but contractors that benefited most from work in Iraq and Afghanistan, from homeland security initiatives or from Hurricane Katrina are especially likely to be under the microscope. Big-ticket weapons programs are also expected to garner special attention, and it may become more difficult to get a no-bid contract, according to industry observers." In "a 44-page look at areas in need of oversight," Government Accountability Office investigators "focused substantial attention on contractors. The government spent $388 billion on contracts last year, the GAO said, and much of that money is exposed to 'potential waste and misuse' because of the way the government buys goods and services." Meanwhile, "in September, the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group, began holding seminars for Hill workers of both parties on how to conduct investigations, including sessions on the anatomy of a government contract and skits in which oversight hearings were acted out."

Watchdog Group Wants Investigation Of Hastert Over Prairie Parkway. The Chicago Tribune (11/28, Parsons, 617K) reports a government watchdog group "called for an official investigation into whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert broke the law by pushing for federal funding of a highway project near land he owned west of Chicago." Hastert (R-Ill.) and "two partners turned a profit of more than $3 million last year on land they bought and sold near the proposed route of the Prairie Parkway -- earnings that the group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington say the investors got because of federal funding pushed by Hastert. The group is asking the Justice Department to investigate Hastert's actions."

Hastings May Drop Bid For Intel Panel Chair After Tuesday Meeting With Pelosi. FOX News (11/27) reported on its website, "House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi will meet Tuesday with Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings, and those with knowledge of Pelosi's thinking told FOX News that Hastings will be told he is not going to be the next chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. Though no formal decisions have been announced and Pelosi aides say the situation remains fluid, they suggest that the meeting at Pelosi's Capitol Hill office was requested by Hastings so he could bow out of the race before Pelosi denies him the job. 'He knows he's not going to get it,' said one senior House Democratic aide. 'The question is why he didn't bow out long ago.'" In remarks "over the weekend, Hastings left the impression he was resigned to not receiving the chairmanship from Pelosi, due in large measure to his impeachment from the federal bench in 1989 for conspiring to accept a bribe…and then, according to the Senate impeachment trial, lying to cover it up. Pelosi aides have been scrutinizing the House and Senate proceedings in the Hastings impeachment, FOX News has learned, and apparently don't like what they have seen. 'It's ugly,' said one Pelosi aide. 'It's just really, really bad.'"

Hastings' Former Attorney Defends His Suitability. In a column appearing in the Washington Post (11/28, A19, 690K), Terence J. Anderson, the lawyer who represented Rep. Alcee Hastings when he was a judge, including during Hastings' impeachment proceedings, opines, "Ruth Marcus…and others have argued, however, that Hastings should not be appointed chairman" of the House Intelligence Committee "because of the Senate's decision 17 years ago to remove him from the federal bench. Such arguments ignore important facts that should be considered before the next speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, decides on the chairmanship." He enumerates three arguments: "First, no 'jury' that heard and considered all the evidence has been convinced that Hastings was guilty. … Second, in any fair view, perceived political necessity was a significant, perhaps decisive, factor in the decision to remove Hastings from the bench. … Third, senators who had not heard the evidence filed statements that make it clear that some voted for removal not because they were convinced Hastings was guilty but because they believed he had not proven his innocence."

Bush Approval Falls To 31% In Harris Interactive Poll. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M) reports President Bush's approval ratings "fell to the second-lowest of his presidency, according to a new Harris Interactive poll." The telephone survey, conducted over November 17 and November 21, shows "31% of U.S. adults called Mr. Bush's job performance 'excellent' or 'good' -- down from 34% who gave a positive assessment in a late-October poll; 67% said his performance is only "fair" or "poor," up from 63% in the previous survey2." Despite the "recent changes in Congress, Republicans and Democrats continued to receive low marks. Thirty-six percent of respondents said Democrats are doing an 'excellent' or 'good' job, better than the 29% in September. Democrats' highest positive rating was 68% in October 2001, a month after the 9/11 attacks. Meanwhile, Republicans' approval rating remained unchanged from September at 24%, and also well below their October 2001 high of 67%."

Hall First Professional Musician Elected To Congress. The Washington Post (11/28, C1, Segal, 690K) profiles Orleans band member and Democratic Rep.-elect John Hall, whose "singular place in American history" is that he is "the first professional rock musician elected to Congress. No, we're not counting Sonny Bono, because he didn't play an instrument, at least not onstage." Today, Hall "would blend in at a board meeting of any Fortune 500 company -- he is tall and serious and pretty formal. He actually sounds like a politician, too: He can speechify in that earnest and somewhat tedious way that only politicians can. No offense, but you've never met anyone who toggles so quickly between gripping anecdote and soporific spiel. … Frankly, he'd rather talk up his slate of left-leaning goals, such as raising the minimum wage, weaning the nation off fossil fuels or pushing for universal health care."

WSJournal Praises DeMint, Coburn For Blocking Earmarks. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M), in an editorial, praises "GOP Doctors, er, Senators Jim DeMint (South Carolina) and Tom Coburn (Oklahoma)," who have "been staging an intervention so their colleagues don't risk another overdose before they ride off into the minority." The "two rebel Senators…rallied enough of their mates to block any omnibus bill containing earmarks. The result is that the GOP Senate may return next week for its final lame duck days and instead pass a 'continuing resolution' that would fund the government at 2006 levels, kicking 2007 decisions over to the Democratic majority in January. By Mr. Coburn's estimate, taxpayers would save about $17 billion if Congress takes this approach."

Stock Markets Fall On Weak Dollar, Slow Retail Sales. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Hamilton, 850K) reports the stock markets "fell sharply on Monday, with a weakening U.S. dollar and tepid sales at retail giant Wal-Mart Stores giving investors the opening they were looking for to cash out some of the profits they've booked during the market's four-month surge." The Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500 index "each sank more than 1% for the first time since July 13." Investment pros "said the decline was not surprising given Wall Street's strength this year, especially through its seasonally weak period in September and October. They attributed the sell-off largely to profit taking by big institutional investors that are sitting on sizable recent gains." The Dow "sank 158.46 points, or 1.3%, to 12121.71, its biggest decline since a 1.5% slide on July 13. The S&P 500 was off 19.05 points, or 1.4%, to 1381.90. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index skidded 2.21%, tumbling 54.34 points to 2405.92."

NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Adding to a big downdraft on wall street some analysts were linking to a disappointing sales estimate by Wal-Mart." The Dow was down more than a 158 points [to close at 12,121.71]. NASDAQ took a hit as well fell nearly 54 points [to close at 2,405.92]. The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 5, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Wall Street hasn't seen a day as bad as this one in months."

The New York Times (11/28, Peters, 1.16M) reports, "It was a day with little for investors to cheer, with the dollar continuing its slide against the euro and the price of a barrel of oil rising." The "decline on Wall Street spoiled what had been a steady run-up in stock prices in recent weeks." Some of "the steepest losses came in the shares of retailers like Wal-Mart, whose troubles reverberated throughout the stock market. The world's largest retailer reported Saturday that its sales in November fell for the first time in 10 years. Despite signs that retailers on average fared well during the first weekend of the holiday shopping crunch, the poor results from Wal-Mart raised questions about how much consumers will spend this season."

The Washington Post (11/28, D5, Brubaker, 690K) also cites "higher oil prices, a weakening dollar and an unexpectedly glum sales forecast from Wal-Mart." Yesterday's "stock sell-off also was driven by a 1.8 percent jump in crude-oil futures, fueled by reports that Saudi Arabia's oil minister may support a cutback in production at the next meeting of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries Light sweet crude for January delivery gained $1.08 to settle at $60.32 a barrel."

USA Today (11/28, Shell, 2.27M) reports some Wall Street strategists "said the 158.46-point drop to 12,121.71 suffered by the Dow Jones industrial average was long overdue given the Dow's uninterrupted run-up in recent weeks." Rod Smyth, investment strategist at Wachovia Securities, said, "It was simply a much-needed correction. I genuinely believe this (selling) has been building." USA adds, "Still, the broad market sell-off, which resulted in sizable losses for virtually every type of stock — blue chips, technology names and both large- and small-capitalization stocks — grabbed the attention of a complacent Wall Street caught up in Dow fever."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, C1, McKay, Hudson, 2.04M) also reports, "Some Wall Street pros also said the stock market was due for a pullback, following more than a month of fresh records and last week's holiday-shortened trading." Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research in Chicago, "still figures the market is generally headed higher through the end of the year. But he said stocks were probably due for a short-term drop, considering that the S&P 500 hasn't had a decline of 2% from a high since mid-July." Bianco said, "This is the longest period without a 2% correction in 20 years. It just shows you how strong the market has been that we have to think in these terms now."

Sales Up 3.5% For Black Friday. ABC World News (11/27, story 8, 0:36, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, 'This Monday after the long Thanksgiving break, millions returned to work and promptly got busy shopping online. On this Cyber Monday, as it's known, an estimated 61 million people would buy something over the Internet. As for Black Friday and weekend, customers shelled out almost $15 billion at traditional stores, up about 3.5% from the same Friday and Saturday last year. Still the nation's largest retailer, Wal-Mart, says its November sales will be down."

NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 9, 2:10, Quintanilla, 9.87M) reported, "Retailers slashed prices to draw in shoppers, and they got them. 140 million spending $9 billion on Friday alone. At this retail resort near Denver Tracy Snow and her two girls braved the crowds and spent $400. Their budget this year is tight." There are "concerns about the health of the American consumer. Holiday central survey released today found only one in five shoppers will spend more than they did last year."

The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 6, 0:40, Bowers, 7.66M) reported, "After last week's Black Friday in stores like these, now it's on to the Internet and Cyber Monday. 60 million of us are expected to shop online today, that's 20% of the population. But experts say everyday has become Cyber Monday." Kurt Peters, Internet Retailer: "People are shopping online all the time. They're not waiting to get to the office on the Monday after Thanksgiving to start their Christmas shopping." Bowers: "Estimates are this year's online sales will be up 24% to $24 billion. Retailers used to think online shopping would hurt in-store sales. Now the message is ignore the Internet at your own peril."

Housing Market Slowdown Not Putting Crimp In Holiday Spending. USA Today (11/28, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports the "sharp slowdown in the housing market isn't darkening consumers' moods as feared, suggesting they will continue to be a source of strength in the economy through this year and possibly into 2007." Results from the "first few days of the key holiday shopping season point to increases in retail sales from a year ago, despite a mediocre performance at Wal-Mart, the nation's largest retailer." With consumer spending "accounting for more than two-thirds of U.S. economic activity, spending gains are good news for the broad economy as it faces a number of headwinds, including the housing slowdown and turmoil in the automobile industry."

Massachusetts To Sue Big Dig Firms For Negligence In Deadly Collapse. The Wall Street Journal/AP (11/28, A6) reports, "Massachusetts is preparing a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against the companies that worked on the Big Dig highway tunnel project, alleging their negligence led to the ceiling collapse that killed a woman, a spokesman said Monday." The AP continues, "Attorney General Tom Reilly is seeking unspecified damages for repairs, loss of tunnel use and toll revenue and other economic factors, spokesman David Guarino confirmed Monday. The lawsuit was to be filed Monday or Tuesday, he said. … 'This lawsuit is more than just about money, although we will be seeking monetary damages,' Mr. Reilly told a local radio station earlier Monday. 'What this case is has always been about is the tragic death of Milena Del Valle. That could have been any one of us.'" The AP adds, "The lawsuit, to be filed in Suffolk Superior Court, alleges project manager Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff and Modern Continental Construction Co. were 'grossly negligent' in constructing the ceiling that collapsed. The suit also names Gannett Fleming, the firm that designed the I-90 connector tunnel; as well as companies that supplied the epoxy or ceiling bolts used to hold up ceiling panels. … Four of the concrete panels, each weighing about three tons, fell on a car in which Del Valle, a 38-year-old from Boston, was a passenger July 10. Gannett Fleming also is being sued for breach of contract, Mr. Guarino said."

NCSL Report Calls For States, Colleges To Focus On Cost And Graduation Rates. The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, Arnoldy) reports the National Conference of State Legislatures found that "for every 100 ninth graders, only 18 will enter college and finish within six years." That is "not good enough" according to the report. It calls for "higher education and the states that oversee much of the system…to tackle spiraling tuition, poor college preparation, and the lack of help to keep students moving toward a degree." The report focuses on "the ballooning price of a bachelor's degree." It notes that "reducing the student-loan rate is an 'early action' item on the agenda for the Democratic-controlled Congress." Furthermore, "graduation rates for those who start college are finally inching up after years of setbacks." But it is "taking students a longer time on average to complete degrees, and the process is saddling them with more and more debt."

USA Today (11/28) reports the NCSL "agrees with most of the points raised by a national commission created by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings" with "one major exception: It says states, not the federal government, must be at the center of a nationwide higher-education reform movement." States "spend $70 billion a year on higher education and provide more funding and regulation of colleges and universities than any other level of government."

Recounts Start In Three House Races. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, A2) reports Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) "won reelection Monday by a margin so slim that a recount will be required." Unofficial results "announced by Franklin County, the last to finish counting absentee and provisional ballots in central Ohio's 15th District, showed Pryce led Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy by 1,055 votes, or 0.4 percent of the vote. An automatic recount is triggered if the difference between the two candidates is less than 0.5 percent." Meanwhile, in North Carolina, "election officials said a manual recount of randomly chosen precincts will take place Wednesday and Thursday in the 8th District race between Rep. Robin Hayes (R) and Democrat Larry Kissell. Hayes leads by 329 votes." Florida officials will "start an audit Tuesday of electronic voting machines in the 13th District House race between Democrat Christine Jennings and Republican Vern Buchanan. The state certified Buchanan the winner by 369 votes, but Jennings contested, arguing that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned."

In Fourth Race, Bonilla Faces Rodriguez In Run-Off. The New York Times (11/28, Zernike, 1.16M) reports, "Forget recounts; in Texas, there is an actual campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0098698

Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla "faces a runoff on Dec. 12 after failing to gain a majority of votes on Election Day." Bonilla "won 48.6 percent of the vote. His opponent, Ciro Rodriguez, led a field of six Democrats with 19.9 percent."

Giuliani, Obama, McCain Top Poll Rating Of National Leaders. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, Christoffersen) reports Americans "have the warmest feelings about former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, according to a poll released Monday that scores the popularity of national leaders." The Quinnipiac University "thermometer reading," which was "taken the week after the Nov. 7 election, asked voters to rate their feelings for 20 leaders on a scale of 0 to 100. Giuliani, a Republican weighing a presidential bid in 2008, scored the highest at 64.2. Obama and McCain, who are also considering a 2008 campaign, finished next at 58.8 and 57.7." President Bush "was 15th out of 20 while his secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, was fourth and former President Clinton fifth." New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "scored ninth of the 20 leaders with a score of 49," while Sen. John Kerry, "who was roundly criticized before the election for suggesting that students who don't study could end up stuck in Iraq, came in last at 39.6." Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi, "in line to become the next House Speaker, improved her standing, moving from last to 12th in a few weeks. The next Senate Majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid, was 19th."

The Washington Times (11/28, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Quinnipiac assistant poll director Peter A. Brown said, "As we enter the presidential campaign of 2008, Giuliani and McCain are in enviable positions. They are well-regarded, and most Americans are quite familiar with them. Obama's showing is impressive, but 4 in 10 Americans still don't know enough about him to have an opinion." The Times adds, "Despite concerns that his liberal views on social issues will hurt him with Republican primary voters, Mr. Giuliani continues to lead the field in nearly every publicly released presidential poll."

Dionne Says GOP Alienated Moderate Voters. In his column in the Washington Post (11/28, A19, 690K), E.J. Dionne writes, "This fall's election defeat was inglorious for Republicans because it ratified Nixon's original worries about the cost of chasing away the GOP's moderates and revealed that the Barry Goldwater-Ronald Reagan political settlement has expired. You wouldn't know that listening to Republican congressional leaders who still think all will be well if the party just hugs the old conservative faith a little harder." Dionne cites Republicans' "new problems," including: "The party's credibility on national security has been shattered by the failure of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq." He also writes, "Pro-market libertarians and pro-family social conservatives are more aware than ever that their respective values and interests do not coincide."

Effort To Build Grassroots Internet Alternative Party Examined. In a USA Today op-ed (11/28), Don Campbell, a lecturer in journalism at Emory University, says, "I have a strong stomach, but the partisanship and political slander that in the past decade have come to characterize virtually every utterance have driven me to become nauseated almost every time a Washington politician appears on my TV screen. I had given up hope and interest in politics until I recently had conversations with two old political hands whose judgment I still respect. Hamilton Jordan, who masterminded Democrat Jimmy Carter's underdog campaign for the White House in 1976, and Douglas Bailey, the veteran Republican consultant and co-founder of the daily online news briefing The Hotline, have teamed up to lead a grassroots movement that promises an alternative to the partisanship that has polarized Washington. The objective of their movement, called Unity08 (www.unity08.com), is to use Internet balloting to forge an independent national ticket for 2008 in which the presidential nominee is from one major party and his or her running mate is from the other major party. Anyone can form a ticket and run, and the organizers hope eventually to attract some recognizable names."

Moved-Up South Carolina Primary Scrambles Democrats' Campaign Patterns. The New York Times (11/28, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports four days "after the midterm elections, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, a former Democratic presidential nominee vying to play that role again, flew to Greenville, S.C." Kerry's 2004 running mate, former Sen. John Edwards, "appeared in Columbia, S.C., the next weekend. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware addressed about 200 people yesterday at a Rotary Club in Columbia. And Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa had plans to swing through South Carolina early next week after appearing in Nevada as he introduces himself to voters as a presidential candidate." Though the candidates are not "writing off Iowa and New Hampshire," the Democratic Party's "decision to shuffle its presidential primary schedule, so that Nevada's caucus closely follows Iowa's and South Carolina gets a primary week of its own after New Hampshire's, is changing the early rituals of campaigning, forcing contenders to extend themselves in more states."

Gillespie Seen As Likely To Take Reins Of Virginia GOP. The Washington Times (11/28, McLaughlin, 88K) reports, "Virginia Republicans say they expect Ed Gillespie, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, to be named the new head of the state party. … Republicans yesterday told The Times that Mr. Gillespie's election appears imminent now that the other front-runners for the spot -- former Lt. Gov. John H. Hager and Chuck Smith, chairman of Virginia Beach's Republican Party -- dropped out of the race last week in a telephone conference call with the state executive committee." The election "is scheduled for this weekend at the 23rd annual Donald W. Huffman Advance at the Homestead Resort in Hot Springs -- a Republican retreat where grass-roots activists and elected officials kick off the 2007 state legislative campaign season."

Supreme Court Declines Maine School Choice Case. The AP (11/28, Yost) reports the Supreme Court "decided Monday not to plunge into the issue of school choice, passing up a dispute over a Maine law that bars the use of public funds to send students to private religious schools." The conservative Institute for Justice "had asked the justices to take the case. The group is representing eight Maine families who would receive public tuition funds but for the fact that their children attend religious schools." Florida Gov. Jeb Bush "and President Bush's home state of Texas had weighed in, saying in filings to the Supreme Court that Maine is unconstitutionally discriminating against religion."

Public Funding For Stem Cell Research Seen As Counter-Productive. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (11/28, 850K) Sigrid Fry-Revere, director of bioethics studies at the Cato Institute, writes, "Politicians are right that stem cells hold the promise of incredible medical progress. But we won't achieve the promised results if we insist on public funding of the research. In fact, government-funded research has proved bureaucratic, expensive, wasteful, fickle and divisive. Since 2003, five states — Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey, Connecticut and California — have pledged billions of dollars to support stem cell research. But political opposition has prevented all but a few million dollars from reaching researchers. … Religious and taxpayer groups lost a first round in court, but their appeals, or any other state attempts to fund stem cell research, are likely to be tied up in court for at least another year."

WSJournal Criticizes Kennedy For Oil Alliance With Chavez. In an editorial (11/28), the Wall Street Journal says, "Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez is an ally of the Iranian mullahs, a supporter of North Korea, a close friend of Fidel Castro and a good customer for Vladimir Putin's weapon factories. Now he's also a business partner of Joseph P. Kennedy II." Kennedy, the former Democratic congressman, "describes the deal he's cooked up with Mr. Chávez as charity for low-income consumers of heating oil. But it's worth asking what the price of this largesse is to Venezuelans and to U.S. security interests." Chávez's "Citgo -- a Houston-based oil company owned by the Venezuelan government -- is supplying home heating oil to Mr. Kennedy's Citizens Energy Corporation at a 40% discount. Citizens, a nonprofit outfit, says it passes the savings onto the poor, aiming to help 400,000 homes in 16 states that would otherwise have trouble heating their homes. In the process, Mr. Kennedy happens to get a high-profile publicity plug. If you think you qualify, says the television ad that drew our attention to this partnership, just dial 1-877-Joe-4-Oil." Chávez is "trying to shape U.S. public opinion in the hope that more gringos will come to see the Chávez government as benevolent. Massachusetts Democrats seem especially eager to help."

Olmert Offers Palestinians Peace Incentives. ABC World News (11/27, story 3, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "reached out to the Palestinians today offering a package of incentives to stop the violence there. He promised to reduce check points, release frozen Palestinian funds and free prisoners, in exchange for a serious push for peace. It was the most conciliatory gesture yet by Olmert, but the Palestinian cabinet led by Hamas militants accused him of posturing." The New York Times (11/28, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the offer was made "in what was billed as a major policy speech, but it contained little that was new." However, the timing was "important, though, because Mr. Olmert and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, are eager to bolster their own political positions, begin a serious dialogue and stop a bloody cycle of violence." Separately, "expectations are high that Secretary…Rice may come here after Jordan to try to solidify the fragile attempt at reconciliation." The Times notes that one of the "new elements" in the Olmerts' speech was a suggestion that he "found parts of a 2002 Saudi peace initiative to be 'positive,' the first time an Israeli leader has done so."

The Financial Times (11/28, Devi) reports that Palestinians "welcomed the possibility of efforts to ease humanitarian conditions… But they still doubted Israel's intention to create a Palestinian state that is viable and settle thorny issues that remain at the heart of the conflict, such as the division of Jerusalem and refugees." The Times notes that Palestinian officials "said there was a possibility" of Abbas meeting Secretary Rice, while Israeli officials said "no talks between Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice and any Israeli officials were scheduled." The AP (11/28, Teibel) says Olmert's speech "raised the diplomatic stakes ahead of President Bush's scheduled trip to neighboring Jordan this week." Meanwhile, Palestinian official Saeb Erekat "said it was possible Abbas would meet with Bush there."

The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Boudreaux, 850K) calls the address "one of" Olmert's "most conciliatory speeches" and notes that the offer "was a switch for Olmert, who declared during his election campaign last spring that no Palestinian leader was capable of making a deal with Israel."

LATimes Urges Palestinians To Accept Olmert Offer. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/28, 850K) says if the Palestinian Authority -- including Hamas – "doesn't respond in kind" to Olmert's offer, "it will be yet another golden opportunity for Mideast peace squandered." The Times notes that Hamas is "not being asked to approve of the creation of Israel half a century ago, only to recognize that the modern Jewish state is a legal government endorsed by the United Nations and deserving of security." Although Yasser Arafat "dawdled and dissembled for years before finally accepting Israel's existence," the Times says his "belated accommodation to reality that led to a White House invitation for the erstwhile terrorist and the creation of the Palestinian Authority. If Hamas is willing to recognize the same fact of life, the benefits for the Palestinians could be even more dramatic."

Rice May Meet Separately With Olmert, Abbas. In an article on President Bush's visit to the Middle East this week, the New York Times (11/28, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "may add two stops -- Ramallah, in the West Bank, and Jerusalem --to her itinerary" in order to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. The Times says Rice "has argued in favor of stepping up work on the Israeli-Palestinian front, and several times this fall she has seemed to be on the verge of a major peace initiative, only to be overtaken by other crises."

The CBS Evening News (11/27, lead story, 2:15, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Arab countries want to see something from the United States if they're going to engage in lowering the temperature in Iraq. … So that's why you have State Department spokesmen saying that there's planning between Secretary Rice and Prime Minister Olmert as well as Palestinian President Abbas for possible meetings."

The AP (11/28, Gearan) reports Israeli officials "rejected the possibility of a summit between Abbas and Olmert on the sidelines of Bush's visit to neighboring Jordan later this week."

North Korean Nuclear Envoy Arrives In Beijing To Prepare For Talks. The AP (11/28, Ang) reports North Korea's nuclear envoy arrived in Beijing Tuesday "as his counterparts from the United States, China, South Korea and Japan gathered to hammer out plans to restart" the stalled six-party talks. The AP says the arrival of North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan has "heightened expectations he may meet" with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "although no plans have been announced." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said a meeting between Hill and Kim is "certainly an open possibility." Arriving in Beijing Monday, Hill said, "The issue for us is to make sure we are extremely well-planned and ready for the six-party talks, which we do anticipate will get going at some point very soon." Hill is expected to meet with representatives from Seoul and Tokyo today and Wednesday, but no multilateral talks have been scheduled, the AP reports.

Bush, Hu Discuss North Korea, Darfur. AFP (11/28) reports President Bush Monday spoke with Chinese President Hu Jintao on North Korea's nuclear program and developments in Sudan's Darfur region, a White House spokesman said. Bush spoke with Hu during his flight to the Baltics where he will attend a NATO summit. Bush asked for "continued Chinese leadership on various international issues such as the situation in North Korea and Darfur," said spokesman Gordon Johndroe. "The two presidents reviewed their good meeting in Hanoi on the margins of the APEC summit and agreed that US-China cooperation is moving forward well, to the benefit of both the American and Chinese people," he added.

Estonian President To Discuss Concerns Regarding Putin With Bush. The Washington Post (11/28, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "On the eve of the first visit to" Estonia "by a sitting US president, Estonia's new president [Toomas Hendrik Ilves] voiced concern Monday over the poisoning death of a prominent Kremlin critic in London, portraying it as another worrisome signal about the political situation in Russia. … His comments suggested that Bush will also be discussing growing concern in Europe and the United States over rising authoritarianism in Russia under President Vladimir Putin and his hostile relations with some of the new democracies on Russia's borders. Bush will participate in a round of meetings Tuesday morning with Ilves and other Estonian leaders before flying to Riga, Latvia, for the NATO summit. Ilves said he would be discussing Russia's difficult relations with some of its neighbors, especially Georgia, which he visited last week for consultations."

OECD Criticizes Russian Government's Economic Interference. The Financial Times (11/28, Ostrovsky) reports the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development "slammed the Russian government for its expansion into key economic sectors and raised concern about the 'seemingly insatiable appetite' of Gazprom, its state-run energy giant. In a critical report on the Russian economy, the OECD also said that the Kremlin's expansion into key economic areas was a 'disturbing trend' that 'bodes ill' for the country's growth. … 'The expansion of state ownership in important sectors will probably contribute to more rent-seeking, less efficiency and slower growth,' the OECD said."

US Urged To Regard Putin As An "Enemy." The Wall Street Journal's Bret Stephens (11/28) writes, "It's time we start thinking of Vladimir Putin's Russia as an enemy of the United States. … The foreign policy of Russia has become openly, and often gratuitously, hostile to the U.S." According to Stephens, "It was George W. Bush who first saw gold in Mr. Putin's soul, sometime after the Russian had decimated the city of Grozny. It was Condoleezza Rice who came up with the formulation after the Iraq war that the U.S. should 'punish France, ignore Germany and forgive Russia.' And it was this administration that agreed last week to Russian membership in the World Trade Organization, with Mr. Bush thanking Mr. Putin for 'your time and friendship.'"

US Visit Seen As Opportunity For Ukraine's Yanukovych. The Washington Post (11/28, Finn, 690K) reports Ukraine's so-called "Orange Revolution has been kindest to the man who played the villain to the waves of protesters who rolled onto the streets of this capital two years ago. Viktor Yanukovych, once cast as the bluff hack who tried to steal Ukraine's presidential election, is back in power as prime minister thanks to free and fair parliamentary elections in March that were made possible only by the street protests of late 2004. As he prepares for his first official trip to Washington, a four-day visit beginning Sunday, Yanukovych is suddenly projecting himself as the voice of democratic reform. He also appears eager to assure his White House hosts that his popular image as a pro-Russian straw man is a gross distortion. Now, he suggests that he, too, was a catalyst in the transformation of this once stagnating country into the most politically competitive of all the post-Soviet states, a nation where debate is dynamic and where power, ultimately, resides with the people."

Substance Used To Poison Litvinenko Not As Rare As Previously Thought. ABC World News (11/27, story 4, 2:31, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In London, potential clues surfaced in the radiation poisoning death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko." ABC added, "British investigators found traces of the radiation that killed Alexander Litvinenko in three more places the former Russian spy visited but still no real suspects in his poisoning. Just theories. One theory, the Russian security services, the FSB, acting on orders from the government or on their own. Another, President Vladimir Putin's enemies orchestrated the murder to embarrass him and more bizarrely, that Litvinenko killed himself." ABC notes polonium 210 "can be found in commercially-available photo equipment." Professor Peter Zimmerman, nuclear physicist: "It's a lot easier to get a lethal dose of polonium and to prepare it for administration than we thought on the weekend. I think there's a lot of people that could do this." The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 8, 0:50, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "So far, at least three people are being tested for radiation poisoning. They're all reporting some kind of illness. One word the police are not using is 'murder.' They are calling Litvinenko's death suspicious, but they also say they are not ruling anything in or out."

Radiation Reportedly Detected At Berezovsky's Office. The New York Times (11/28, Lyall, 1.16M) reports, "Four days after Mr. Litvinenko died…the police do not seem any closer to solving the mystery of how he was poisoned. … The BBC reported that radiation had been detected in a West End office building and at a building in Mayfair. [Wire services and the Tuesday Guardian cited various sources as saying that one of the buildings included the office of Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian tycoon, who had a long association with Mr. Litvinenko, and the Guardian said, citing anonymous sources, that traces had been found there.]" The Washington Post (11/28, Sullivan, 690K) reports Berezovsky "said in a telephone interview last week that he visited Litvinenko in the hospital during his illness and said Litvinenko told him he had 'no doubt' that he had been poisoned on the 'order from President Putin to kill him.'" The Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (11/28, A19) writes, "every once in a while, an episode such as the death of Alexander Litvinenko comes along to boost the morale of conspiracy theorists -- and remind the rest of us that there does exist a secret world full of characters and plotlines so bizarre and implausible that the bard of betrayal, novelist John le Carre, would be embarrassed to write them."

Thousands Protest Pope's Trip To Turkey. ABC World News (11/27, story 5, 1:43, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "an extraordinary security mobilization is under way in Turkey tonight ahead of the Pope's four-day visit, beginning tomorrow. … The Vatican is so worried about hostile crowds that Benedict won't be using the Popemobile at all this trip. Instead, he'll ride in more heavily armored cars with several decoys. Beneath his papal cassock he may be wearing a bullet-proof vest. He embarks on his first papal trip to a Muslim country Benedict expressed respect and esteem friendship for the Turkish people. But thousands in Istanbul don't share that goodwill. Their banners said 'Pope Don't Come.'"

Pope's Visit Said To Expose Instability Of Turkey's Secular Society. The New York Times (11/28, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "A short 24 hours before a visit by Pope Benedict XVI to this Muslim country, its prime minister finally agreed to meet him publicly. The venue: the airport, on the Turkish leader's way out of town. The elaborate, last-minute choreography pointed to the deep divide that has festered within Turkish society since the foundation of the modern state. … The pope's visit, which begins Tuesday, falls squarely on that sensitive fault line and has brought into stark relief a slow but steady shift: Turkey is feeling its Muslim identity more and more. The trend worries secular Turkish politicians, who believe the state's central tenet is under threat."

Impasse Over Cyprus Stalls Turkey EU Bid. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A4, 2.04M) reports, "A failure to get a deal on Cyprus will lead to at least a two- to three-year pause in Turkey's negotiations to enter the European Union, analysts, officials and business leaders say. … Negotiations in Helsinki over Cyprus between Turkey and the EU collapsed yesterday. The EU had demanded Turkey open its ports to trade with the Greek-speaking part of Cyprus. Turkey had demanded that the EU open its borders to trade with Turkish-speaking Northern Cyprus."

Author Discusses Turkey EU Bid, Pope Visit. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/28, A14, 2.04M) Hugh Pope, author of "Sons of the Conquerors: The Rise of the Turkic World," writes, "If the much-bruised Turks agonize long and loud about when they'll ever be accepted as Europeans, the Europeans seem willfully blind to the Turks. Another crisis looms in the long-running negotiations over Turkey's possible membership of the European Union, this time over the conveniently distracting issue of access to Turkish ports for Cypriot ships. Meanwhile the reigning pope, who wants to reclaim Europe for Christianity to the exclusion of the Turks, today touches down in this Muslim land."

Activist Who Exposed Forced Abortions In China Subjected To Second Trial. The New York Times (11/28, Kahn, 1.16M) reports, "A Chinese legal expert who exposed abuses in the country's population control policies began a rare second trial on Monday, but his lawyers accused local authorities of preventing them from mounting a vigorous defense. The legal expert, Chen Guangcheng, was sentenced in August to four years and three months…for destroying property and organizing a mob to disrupt traffic. A higher court later quashed the verdict and ordered a new trial, which some supporters of Mr. Chen cited as an important breakthrough for China's Communist Party-run judicial system. But the first day of the new trial, held in the same county court, ended in acrimony. Several of Mr. Chen's most important witnesses were prevented from attending the hearing by thugs who had the backing of local officials, his lawyers said, and the judges in the case declined to grant a defense request to delay the trial." The Washington Post (11/28, Fan, 690K) reports, "The retrial of a blind legal activist kicked off in eastern Shandong province Monday, but not without some of the same courtroom tumult that characterized his first trial, which was widely denounced by human rights advocates, lawyers said. … Chen "highlighted abuses in family planning programs around Linyi. … Officials, whose promotions depended on not exceeding birth quotas, had forced thousands of men and women to have abortions and sterilizations, often conducting midnight raids and beating or holding residents hostage until they complied."

Rebels Attack Darfur Oil Field. The AP (11/28, De Montesquiou) reports, "Darfur rebels attacked an oil field in a rare extension of their campaign east toward the Sudanese capital and said Monday the military garrison guarding the field had surrendered. But the government said its forces repelled the assault and were in full control of the Abu Jabra oil field Monday. The attack on the field on the edge of South Darfur appeared to be another sign that Darfur's violence was spreading across the region. … A Sudanese official in the oil industry said Abu Jabra's capacity had been damaged in the attack, but insisted it would not affect overall production. The state-owned facility pumps up to 10,000 barrels per day — a relatively small output."

UN Facilities In Chad Looted. The AP (11/27, Faul) reports, "With gunfire sounding in the distance, workers took stock Monday of looted U.N. warehouses and government offices in this town in eastern Chad, the latest victim of unrest that started in Sudan's Darfur region and has spread across a swath of Africa. Chadian rebels who have bases in Darfur seized this hub for humanitarian workers Saturday, and government forces retook it Sunday. Amid the upheaval, looters pillaged some $1.5 million in U.N. aid and carted off goods from a courthouse, a national bank office, a cigarette factory and the state archives, said Ouaddai provincial Gov. Mahamat Nimir Hamata."

Ecuador's Likely Next President Promising Radical Reforms. The AP (11/27, Hayes) reports Rafael Correa, "the leftist nationalist headed to victory in Ecuador's presidential race, is already planning radical reforms when he takes office in January. That is putting him on a fast track to a dangerous confrontation with the country's opposition-controlled Congress — a body he has called a 'sewer' but which he needs to carry out his reforms." Correa "calls himself a 'personal friend' of Venezuela's anti-U.S. President Hugo Chavez."

Latin America Resists Liberalized Abortion Laws. The Washington Post (11/28, Aizenman, 690K) reports on the "debate over the proper limits on abortion that is raging…across Latin America. With the exception of Cuba, every nation in this predominantly Catholic region either totally prohibits abortion or limits it to extreme circumstances. And while the global trend over the past decade has been to liberalize abortion laws, efforts to do so in Latin America have been met by an equally determined campaign to strengthen them further. So far, the anti-abortion camp's greatest triumph has been in El Salvador, where in 1998, at the public urging of San Salvador's Archbishop Fernando Saenz Lacalle, lawmakers removed all exceptions to the nation's ban on abortion and increased penalties to up to 50 years' imprisonment."

Castro Government Cracks Down On Rock Climbing. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M) reports, "As Cubans begin contemplating life after Fidel Castro, rock climbing has emerged as an improbable political battleground between the government and young Cubans eager to embrace the latest foreign fashions. In 2003, amid a broad crackdown on civil liberties and fraternizing between tourists and Cubans, the government announced that rock climbers henceforth would be required to obtain a special permit. But the government has never granted the required permit to the many climbers who have requested one. Many Cubans and foreigners have continued climbing."

Bush Twins Reportedly Defied US Embassy's Request To Leave Argentina. ABC News' "The Blotter" (11/27) reported, "Amid a growing barrage of front-page headlines, U.S. embassy officials 'strongly suggested' President Bush's twin daughters, Jenna and Barbara Bush, cut short their trip to Buenos Aires because of security issues, U.S. diplomatic and security sources tell ABC News. But the girls have stayed on, celebrating their 25th birthday over the weekend and producing even more headlines about their activities.

Officials say the media coverage upstaged publicity plans for the new U.S. Ambassador Anthony Wayne, who had only recently arrived in the country. The Argentinean press blitz followed a report on 'The Blotter' last week that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were stolen last weekend while dining at the popular San Telmo outdoor marketplace despite being guarded by the Secret Service. … According to sources, the U.S. embassy encouraged the two girls to cut their stay short because the added attention was making their security very difficult. But to the dismay and anger of some U.S. embassy and security staff, the girls stayed on."

Embassy Denies ABC News Report. The Washington Post's "Reliable Source" column (11/28, Argetsinger, Roberts) reports, "Late yesterday, the US Embassy there issued a statement denying an ABC News report that embassy officials had 'strongly suggested' the twins cut their trip short because of security issues. … Rather, embassy officials provided 'close support and cooperation.' Barbara left the country late Sunday night; plans called for Jenna to party on until Thursday."

LATimes Celebrates Nepalese Peace Accord. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "let us take a moment to celebrate developments in Nepal, whose people danced in the streets last week after Maoist rebels signed a peace accord with the government to end a decade-long insurgency that has killed 13,000 people. Nepal's political progress has been nothing short of remarkable. In less than seven months, its demonstrations of 'people power' have forced a tyrannical king to surrender power and pushed the violent insurgents to the negotiating table."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice IG To Examine Use Of NSA Surveillance. The Washington Post (11/28, A10, Eggen) reports, "The Justice Department's inspector general yesterday announced an investigation into the department's connections to the government's controversial warrantless surveillance program, but officials said the probe will not examine whether the National Security Agency is violating the Constitution or federal statutes." The Post continues, "In a letter to House lawmakers, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said his office decided to open the probe after conducting 'initial inquiries' into the program. Under the initiative, the NSA monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the United States and others overseas without court oversight if one of the targets is suspected of ties to terrorism. … The 'program review' will examine how the Justice Department has used information obtained from the NSA program, as well as whether Justice lawyers complied with the 'legal requirements' that govern it, according to Fine's letter. Officials said the review will not examine whether the program itself is legal."

The Washington Times (11/28, Seper) reports, "The Justice Department has described the surveillance program, initiated after the September 11 attacks, as 'an essential tool for the intelligence community' in its war on terror, adding that it 'ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack.' .. 'In the ongoing conflict with al Qaeda and its allies, the president has the primary duty under the Constitution to protect the American people,' the department said in a briefing paper. 'The Constitution gives the president the full authority necessary to carry out that solemn duty, and we believe the program is lawful and protects civil liberties.' … Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has called the program's scope 'very narrow,' saying it focused only on communications with al Qaeda. He said it had been 'very effective' in protecting the United States and that reviews of it by lawyers at the Justice Department and the NSA found it to be legal." The Times adds, "The White House has agreed to give investigators from the inspector general's office special clearances to probe the program, Mr. Fine noted in his letter, which was sent to Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, and the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan."

The AP (11/28, Jordan) reports, "Fine's investigation is not expected to address whether the controversial program is an unconstitutional expansion of presidential power, as its critics and a federal judge in Detroit have charged. … Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the agency welcomes the review: 'We expect that this review will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern the operation of the program.'"

McClatchy Newspapers (11/28, Taylor) reports, "Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., said a broader investigation was needed because Congress had been kept largely in the dark about the workings of the program and couldn't determine whether the administration's use of the program was legal. In January, Fine declined a request from Lofgren and other Democrats for a more sweeping probe, saying his office lacked jurisdiction. … 'Congress needs to craft legislation so that terrorists can be the subject of surveillance while the Constitution of the United States is honored,' Lofgren said. 'To do that, a full investigation into the program as a whole, not just the (Justice Department's) involvement, will be necessary.' … After turning down the request, Fine had referred it to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which reviews allegations of wrongdoing by Justice Department employees. But the Office of Professional Responsibility was denied security clearances to conduct the investigation. … Attorney General Alberto Gonzales later revealed that President Bush had personally refused to grant the security clearances."

The New York Times (11/28, Lichtblau) reports, "Democrats said they saw the investigation as a welcome step that could answer questions about the operations and legal underpinnings of the program, which allows the National Security Agency to monitor, without obtaining court warrants, the international communications of Americans and others inside this country with suspected terrorist ties. … 'This is a long overdue investigation of a highly controversial program,' said Representative John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat who will take over as chairman of the House Judiciary Committee." The Times adds, "The review will have a somewhat different scope than the investigation sought and rejected last year. The review, Mr. Fine said in his letter, will examine the controls in place at the Justice Department for the eavesdropping, the way information developed from it was used, and the department's 'compliance with legal requirements governing the program.' … Officials said the investigation could examine the legal authority given to the Justice Department under a secret executive order first signed by Mr. Bush in October 2001, as well as the laws and procedures governing intelligence wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which was approved by Congress in 1978 after the Watergate scandal and required a special court warrant for wiretaps on Americans. The review could also look at how intelligence generated by the eavesdropping was used to seek traditional court warrants and to pursue criminal cases, the officials said."

ABC News (11/28, Ryan) reports, "Members of Congress have been asking for the internal Justice Department review since the program was first disclosed by the New York Times last year. … 'After trying for nearly a year to get DOJ to conduct an investigation of the NSA's warrantless spy program, I am very pleased to learn that the agency's inspector general is finally opening an investigation,' Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., said in response to Fine's letter."

Civil Liberties Board Impressed By Privacy Safeguards In NSA Program. The AP (11/28, Solomon) reports, "After a delay of more than a year, a government board appointed to guard Americans' privacy and civil liberties during the war on terror has been told the inner workings of the government's electronic eavesdropping program." The briefing for the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board "had been delayed because President Bush was concerned -- after several press leaks -- about widening the circle of people who knew the exact details of the secret eavesdropping program." Board members "told The Associated Press they were impressed by the safeguards the government has built into the NSA's monitoring of phone calls and computer transmissions and wished the administration could tell the public more about them to ease distrust. 'If the American public, especially civil libertarians like myself, could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy while still protecting us from attacks, we'd be more reassured,' said Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House lawyer who is the board's lone liberal Democrat." Davis "said he believes the administration could tell the public more about the program's protections without compromising national security." Alan Raul, "a former Reagan White House lawyer and the board's vice chairman, said he too was impressed."

High Court Allows US Review Of Records In NYTimes Leak Case. The New York Times (11/28, Liptak) reports, "The United States Supreme Court refused yesterday to stop a federal prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two reporters for The New York Times. The records, the newspaper said, include information about many of the reporters' confidential sources." The Times continues, "In a one-sentence order offering no reasoning and noting no dissenting votes, the Supreme Court rejected a request from The Times to stay a lower court's decision while the paper tried to persuade the justices to review the case. … Yesterday's order effectively allows the United States attorney in Chicago, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, to begin reviewing the records, which he has already obtained from the reporters' phone companies, as early as this week." The Times adds, "The Justice Department told the Supreme Court on Friday that Mr. Fitzgerald was under enormous time pressure. 'The statute of limitations,' the government said, 'will imminently expire on Dec. 3 and 13, 2006, on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating.' … The grand jury, in Chicago, is looking into who told the reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government was planning to take in December 2001 against two Islamic charities in Illinois and Texas. The disclosures to the reporters, the government lawyers wrote on Friday, may have amounted to obstruction of justice."

The AP (11/28, Yost) reports, "The case marks the second refusal by the court in as many years to sort out a clash between the federal government and the Times over press freedom. … In June 2005, the Supreme Court refused to take up the Times' request to hear an appeal in the CIA leak investigation involving the outing of Valerie Plame. In that case, Miller, who retired from the Times a year ago, spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a federal grand jury. Fitzgerald, in a role as a special counsel, conducted that leak investigation as well." The AP adds, "Monday's rejection 'is just further indication that we're getting absolutely nowhere with the court when it comes to protecting confidential sources,' said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. … The case points out a growing problem of reporters trying to protect their sources in the information age, press advocates say. Rather than threatening reporters with jail if they don't testify, the government can go through the back door to hunt down confidential sources by amassing phone records and credit card receipts."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A4, 2.04M) reports the order deals with the "records of two Times reporters in a leak investigation of a terrorism-funding probe. The one-sentence order came in a First Amendment battle that involves articles written in 2001 by New York Times Co. reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The articles revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation." The dispute "stems from Mr. Shenon and Ms. Miller calling two charities for comment after learning of the planned freeze on their assets from confidential sources." The Justice Department "says the reporters' calls tipped off the charities to coming government raids." The Washington Post (11/28, A4, Barnes, 690K) also reports the story.

Gingrich Says Terror Threat May Necessitate Curtailing Freedom Of Speech. The New Hampshire Union Leader (11/28, Yates) reports that former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, in Manchester, NH, on Monday, "said the country will be forced to reexamine freedom of speech to meet the threat of terrorism." Gingrich said that "a 'different set of rules' may be needed to reduce terrorists' ability to use the Internet and free speech to recruit and get out their message. 'We need to get ahead of the curve before we actually lose a city, which I think could happen in the next decade,' said Gingrich," who "spoke to about 400 state and local power brokers last night at the annual Nackey S. Loeb First Amendment award dinner, which fetes people and organizations that stand up for freedom of speech." In his speech, Gingrich also "sharply criticized campaign finance laws he charged were reducing free speech and doing little to fight attack advertising," and "said court rulings over separation of church and state have hurt citizens' ability to express themselves and their faith."

PATRIOT ACT:

Muslim Charity Sues Bank, Argues Patriot Act Unconstitutional. The AP (11/28) reports, "A Muslim charity raided by federal agents in September has sued a bank, saying it violated the charity's civil rights by planning to close its accounts." The AP continues, "The charity, Life for Relief and Development, based in Southfield, Michigan, also seeks an injunction to stop Comerica Bank from giving other banks any information it might have about the organization. The charity is challenging the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act, which allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity." The AP adds, "The Patriot Act, approved by Congress shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, was designed to give law enforcement agencies more tools to combat terrorism, but some provisions were challenged on constitutional grounds for restricting civil liberties. … Comerica had told the charity that it planned to terminate the accounts Nov. 15, but granted an extension, according to the lawsuit." The AP notes, "FBI agents assigned to a terrorism task force searched Life's offices Sept. 18, seizing computer servers, donor records and other financial documents. They also searched the homes of the charity's chief executive, an ex-employee and two board members. .. The FBI would not say what agents were looking for, but charity officials have said it might be related to relief work the group did in Iraq. The international humanitarian organization also is active in Afghanistan. .. No charges have been filed. The charity has sought to reassure the Detroit area's Muslim community that it is legal to donate money to the organization, which was founded in 1992 by Iraqi immigrants." The Detroit Free Press (11/27, Warikoo, 373K) reported, "The filing occurred days after a senior vice president with Comerica, James Garavaglia, met with Arab-American leaders to explain how the Patriot Act requires banks to work with the government. Charity officials worry that Life's reputation would be harmed if Comerica officials spread allegations about the group to other banks."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Religious Leaders Stage "Pray-In" Over Muslim Clerics' Removal From Flight. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, A10, Miller) reports, "Imams, ministers and a rabbi staged a pray-in yesterday at Reagan National Airport and demanded an apology from US Airways for barring six Muslim clerics from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight last week. The religious leaders called for an end to racial profiling, saying it was unacceptable in the United States." A US Airways spokeswoman said "prayer was never the issue," and that suspicion was sparked over what one passenger "thought were anti-US statements." The spokeswoman "also said the men got up and moved around the airplane, so the flight crew consulted with the airline about whether they might pose a security risk. Local law enforcement and the FBI thought they did, she said." USA Today (11/28, 11A, 2.27M) also runs a brief report on the "pray-in."

Under the headline "How The Imams Terrorized An Airliner," the Washington Times (11/28, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Muslim religious leaders removed from a Minneapolis flight last week exhibited behavior associated with a security probe by terrorists and were not merely engaged in prayers, according to witnesses, police reports and aviation security officials." The article offers no new information about last week's incident, but quotes "a federal air marshal who asked to remain anonymous" as saying that the clerics moving to seats throughout the plane would have alarmed him. "They now control all of the entry and exit routes to the plane," said the air marshal. Robert MacLean, a former air marshal, said the clerics "should have been denied boarding and been investigated. It looks like they are trying to create public sympathy or maybe setting someone up for a lawsuit." A "pilot with another airline who talked to The Washington Times on condition of anonymity, said he would have made the same call as the US Airways pilot."

Threat Note, Containers Prompt Temporary Closure Of Lincoln Memorial. The Washington Post (11/28, B3, Sheridan, Dvorak, 690K) reports the Lincoln Memorial was closed for more than two hours yesterday after authorities received "reports of a suspicious liquid and a threatening note on the grounds, officials said. Tests showed no evidence of a harmful substance. DC firefighters received a call at 12:40 p.m. reporting that a bottle believed to contain a liquid was found in the women's restroom in the base of the memorial, fire and federal homeland security officials said." Before a hazardous materials unit arrived, a letter asking, "Do you know what anthrax is?" and "Do you know what a bomb is?" was found on the statue, according to officials. "In addition, a thermos that police found on the memorial steps was initially considered suspicious, officials said."

In an article appearing on at least 40 news websites throughout the nation, the AP (11/27, Takruri) reported, "An official from the Department of Homeland Security, who asked to not be identified because his agency was not in charge of the incident, quoted the questions about anthrax and bombs."

Union Hopes Democratic Congress Will Allow TSA Screeners To Bargain Collectively. In his "Federal Diary" column appearing in the Washington Post (11/28, D4, 690K), Stephen Barr writes, "Proposals to allow TSA screeners to unionize have not gained traction in Congress, but [American Federation of Government Employees] officials hope that will change when Democrats take control of the House and Senate next year. Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), who lost a vote on an amendment that would have let screeners engage in bargaining, plans to push the issue, her spokeswoman said."

Intelligence Agencies Investing Millions In College Programs. USA Today (11/28, 8A, Willing, 2.27M) reports, "The US intelligence community pours millions into higher education, paying for hundreds of scholarships, intelligence-related courses and fellowships at nearly a dozen universities, public documents and interviews with officials show. … The sponsoring agencies, including the CIA, say the programs help ensure they get enough recruits skilled to wage the war on terrorism." However, they have also "revived a decades-old debate about the proper relationship between intelligence agencies and academia," prompting "comparisons to the 1950s, when the FBI sometimes encouraged students to report on professors' political leanings, and the 1960s, when the CIA paid for the National Student Association and tapped its members for intelligence work."

In New Book, CIA Agent Describes Training Of First Post-9/11 Class. In a Washington Times (11/28, 88K) column, Gary Anderson writes, "Among the agencies of the federal government, three are legendary: the Marine Corps, the FBI and the CIA. … If they have anything in common it is that their field officers all go through a similar basic training and education course." In his new book, "Class 11," agent T.J. Waters describes his CIA training, and Anderson notes that until he read the book, "I was not aware of how closely the basic schooling of CIA officers is to that of the Marines and the FBI. Class 11 was the first post-September 11 class at the CIA. Consequently, it was larger and much more diverse than its predecessors." Anderson adds that Waters "does a creditable job," and "the reader comes away with a deeper understanding of one of our most misunderstood organizations."

WAR NEWS:

White House Insists Iraq Conflict Not A "Civil War." On the day NBC Nightly News (11/27, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 9.87M) announced it would start referring to the Iraq conflict a "civil war," the White House continued to dispute the use of that term. However, comments by the President on the issue appeared to be at odds with the case made by his National Security Adviser to describe the White House's stance . The AP (11/28, Riechmann) reports on a Bush news conference this morning in Estonia. The President said "the sectarian violence rocking Iraq is not civil war but part of an al-Qaida plot to use violence to goad Iraqi factions into repeatedly attacking each other." Bush also "said the latest cycle of violence does not represent a new era in Iraq. The country is reeling from the deadliest week of sectarian fighting since the war began in March 2003. 'We've been in this phase for a while,' Bush said." The AP adds, "This comment appeared at odds with the assessment of the president's national security adviser, who told reporters on the way to Estonia that Iraq is in a 'new phase' that requires changes."

National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley's comments had gotten plenty of play in the media. NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 2, 2:30, Gregory) reported Hadley said whether Iraq is in "a civil war or not, there are certainly a great deal of a wariness in the United States and beyond that the sectarian violence is out of control, that there is not enough progress quickly enough for the President's satisfaction." Hadley "called it a new phase over the past few days where the violence has sparked and reached new heights in Iraq -- a new phase of that violence the President wants to address."

The CBS Evening News (11/27, lead story, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) said Hadley offered his "most ominous assessment yet of the violence in Iraq." CBS (Axelrod) went on to comment on what it deemed a "dramatic shift in rhetoric by…Hadley." The advisor, said CBS, had "to acknowledge reality." CBS also reported the White House "still doesn't want to use the words 'civil war' because that's the next category of chaos. But this is new." CBS quoted Hadley saying, "We are clearly in a new phase, characterized by this increasing sectarian violence. That requires us obviously to adapt to that new phase and these two leaders need to be talking about how to do that."

ABC World News (11/27, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "You can call it anarchy, you can call it chaos you can call it a civil war, whatever you call it, the events of recent days demonstrate that the situation in Iraq is at a critical juncture." ABC (Raddatz) added "the White House acknowledged that Iraq is quote, 'In a new phase and new solutions are urgently needed.' With Iraq continuing its descent into civil war after a wave of deadly sectarian violence, a White House official said things are not 'proceeding well and are not going fast enough in Iraq' and the US must find ways to, quote, 'adapt.'" The AP (11/28, Raum) quotes Hadley as saying, "Obviously everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough."

The Washington Post (11/27, Wright, Ricks, 690K) also notes Hadley's comments, and goes on to quote a statement by National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe, "While the situation on the ground is very serious, neither Prime Minister [Nouri al-] Maliki nor we believe that Iraq is in a civil war. The Iraqi government is making slow but sure progress on important issues that will help stop the violence and bring the country together." The Post adds, "At least one Iraqi leader says otherwise. 'It's worse than a civil war. In a civil war, you at least know which factions are fighting each other,' lamented a senior member of Iraq's government in an interview a few hours after Johndroe's comments. 'We don't even know that anymore. It's so bloody confused.'"

A number of media reports, however, see political calculations behind the White House's rejection of the term "civil war." Typical of the coverage was the Baltimore Sun (11/28, Davis, 257K), which reports President Bush "has said he would not allow US troops to be caught 'in the crossfire between rival factions.' Conceding that a civil war has broken out in Iraq could undermine that promise and increase pressure for a quick withdrawal of American forces." That is why, adds the Sun, "the White House continued to resist the notion that Iraq had descended into civil war." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (11/27, lead story, 2:15, Axelrod, 7.66M) said "there's a huge difference when talking about a US troop involvement between doing something noble like bringing democracy to a region and being caught in another country's civil war." And on CNN's The Situation Room (11/27), correspondent Michael Ware reported from Baghdad, "If this is not a civil war, then I don't want to see one when it comes."

The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Gold, 850K) says NBC's decision "makes it the first television network to officially adopt the term 'civil war,' a description the Bush administration has resisted." The LATimes "was the first major news organization to formally adopt the description when it began to refer to the hostilities as a civil war in October, without public fanfare. No other major media outlet has made the phrase a matter of policy, although it has cropped up in various news reports." The White House, adds the Times, "has exerted pressure on the media not to use the term, journalists said, which led to newsroom caution over the issue. … Political analysts said NBC's public embrace of the term further complicated the administration's efforts to maintain that the violence had not spun out of control." USA Today (11/28, 2.27M) reports the "politically charged use of the term 'civil war'" put "the network at odds with the White House…and prompted renewed discussion among news outlets." CBS, ABC, CNN and Fox News "said that as sectarian violence has risen, their reporters have called the conflict a civil war, and will continue, though they plan no formal change in policy. On CNN Monday, correspondent Michael Ware said, 'If this isn't a civil war, I don't know what is.'" USA Today adds, "Recent dispatches in outlets such as the Los Angeles Times and New York Times also have referred to a civil war. USA TODAY calls the conflict 'the war in Iraq' and refers to 'sectarian violence' or 'religious fighting.'"

Annan Says Iraq On Brink Of Civil War. The AP (11/28, Ben Feller) reports, "UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said Monday that Iraq is close to civil war, as the Bush administration stepped up diplomatic efforts to stabilize the war-torn country." Annan "talked to reporters in New York as members of the Iraq Study Group were to discuss recommendations for changes in US war strategy. … Asked by reporters at the UN if Iraq is in a civil war now, Annan replied, 'I think given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there. In fact we are almost there.'" The Washington Post (11/27, Wright, Ricks, 690K) calls Annan's comments "a sign of the growing global concern about Iraq's fate."

Carter Says Conflict Not A Civil War. Former President Jimmy Carter on CNN's Larry King Live (11/27) said, "I don't think there's anything wrong with calling it a civil war. It doesn't change the character of it just because NBC has said that. I don't think it's a misnomer for it." Pressed whether he would characterize it as a civil war, Carter replied, "No, I don't think so. I think this brings it up to a level that doesn't quite reach the level of most other civil wars. I just -- we helped at the Carter Center to monitor a election in the Republic of Congo which had a civil war where 4 million people died. We tried to bring peace to Sudan and two million people died in that civil war. Some civil wars are much more costly in historical terms than it has been in Iraq. But it's serious and the prospect for immediate secession of violence is completely absent."

More Commentary. Iraq Deputy Ambassador to the UN Feisal Istrabadi on CNN's The Situation Room (11/27) was asked whether Iraq was in the middle of a civil war. Istrabadi downplayed that terminology saying, "There are sound technical reasons for why this is not a civil war, including most clearly, because the population of Iraq, regardless of ethnicity or sectarian attachment or sect, overwhelmingly rejects this violence. What you have are death squads operating on each side, operated by extremists, targeting the civilians of the other side. In that sense, you don't have, for instance, the militias which is a real problem right now, you don't have the militias fighting each other. Rather, you have them operating as death squads, murdering the other side civilians."

Sen. Jack Reid on CNN's The Situation Room (11/27) reported, "I have been saying for years Iraq has been a low-level civil war. I think it is a civil war. You have different groups vying for political power which is one thing -- very good definition of a civil war."

Bush Reaches Out To Arab Leaders Ahead Of Meeting With Maliki. The New York Times (11/28, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that as President Bush "and his top diplomats try to halt the downward spiral in Iraq and Lebanon, they seem intent on their strategy of talking only to Arab friends, despite increasing calls inside and outside the administration for them to reach out to Iran and Syria as well." Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "are traveling to Jordan this week for talks that are to include Iraq's prime minister and a number of Sunni Arab leaders but exclude the Iranians and Syrians, despite the influence they wield in Iraq and Lebanon." When Bush and Rice "arrive in Amman on Wednesday, they will try to enlist help from Sunni Arab leaders to try to rein in the violence in Iraq by putting pressure on Sunni insurgents. That was part of Vice President Dick Cheney's message to King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia during a brief visit on Saturday, administration officials said, and Mr. Bush will repeat that entreaty with King Abdullah II of Jordan, as will Ms. Rice when she meets for talks with Persian Gulf foreign ministers at the Dead Sea on Thursday and Friday." The Times adds, "Specifically, the United States wants Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt to work to drive a wedge between the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and the anti-American Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr." The Financial Times (11/28, Dinmore, Khalaf) notes "officials close to…al-Sadr are reported to have said the radical Shia cleric is threatening to pull out of the national unity government if Mr Maliki does not put a stop to attacks on the Shia. They have also warned him against meeting Mr Bush in Amman, Jordan, tomorrow and Thursday."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/27, Malveaux) reported "Arab allies, Iraq's neighbors here, they want some sort of international regional conference, a way to look at the big picture here to get everyone involved, those players, as well as the United States. So that is why you're seeing this diplomatic offensive taking place" with Vice President Cheney "reaching out to Saudi Arabia and Jordan, as well as some of those other moderate allies. If the United States can't make some sort of impact with Iraq, then they want Iraq's neighbors to try to help out." CNN's Wolf Blitzer added, "By almost all accounts, it will be linked to a renewed US effort to try to jump-start Israeli/Palestinian peace process as well."

Maliki Expected To Ask Bush For US Withdrawal Timetable. The AP (11/28, Abdul-Zahra, Mroue) reports Iraqi officials said discussions between Bush and Maliki "will focus on giving Iraqis more control so U.S. forces can withdraw. … Iraqi officials believe the summit will deal with giving Iraqi forces more control over security. The Iraqis expect President Bush to agree to such an arrangement, and they say al-Maliki will then ask for the Americans to start discussing a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, according to one of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity." However, national security adviser Stephen Hadley "said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. 'We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan,' Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One." An Iraqi official, "who spoke anonymously…said American officials had indicated in preparatory talks in Baghdad that Bush was open to increasing the pace of the security hand-over."

Talibani Asks Iran For Help Ending Violence. The Washington Post (11/28, A15, Trejos, 690K) reports, "In the latest sign of a budding diplomatic relationship, Iraq's President Jalal Talabani arrived in Iran on Monday to seek his neighbor's help in ending his country's sectarian conflict, as Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of troops by the end of next year." Talabani's visit to Iran "was delayed by a three-day curfew imposed after a series of car bombs exploded in the Shiite Muslim stronghold of Sadr City on Thursday, setting off a wave of reprisal killings. There were reports of sporadic violence Monday as the curfew was lifted."

The New York Times (11/28, Fathi, Semple, 1.16M) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "pledged Monday in a meeting with the Iraqi president that Iran would do all it could to stop the growing violence in Iraq." In a televised press conference with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, Ahmadinejad said, "The Iranian government and people will stand by their brothers in Iraq and will do anything to help bring peace into Iraq."

Hezbollah Reportedly Trained Mahdi Army Fighters. The New York Times (11/28, Gordon, Filkins, 1.16M) reports, "A senior American intelligence official said Monday that the Iranian-backed group Hezbollah had been training members of the Mahdi Army, the Iraqi Shiite militia led by Moktada al-Sadr. The official said that 1,000 to 2,000 fighters from the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon. A small number of Hezbollah operatives have also visited Iraq to help with training, the official said. Iran has facilitated the link between Hezbollah and the Shiite militias in Iraq, the official said. Syrian officials have also cooperated, though there is debate about whether it has the blessing of the senior leaders in Syria. The intelligence official spoke on condition of anonymity under rules set by his agency, and discussed

Iran's role in response to questions from a reporter." The Times adds, "The claim about Hezbollah's role in training Shiite militias could strengthen the hand of those in the Bush administration who oppose a major new diplomatic involvement with Iran." However, "Some Middle East experts were skeptical about the assessment of Hezbollah's training role. 'That sound to me a little bit strained,' said Flynt Leverett, a senior fellow at the New America Foundation and a Middle East expert formerly on the National Security Council staff."

Sadr Militia Said To Have Grown Eightfold. The Washington Post (11/27, Wright, Ricks, 690K) reports that "in a reflection of the growing new dimension of civil strife, a senior US intelligence official said yesterday that the militia of radical Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr has grown eightfold over the past year and now fields 40,000 to 60,000 men. That makes it more effective than the Iraqi government's army, the official indicated." Sadr "is so powerful that if provincial elections were held now, he would sweep most of the south and also take Baghdad, said the intelligence officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his position."

The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Moore, 850K) reports "besieged Iraqis, many with no previous affiliation with established militias, are taking up arms, barricading their communities and joining new Shiite Muslim militia cells or increasingly militant Sunni Arab neighborhood-watch groups."

Baghdad Curfew Didn't Stop Killings. ABC World News (11/27, story 2, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that in Baghdad, "a three-day curfew that began after last week's devastating attacks has now been lifted." ABC (Brown) added, "Life returns to the streets of Baghdad, today. For many, that meant taking care of the dead. Because, in spite of a 3-day curfew, at least 30 people were killed, Sunni and Shiite, in almost equal number." In Sadr City, "a Shiite stronghold, a memorial service was held for 10 people killed on Sunday, in what police said was a shootout between gunmen and US soldiers. The mourners chanted 'No to America.' In the wake of the massacre last Thursday that killed 230, people are now living in a new climate of fear, of another, more vicious wave of revenge killings." NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 3, 1:45, Aspell, 9.87M) said "with the curfew over people can move around the city. So can militias and bombers. Baghdad is bracing for more violence."

Marine Document Says US Can't Defeat Anbar Insurgents. In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/28, Linzer, Ricks, 690K) reports from Anbar province, "The US military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter al-Qaeda's rising popularity there, according to newly disclosed details from a classified Marine Corps intelligence report that set off debate in recent months about the military's mission in Anbar province." The Marines "recently filed an updated version of that assessment that stood by its conclusions and stated that, as of mid-November, the problems in troubled Anbar province have not improved, a senior US intelligence official said yesterday. 'The fundamental questions of lack of control, growth of the insurgency and criminality' remain the same, the official said." The Post adds, "The Marines' August memo, a copy of which was shared with The Washington Post, is far bleaker than some officials suggested when they described it in late summer. The report describes Iraq's Sunni minority as 'embroiled in a daily fight for survival,' fearful of 'pogroms' by the Shiite majority and increasingly dependent on al-Qaeda in Iraq as its only hope against growing Iranian dominance across the capital."

Iraq Study Group Discusses Draft Report. The Washington Times (11/28, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The Iraq Study Group met yesterday at an undisclosed location to discuss its first draft report that calls for increased diplomatic engagement in the region and new military moves to rescue Iraq from a descent into civil war." The panel's co-chairmen, James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton "finished work on the draft during the weekend. It contains an assessment of where violence-racked Iraq stands more than three years after the U.S. ousted Saddam Hussein. It also includes a list of recommendations on diplomatic and military fronts. A final report to President Bush is expected next month." Baker, adds the Times, "is said to be pushing a recommendation for the Bush administration to engage in direct talks with Syria and Iran, two U.S.-designated state sponsors of terrorism who are supporting various insurgencies and terrorist attacks in Iraq."

ABC World News (11/27, lead story, 3:00, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "officials tell ABC News that one of the central recommendations from the Iraq Study Group is that the US engage in talks with both Iran and Syria, to help stem the flow of foreign fighters, and stop the more lethal bombs from entering Iraq. … An Administration official says that it is unlikely that President Bush would accept that recommendation. But there are two other recommendations that the President would look at favorably. One -- to double or triple the number of US soldiers embedded with Iraqi security forces. Two -- give the Iraqi government a strong message that the US military support will not go on indefinitely. As for timetables for withdrawal, the President has been adamant that will not happen. An official tells ABC News that the ISG is quote, 'Massively divided on the question of timetables or whether or not to suggest additional troops for a short period of time.'"

The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 2, 2:30, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "The most dramatic option on the table is an increase of up to 20,000 American troops in an effort to keep a lid on the violence. The Army is now studying how it could accomplish the buildup and how long it could sustain it. Just two weeks ago, the commander of US forces in the Middle East told Congress he didn't want more American troops but in a subsequent interview with '60 Minutes,' General John Abizaid put the option back on the table." But "there is no agreement on whether to set a timetable for American withdrawal which some members of the Iraqi Study Group see as the only way to put pressure on Prime Minister Maliki to make the political concessions needed to head off civil war." CBS added "one source says the panel hasn't hit any deal breakers so they could deliver their report as early as next week."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, Chaddock, 59K) says the ISG "illustrates those rare moments when a crisis reaches such a point that official Washington temporarily loosens hold of the reins. It's in those moments that experienced outside voices -- think the 9/11 and Warren commissions -- can make themselves heard. The Iraq panel, in particular, may prove particularly influential because of the escalating chaos in Iraq." But not all is praise for the ISG in today's press. Also in the Christian Science Monitor (11/28, 59K), Andrew J. Bacevich, professor of history and international relations at Boston University, writes, "Even as Washington waits with bated breath for the Iraq Study Group (ISG) to release its findings, the rest of us should see this gambit for what it is: an attempt to deflect attention from the larger questions raised by America's failure in Iraq and to shore up the authority of the foreign policy establishment that steered the United States into this quagmire. This ostentatiously bipartisan panel of Wise Men (and one woman) can't really be searching for truth. It is engaged in damage control." The ISG "will provide cover for the Bush administration to shift course in Iraq. It will pave the way for the Democratic Congress to endorse that shift in a great show of bipartisanship. But it will hold no one responsible. Above all, it will leave intact the assumptions, arrangements, and institutions that gave rise to Iraq in the first place."

Carter Says Bipartisan Consensus Key Goal Of Iraq Study Group. Former President Jimmy Carter on CNN's Larry King Live (11/27) said, "When I talked to Jim Baker last week he made it plain to me that his major goal, Larry, is to have unanimity within the committee. He think the mix of Democrats and Republicans, all very prominent, all very qualified, should be a unanimous recommendation to have maximum impact."

UK Plans To Withdraw 7000 Troops From Iraq By End Of 2007. The AP (11/28, Quinn) reports Britain "said Monday it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year." British Defense Secretary Des Browne "was the second senior official in recent days to talk of reducing the number of British troops in Iraq. … Last week, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Britain may be able to hand over security responsibility in the southern port city of Basra by the spring of 2007. Britain also hopes to hand security control over to the Iraqis in the province of Maysan on the Iranian border in January."

Poland, Italy Announce Plans To Pull Remaining Troops. The AP (11/28, Quinn) reports Poland and Italy "announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops" in Iraq. Polish President Lech Kaczynski "said his country…would pull its remaining 900 soldiers out of Iraq by the end of 2007." Italian Premier Romano Prodi "said the last of Italy's soldiers in Iraq - some 60-70 troops - will return home this week."

Democratic Congressman-Elect Maintains There Were Some Saddam-Al Qaeda Links. The New York Times (11/28, Risen, 1.16M) reports, "In early 2002," rep.-elect Chris Carney, "a Naval Reserve officer, was assigned to work in a tiny intelligence unit created by Douglas J. Feith, then the under secretary of defense for policy, to search for links between terrorist groups and their possible state-sponsors, most notably Iraq. After the 2003 invasion, the Feith unit, the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group, was caught up in the debate over the Bush administration's handling of prewar intelligence, and the office was investigated by a Senate committee and an independent presidential commission." Carney "says he still believes there were links between Iraq and Al Qaeda, although he is careful not to overstate them. 'On a scale of 0 to 10, where 0 was no connection and 10 was operational control, I would say it's about a 2½,' he said in an interview. 'It was a relationship of keeping your friends close and your enemies closer,' he added. 'Saddam was a savvy guy, and I think he wanted to make sure that if Al Qaeda someday became a force, that he wanted to keep his options open. I thought that there was a relationship. Whether it was strong enough to go to war, that's the president's decision.'"

Kristoff Says Pentagon Erred In Disputing Media Reports From Iraq. The New York Times' Nicholas Kristoff (11/28) writes, "For several years, the White House and its Dobermans helpfully pointed out the real enemy in Iraq: those lazy, wimpish foreign correspondents who were so foolish and unpatriotic that they reported that we faced grave difficulties in Iraq. … As we try to extricate ourselves from Iraq, a basic lesson for the administration is that it should deal with bad news in ways more creative than clobbering the messenger. From the beginning of the war, the Pentagon has had an incredibly sophisticated news operation (now including its own news channel, carried on some cable networks), but it has often seemed more concerned with disseminating propaganda than with gathering facts."

Waning Support For War In Iraq Blamed On Unrealistic Expectations. In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) Dominic Johnson, a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson School at Princeton, and Dominic Tierney, an assistant professor of political science at Swarthmore, write, "Tet and Somalia suggest we should be very careful before concluding that Iraq is a defeat. There is real evidence of failure, especially the escalating sectarian violence. But our perceptions are nevertheless easily manipulated. Iraq looks like a defeat in part because the Bush administration fell into the same trap as President Johnson: raising expectations of imminent victory by declaring 'mission accomplished' before the real work had even begun. And as with Somalia, fighting shadowy insurgents in Iraq while propping up a weak government engenders negative memories of Vietnam. … With the stakes so high, Americans must be certain that their perception of failure in Iraq is not a mirage."

Australian Government Cleared In Oil-For-Food Probe. The Washington Times/AP (11/28, McGuirk) reports, "An inquiry cleared Australia's government of wrongdoing in an Iraqi oil-for-food scandal Monday, but recommended top officials of the monopoly wheat exporter face charges for paying more than $200 million to the Saddam Hussein regime." Prime Minister John Howard "promised the inquiry's key recommendations would be acted upon immediately and said the findings vindicated him and other top government officials who denied having prior knowledge of the kickbacks."

The New York Times (11/28, Bonner, 1.16M) notes the "commission investigating corruption in the United Nations oil-for-food program released a long-awaited report on Monday stating unequivocally that a major Australian wheat company paid more than $224 million in kickbacks and bribes to Saddam Hussein's government. The commission also found that the company, ABW Ltd., had 'deliberately and dishonestly' devised a scheme for the payments -- from 1999 until the overthrow of Mr. Hussein in 2003 -- that would deceive the United Nations. … The Australian commission's report was the most thorough -- and damning -- investigation of corruption in the United Nation's oil-for-food program. It is certain to have repercussions for politicians in Canberra as well as in Washington, where incoming Democratic lawmakers have pledged to hold their own hearings."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A9, Adam, Brindal, 2.04M) reports "the findings could increase pressure on the government to dismantle the country's powerful wheat-export monopoly. US and European growers have long tried to persuade Australia to end its wheat-marketing system, whereby growers sell their export wheat through a 'single desk' managed by listed AWB Ltd., which then handles sales to foreign buyers."

WPost Protests Termination Of Special IG For Iraqi Reconstruction. The Washington Post (11/28, A18, 690K) reports, "In the mess that is Iraq, there's one entity that has done an unquestionably good job: the special inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction. Under the leadership of Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the inspector general's office has found that the Coalition Provisional Authority could not account for almost $9 billion distributed to Iraqi ministries. … Its audits have saved the government more than $400 million. Now there's a move to close down Mr. Bowen's shop. More than a move, actually: A mischievous provision, slipped into the defense authorization bill by House Republicans without the knowledge of key senators, set an October 2007 termination date for the office. The bill was signed into law last month, but a number of senators, including Susan Collins, chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee; Joseph I. Lieberman, the committee's ranking minority member; and Russell Feingold, are trying to reverse this foolish plan during the lame-duck session."

Bush To Seek Renewed NATO Commitment To Afghan Mission. USA Today (11/28, A6, Jackson, 2.27M) reports from Estonia, "President Bush arrived here Monday to promote freedom and democracy, using this small Baltic nation, a former republic of the Soviet Union, as a model. Bush came to the seaport of Tallinn in advance of this week's NATO summit on Afghanistan and meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan." Estonia and Latvia, site of the two-day summit, "are US allies in the war on terrorism."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (11/28) says "one issue will dominate this week's NATO summit: Afghanistan. The 26 presidents and prime ministers know that the future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is playing out in the deserts of Kandahar and mountains of Uruzgan rather than in their conference hall on the Baltic Sea." The Washington Post (11/28, A1, Abramowitz, Constable, 690K) reports Bush "will seek fresh troops and equipment for the fight in Afghanistan, and fewer restrictions on how they can be used, when he sits down this week with NATO allies to review the state of the dangerous mission there, according to senior US officials." The Afghan mission "is shaping up as the major issue for discussion among Bush and the leaders of the 25 other NATO member countries, who are gathering for the first time in two years. A failed operation in Afghanistan would threaten NATO's ambition to one day play a more robust role in helping address the world's crises." The Post adds, "Briefing reporters on Air Force One on the way to Estonia, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley cited 'an increasing awareness at how important this is for the war on terror, how important it is for Afghanistan and how important it is for NATO not to fail.'" The Washington Post (11/27, A12, Constable, 690K) runs a second report on NATO, titled "A NATO Bid To Regain Afghans' Trust," in which it gives mixed reviews to the alliance's efforts at reconstruction in Panjwai.

The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, LaFranchi, 59K) says Afghanistan "is something the president dare not disregard even in the midst of Iraq developments. Not only is the NATO-led war in Afghanistan facing its own mounting challenges, with potentially deep consequences for the international war on terror, but of the two wars, it is also the one where the United States has important allied assistance." Bush "will press the 26-nation alliance for both more money and more troops for Afghanistan, according to White House officials. To make his case, Bush will emphasize the connection between international security and the battle to defeat a resurgent Taliban and elements of Al Qaeda." NATO "already commands more than 30,000 foreign troops in Afghanistan. Gen. James Jones, the supreme allied commander, is looking for summit leaders to add 2,500 troops to the total. The challenge for Bush, however, will be skepticism about his leadership in the wake of perceived defeat in the midterm elections, and what is viewed internationally as his lame-duck status."

But the Washington Times (11/28, Dinan, 88K) reports "expectations for the NATO summit are low." Europeans "are resisting Mr. Bush's push for committing more troops to the dangerous areas of Afghanistan, and want to go slowly on expanding the alliance's ties to non-NATO nations who are assisting with security operations." Hadley "said the difficulties are understandable but said the leaders at the summit will make some announcements on those issues."

More Commentary. The New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) editorializes, "NATO is failing its most significant post-Soviet test: stabilizing Afghanistan. ... Unless NATO's members commit to sending in more troops and more resources, Afghanistan could go the way of Iraq." Some reluctant countries have imposed an "unfair division of labor. Canadian, Dutch, British and American forces in southern Afghanistan are doing most of the heavy fighting, while the French, Germans and Italians patrol relatively quiet northern regions." Bush "can't do much more than cajole the allies. Iraq has deprived him of both international credibility and the military forces to do more. It is now up to the rest of the alliance. All NATO members must acknowledge that the Afghan war is not just some post-9/11 gesture ... There is a life-and-death struggle under way against terrorists and extremism that is in all their national interests to win."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M) editorializes, "The NATO forces battling resurgent Taliban in southern Afghanistan call to mind the Normandy landing. Once again, mostly Canadian, British and American troops are fighting and dying. ... With a few exceptions, such as the Dutch and Danes, most NATO members prefer the by now traditional division of labor: The Anglo-Saxons do the fighting while the others compete for popularity as armed aid workers. ... If NATO can't muster the forces to defeat the remnants of al Qaeda's original state sponsor, what is it good for?"

UN Report Finds Afghan Poppy Eradication Campaign Failing To Make Progress. USA Today (11/28, 1A, Leinwand, 2.27M), in a front-page article titled, "Afghan Opium Fight Hurts Poorest," reports, "U.S. and European efforts to end heroin production in Afghanistan have done little to hamper the drug industry and have hurt the country's poorest people, according to a new report by the United Nations and the World Bank." The report "says the production of opium…permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades. The opium trade accounts for about $2.7 billion in Afghanistan's economy — equal to more than one-third of the nation's gross domestic product — and is responsible for thousands of jobs, the report says. The Taliban government, which had harbored al-Qaeda, virtually eliminated opium production in 2001, before U.S.-led forces toppled it. Production has soared since, even as the United States and its allies have stepped up efforts to kill fields of opium and persuade farmers to grow other crops."

Rangel Urged To Apologize For Comment About US Troops. The Washington Times (11/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The national commander of the American Legion called on Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, to apologize for suggesting that American troops would not choose to fight in Iraq if they had other employment options. 'Our military is the most skilled, best-trained, all-volunteer force on the planet,' National Commander Paul A. Morin said yesterday. 'Like that recently espoused by Sen. John Kerry, Congressman Rangel's view of our troops couldn't be further from the truth and is possibly skewed by his political opposition to the war in Iraq.'" The Times adds, "According to Mr. Rangel, 'If a young fellow has an option of having a decent career, or joining the Army to fight in Iraq, you can bet your life that he would not be in Iraq. If there's anyone who believes these youngsters want to fight, as the Pentagon and some generals have said, you can just forget about it. No bright young individual wants to fight just because of a bonus and just because of some educational benefits.'"

New York US Attorney Faces Tough Calls. The New York Law Journal (11/28, Hamblett) reports, "Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia knew there would be some tough calls to make when he accepted an appointment to one of the most high-profile law enforcement jobs in the country." The Journal continues, "Garcia, 45, was sworn in as U.S. Attorney on Sept. 6, 2005. During a little more than a year as the top federal prosecutor in Manhattan, he had to pull the plug on several celebrated cases to defend subordinates from almost unprecedented criticism over their handling of a non-prosecution agreement with KPMG. … But Garcia does not take refuge in the fact that the cases he has had to clean up were launched well before he took office last year. … 'We don't measure the value of this office in terms of wins and losses,' he said in a recent interview in his office at One St. Andrew's Plaza in lower Manhattan. 'The value is in the type of cases we bring and the example we set for the rest of the country.'" The Journal adds, "Garcia said that the Southern District has always taken 'hard cases, cutting edge cases,' that come with some risk attached. … 'We go in because we believe the case is strong and we do the right thing,' he said. 'We have some assistants saying "I'm 11-0," but what does that mean? A guy might be 5-5 but he's bringing very tough, important cases.'" The Journal notes, "When Garcia took office, he emphasized his great respect for its traditions and national reputation, and said he had no intention of radically changing the way the office does business. … Garcia indicated he would pay particular attention to public corruption, announcing a higher profile in the district's northern counties by establishing a corruption hotline."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

ACS Ousts Officials After Accounting Probe. Bloomberg (11/28, Kammel) reports, "Affiliated Computer Services Inc., the world's biggest processor of student loans, ousted Chief Executive Officer Mark A. King and finance chief Warren D. Edwards after a probe showed that stock options were backdated." Bloomberg continues, "King, 49, and Edwards quit yesterday after violating the company's code of ethics with options awards, according to a statement today. Chief Operating Officer Lynn Blodgett, 52, will become CEO and John Rexford, 49, will be chief financial officer." Bloomberg adds, "The two managers at the Dallas-based company are among more than 60 executives that have left their jobs after investigations into whether options grants were backdated and compensation costs misreported. Options probes to see whether grants were retroactively dated to increase their value to executives and other recipients have affected at least 187 companies. … The incorrect accounting unearthed in the probe, which scrutinized option practices between 1994 and 2005, will lead to about $51 million in costs plus tax-related expenses, the company said. The sum may be higher or lower depending on the final outcome. Affiliated Computer said it has yet to determine whether it will need to restate earnings as a result of the adjustment."

Corporate Counsel Positions Draw More Scrutiny, Higher Pay. The Financial Times (11/28, Masters) reports, "Becoming a corporate general counsel used to be something leading American lawyers did to slow down. … The jobs were considered relatively low-key, low-profile and low-paid, at least in comparison to a partner at a big law firm, and lawyers who went in-house often held their jobs until they retired or got bored." The Times continues, "Not any more. In the wake of the 2002-03 corporate scandals and the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate accountability law, general counsels are now central figures at most US companies, often reporting directly to the board and often appearing on the list of the five highest paid corporate officers. … The post has also become a much riskier assignment. In the past six months, 12 public companies have changed chief legal officers amid investigations into whether the firms illegally backdated stock options grants to pump up executive compensation." The Times adds, "Between the departures over stock options and ordinary turnover, the American market for in-house lawyers is hopping, search firm executives say. In-demand candidates are fielding multiple inquiries and compensation packages are rising. … The average bonus for the nation's 100 highest-paid general counsels was $906,820 last year, up 16 per cent, and the average restricted stock grant was nearly $1m, up 35 per cent, according to a study of Securities and Exchange Commission filings by Corporate Counsel magazine. … When salaries were included, the total average package reached nearly $2.5m." The Times notes, "Worried boards are asking for candidates with a different set of skills than they did 15 years ago. Back then, companies wanted merger-and-acquisition experience and investment banking ties. … Now even companies not facing immediate regulatory problems want former prosecutors and SEC enforcement lawyers. … Search firms date the shift to the Enron and WorldCom scandals, which put corporate fraud on the public radar. Since then, Fortune 500 companies PepsiCo, Lockheed Martin, Boeing and Estée Lauder have all turned to lawyers with Justice Department experience."

Judge Sets January Date For Milberg Weiss Trial. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, Simons) reports, "The trial of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, a prominent class-action law firm, and two of its top partners, will get under way (in Los Angeles) Jan. 8, 2008, a federal judge said at a hearing Monday." The Journal continues, "The setting of the trial date came amid further questions from defense lawyers about whether government prosecutors would file additional indictments, a subject that has been a sticking point in setting a firm trial date." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors had been aiming for a trial date in October 2007, while defendants were seeking a February 2008 setting. … Federal Judge John Walter started Monday's hearing suggesting an October trial date. Defense attorneys balked, saying that wasn't enough time to prepare for a case if more indictments were filed against Milberg Weiss. … 'October is unrealistic to get this done in an orderly way,' said Bill Taylor, the lead attorney for Milberg Weiss." The Journal notes, "So far, the government's efforts to obtain further indictments have remained under seal at the request of prosecutors, and Judge Walter said at the hearing that the efforts were 'a red herring' in the case. … In May, a federal grand jury here indicted the firm on fraud charges. According to the 20-count indictment, the firm paid plaintiffs millions of dollars in exchange for filing more than 150 lawsuits. Two of the firm's top partners, Steven Schulman and David Bershad, also were charged with participating in the alleged kickback scheme."

Epstein Decries Deferred Prosecution Agreements. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (11/28, A14), Richard A. Epstein, who is the James Parker Hall Distinguished Service Professor of Law at the University of Chicago and the Peter and Kirsten Bedford Senior Fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University, writes, "Corporations suffer a peculiar vulnerability. The rules of criminal liability allow federal and state prosecutors to unduly punish those corporations that fall within their crosshairs. But the recent emergence of deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) to force major changes in corporate governance should give pause to even the most ardent populist." Epstein continues, "A DPA is a provisional settlement of a criminal lawsuit whereby the prosecutor agrees to suspend -- but not to dismiss -- any prosecution in exchange for the corporation's promise to reform its internal operations in specified ways. A sensible settlement can split the difference, by having a defendant pay half the maximum fine or sentence. But with corporations they take on an entirely different -- and sinister -- complexion. … The last thing a corporation fears (since it cannot be imprisoned) is the maximum fine from a successful criminal conviction. Rather, the deadly force of the DPA rests in a combination of two key factors: vicarious corporate criminal liability, and the collateral consequences of the initial indictment prior to, and independent of, any eventual conviction." Epstein adds, "Writing in January 2003, Larry Thompson, then deputy U.S. attorney general, exhorted federal prosecutors to use vicarious liability to extract favorable settlements to reform corporate defendants from the outside. The Thompson memorandum insisted that corporations receive a temporary reprieve only if they purge themselves of individual wrongdoers and agree to extensive government oversight to make them walk the straight and narrow path. … In pursuing Mr. Thompson's strategy, prosecutors face both a dilemma and an opportunity. Their only credible threat against a recalcitrant corporation is the criminal indictment -- yet simply filing an indictment triggers huge collateral repercussions sufficient to drive the firm out of business, as teams of state and federal regulators are now duty-bound to suspend the licenses and permits under which the corporation does business. Thus, the corporation that has strong protections against false convictions -- proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the elements of the crime, the ability to examine evidence or cross-examine witnesses -- is helpless to protect itself. A conviction carries at most a million-dollar fine, but simple indictment, which lies wholly within the prosecutor's discretion, imposes multibillion-dollar losses. … Faced with that kind of pressure, the indictment is all that matters. Yet given these weird incentives, DPAs no longer serve the public interest. … At bottom, corporations are just individuals tied together by an elaborate network of contracts; and we don't need yet another sorry reminder of how mindless government policies harm the innocent shareholders whom they are supposed to protect. The government has a vital role in criminal enforcement. So let it go after real, i.e., human, criminals the old-fashioned way, by careful investigation and skilled prosecution."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US To Appeal Reversal Of Ex-San Diego Councilman's Conviction. The AP (11/28) reports, "The Justice Department said Monday that it will appeal a federal judge's ruling that overturned a jury conviction of a former City Council member accused of taking money from a strip club owner in exchange for political favors." The AP continues, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam poured significant resources into winning a conviction against Michael Zucchet in July 2005, forcing the councilman to resign and relinquish his position as interim mayor. Four months later, U.S. District Court Judge Jeffrey Miller acquitted Zucchet, saying the evidence against him on charges of fraud and extortion was insufficient. … 'Because it is rare for a trial judge to overturn a jury's unanimous finding of guilt, it should not surprise anyone that the government would seek to defend the jury's verdicts on appeal,' Lam said in a statement." The AP adds, 'Zucchet's attorney, Jerry Coughlan, insisted on Zucchet's innocence. … 'They've got an uphill battle ahead of them to convince an appellate court that one of the best judges around was wrong,' Coughlan said. … Zucchet and fellow former Councilman Ralph Inzunza were convicted of taking money from Las Vegas strip club owner Michael Galardi in exchange for trying to ease restrictions on touching dancers at San Diego strip clubs."

Fan Accused Of Hacking Cell Phone Of Rock Singer. The AP (11/28) reports from Albuquerque, NM, "A woman is accused of using a computer at a national laboratory to hack into a cell phone company's Web site to get a number for Chester Bennington, lead singer of the Grammy-winning rock group Linkin Park." The AP continues, "According to an affidavit filed by the Department of Defense Inspector General, Devon Townsend, 27, obtained copies of Bennington's cell phone bill, the phone numbers he called and digital pictures taken with the phone. … Investigators said she also hacked into the e-mail of Bennington's wife, Talinda Bennington, and at one point called her and threatened her." The AP adds, "Talinda Bennington told federal authorities last month that someone had accessed their Verizon Wireless account online, according to the affidavit, and expressed concern that a 'stalker' had access to personal information. .. .Townsend waived her right to a preliminary hearing Tuesday in U.S. District Court and was released to her mother's custody. She is accused of using a computer at her former workplace, Sandia National Laboratories, to access Bennington's cell phone information. Lab spokesman Michael Padilla said Wednesday that she no longer worked there."

New York Man Faces Death Penalty For Killing Two Detectives. The New York Times (11/28, Brick) reports on the 2003 fatalities of two detectives and writes, "The man on trial for their killing in federal district court in Brooklyn, Ronell Wilson, 24, faces the death penalty on charges of murder in furtherance of racketeering. Prosecutors have dropped charges of obstruction of justice murder, because a witness crucial to those charges rescinded his earlier account that Mr. Wilson knew the men were detectives. That witness, like several others in the case, was a member of the so-called Stapleton Crew, a street gang that prosecutors said sold drugs and guns, shot, robbed and terrorized a path across Staten Island."

The New York Sun (11/28, Goldstein) reports, "A federal prosecutor told a jury yesterday that the Staten Island man accused of executing two undercover detectives during a gun sale in 2003 had considered that his victims might be police and simply 'did not care.'" The Sun continues, "The defendant, Ronell Wilson, now 24, could face the death penalty if convicted in a trial that opened yesterday in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn. But the judge, Nicholas Garaufis, instructed the 12 jurors and six alternates not to think about sentencing Mr. Wilson during the first stage of the trial, as they decided the factual question of his guilt or innocence of the federal racketeering crimes he is charged with." The Sun adds, "Mr. Wilson is a reputed leader of the Stapleton Crew, a gang named after the Staten Island housing project of the same name. Mr. Wilson is accused of killing detectives James Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews as he gave them driving directions from the back seat of the car. … The car, a Nissan Maxima, is at the center of the case. The ride began at about 7:15 p.m. on March 10, 2003, when the detectives pulled up in front of Wilson, then 20, and his 17-year-old associate Jesse Jacobus at the housing development." The Sun notes, "The aim of the detectives, both members of the elite Firearms Investigation Unit, was to purchase a TEC-9 submachine gun for $1,200 and get 'one more gun out of the hands of one more violent criminal,' an assistant U.S. attorney, Colleen Kavanagh, said. A half-hour later, the bodies of detectives were found in a nearby street. Both men had been shot in the head."

FBI Expands Investigation Of Former Newark Mayor. The Newark Star-Ledger (11/28, Shearn, Martin) reports, "A federal investigation into the administration of former Newark Mayor Sharpe James has expanded, with more subpoenas delivered to City Hall and agents now scrutinizing real estate deals that benefited some of the ex-mayor's biggest supporters, according to sources close to the probe. FBI agents in recent weeks have interviewed a number of city employees, and prosecutors also have demanded additional records from Newark City Hall, among them personnel files of at least four current and former city employees, including James' son, Elliot." The Star-Ledger adds, "While investigators continue to look at travel-related expenses, they are also probing the administration's sale of surplus city lots to developers at cut-rate prices, according to sources familiar with the investigation. Among those winning the no-bid contracts were several people with close ties to James, including some with little or no development experience, a Star-Ledger investigation found in 2005."

Investigators Identify Third Victim Of New Jersey Serial Killer. The New York Times (11/28, Kocieniewski, Schweber, 1.16M) reports, "Investigators yesterday released the identity of the third of four women found dead last week in a ditch near a squalid strip of motels just outside Atlantic City. They noted that like two other victims, she, too, had a history of prostitution arrests. The victim, Barbara Breidor, 42, is believed to have been dumped into the ravine about two weeks before pedestrians discovered the women's bodies on Nov. 20, according to a statement by the Atlantic County prosecutor, Jeffrey S. Blitz. … All four victims were found in several inches of water behind a $15-a-night motel, barefoot and with their heads facing in the same direction, a few hundred feet apart, Mr. Blitz has said." The Times notes, "Local authorities have formed a task force with the New Jersey State Police and the F.B.I. to try to solve the killings."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/28, Anastasia, Urgo, 385K) reports, "Earlier this year, three suspected prostitutes were attacked" in Atlantic City. "All three were slashed across the throat," and the "unsolved crimes have attracted the attention of investigators" in the current case. "'Major Crimes, the FBI and the state police have been in,' said Atlantic City Police Detective Richard Johnson, a city arson investigator who worked on the Georgia Avenue cases. Johnson was quick to point out that there was no hard evidence linking the Georgia Avenue slashings to the marsh killings, which some have attributed to a serial killer. Investigators are interested because all of the victims were apparently prostitutes, Johnson said."

Fairfax County To Seek FBI Help In Investigation Of Similar Murders. The Washington Times (11/28, Cella, 88K) reports, "Fairfax County police plan to ask for help from the FBI as they investigate the recent killings of two similar-looking elderly women who shared the same first name and lived two miles apart." Police spokeswoman Camille Neville "said that officers canvassing the Springfield neighborhood near where the women were killed received some 'promising' tips." The Times adds, "Police said that they have not connected the two killings through physical evidence but are investigating the similarities. Officer Neville said police are planning to ask for help from the FBI's Quantico, Va.-based Behavioral Science Unit, which develops profiles of suspects based on evidence patterns."

FBI Investigating Kentucky Prison Slayings. The Lexington (KY) Herald-Leader (11/28, Mueller) reports, "Federal authorities are investigating the second slaying in less than three weeks at a maximum security prison in Eastern Kentucky. Prison authorities Monday confirmed the stabbing death of Shamoni Peterson, 32, on Nov. 13, three weeks after the U.S. Penitentiary-Big Sandy in Martin County reported the first slaying since it opened in 2003." The Herald-Leader adds, "Prison spokeswoman Mashelle Arisman said that no charges have been filed in either case, but that the FBI is investigating. Arisman said the prison, which houses 1,600 high-security inmates near the Johnson County line, has been placed on lockdown status during the investigation."

Iowa Man Pleads Guilty To Lying To FBI In Murder Probe. The Cedar Rapids Gazette (11/28, de Souza Guedes) reports, "In a small federal courtroom crowded with reporters, investigators and members of Evelyn Miller's family, Danny Slick pleaded guilty to lying during a July 3, 2005, interview with the FBI about Evelyn's disappearance. … Slick was accused of lying to FBI agents…about a drug dealer known as 'Porky' and where 'Porky' lived. Slick's friend Randy Patrie, 34, told Slick that he had stopped to get 'dope' at 'Porky's' after he dropped off Slick at their residence…after the two men left the apartment where Evelyn lived with her family. At the time of Slick's arrest, authorities said it was an important step forward in piecing together the events that led to the disappearance of Evelyn and her death." The AP (11/28) also reports on the plea.

Investigators Have No Idea What Befell Missing Minnesota Boys. The Minneapolis Star-Tribune (11/28, Collins, Meryhew) reports, "Now that the air and ground crews are gone, the question on everyone's mind is: If Tristan and Avery didn't wander away from their home, then what happened to them? 'We just don't have any indicators one way or another,' on whether the brothers wandered off or whether foul play was involved, FBI Special Agent Paul McCabe said Monday." The Star-Tribune adds, "After five days of intense searching, McCabe said they haven't ruled out the possibility the boys might still be on the Red Lake Reservation in northern Minnesota. 'Whenever you do a ground search, you can't always be sure,' he said. 'There's never a guarantee every area has been covered, even after a thorough search.' … The FBI has set up a tip hot line at 1-866-333-4969."

New York Woman Pleads Guilty To Online Extortion Plot. The New York Post (11/28, Mangan, 631K) reports, "A pretty, young swindler who first met a top Pepsi Bottling Group executive online later anonymously shook him down for $125,000 by threatening to tell his wife, children and bosses he was trolling the 'Net at work for women, shocking court papers reveal. 'I'm sure this will be an unpleasant surprise. I'm sure when your wife finds out that you've been looking for a fill-in for her . . . it will be unpleasant for her, too,' Jessica Wolcott, 22, e-mailed multimillionaire exec Gary Wandschneider, 54, in August." The Post notes, "Wolcott eventually got the funds transferred to her online account - but only after Wandschneider alerted the FBI, which provided the money and set up a sting to nail her. … When Wandschneider learned her name from FBI agents, he told them he had met her last February through the craigslist.org Web site. … Wolcott pleaded guilty to the extortion scheme in White Plains federal court last week."

Massachusetts Man Pleads Guilty In Corruption Probe. The Springfield (MA) Republican (11/28, Flynn) reports, "A former Springfield Housing Authority maintenance foreman yesterday became the 25th defendant to be convicted or admit guilt in Springfield's corruption probe. He pleaded guilty to two felonies for his role in building the Rhode Island summer home of ex-City Councilor Francis G. Keough III." The Republican continues, "Daniel J. McNamee, 40, of Springfield, pleaded guilty to one count of obstruction of justice and one count of filing a false federal tax return during a hearing before Judge Michael A. Ponsor in U.S. District Court." The Republican adds, "The guilty pleas were part of a deal with the U.S. Justice Department that will spare McNamee a trial but potentially expose him to 12 to 18 months in prison, Ponsor said. Sentencing was set for March 1. … The pace of the six-year federal corruption offensive has picked up since August, with 10 defendants pleading guilty and two others accepting plea deals in the housing authority scandal."

Music Star Pleads Guilty To Shooting Tame Bear. The St Paul Pioneer Press (11/28) reports, "Country music star Troy Lee Gentry admitted Monday that 'Cubby,' the bear he killed on a Minnesota farm in 2004, wasn't a wild beast after all." The P-P continues, "Appearing in federal court in Duluth on the day his trial was to start, Gentry pleaded guilty to a charge of falsely claiming the animal was wild. The charge, a misdemeanor, was the result of a plea bargain reached last week with federal prosecutors. … 'He's glad to get it over with,' said Gentry's attorney, Ron Meshbesher, of Minneapolis. 'Obviously, he's saddened by all the publicity in this case, which inferred all kinds of improper conduct.'" The P-P adds, "Gentry, 39, and Lee Marvin Greenly, 46, who owns Minnesota Wildlife Connection near Sandstone, were charged in August with conspiracy and falsely 'tagging' the 'trophy-caliber' bear by claiming it was shot in the wild. In reality, the tame bear was shot in a fenced area of several acres. … After the indictment, Gentry's Nashville agent shifted the blame for any improper conduct to Greenly, and online fan discussion forums were abuzz with debate over whether Gentry was a bona fide big-game hunter or a wannabe." The P-P notes, "Gentry, in a statement released by his management company, said he regrets what happened, but he stops short of accepting any culpability other than relying on Greenly's guidance. … Meshbesher and the U.S. attorney's office worked out the plea bargain last week, and Gentry entered his new plea Monday morning before U.S. District Judge Paul Magnuson, sitting in Duluth. … In return for the guilty plea, prosecutors dropped a felony count against Gentry."

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS Will Not Reinstate $10.1 Billion Tobacco Verdict. Bloomberg (11/28) reports, "The Supreme Court refused to revive a $10.1 billion award against Philip Morris USA yesterday, rejecting an appeal from smokers who said they were misled about the health risks of 'light' cigarettes." Bloomberg continues, "The justices, without comment, left intact an Illinois Supreme Court decision that threw out the case against Philip Morris, which is a division of the Altria Group and is the nation's largest cigarette maker. … Antismoking activists had hoped the verdict would be the first in a series of awards around the country against the industry over light cigarettes. … 'It's clearly the end of lights litigation in Illinois,' said David Adelman, a Morgan Stanley analyst who has an overweight rating on Altria. Altria shares fell 33 cents, to $83.42, in New York Stock Exchange composite trading." Bloomberg adds, "In overturning the award last year, the Illinois Supreme Court said smokers could not invoke a state consumer protection law because the Federal Trade Commission had endorsed the 'light' and 'low tar' descriptions in settlements with other cigarette makers. Like many states, Illinois bars claims over actions specifically authorized by a government agency."

The AP (11/28) reports, "The case involved 1.1 million people who bought 'light' cigarettes in Illinois. They claimed Philip Morris knew when it introduced such cigarettes in 1971 that they were no healthier than regular cigarettes but hid both that information and that light cigarettes actually had a more toxic form of tar. … An Illinois judge ruled in favor of the smokers in March 2003, saying the company misled customers into believing they were buying a less harmful cigarette. … A separate case involving Philip Morris is pending before the Supreme Court. Justices are considering whether to allow a punitive damages award of $79.5 million to the widow of a longtime smoker."

States Move To Protect Children From Second-Hand Smoke. USA Today (11/28, Bazar) reports, "Anti-tobacco forces are opening a new front in the war against smoking by banning it in private places such as homes and cars when children are present." USA continues, "Starting Jan. 1, Texas will restrict smoking in foster parents' homes at all times and in cars when children are present, says Darrell Azar of the Department of Family and Protective Services. … Vermont, Washington and other states and counties already prohibit foster parents from smoking around children in their homes and cars. … Arkansas and Louisiana passed laws this year forbidding anyone from smoking in cars carrying young children. Courts are ordering smoke-free environments in custody and visitation disputes. … 'We are very rapidly moving to protect children from secondhand smoke,' says John Banzhaf, executive director of Action on Smoking and Health. 'Even from their own parents and grandparents.'" USA notes, "Former surgeon general Richard Carmona said in June that children exposed to secondhand smoke suffer an increased risk of respiratory ailments and sudden infant death syndrome. … Most smoking bans apply to workplaces and spots like bars and restaurants. … Smokers' rights groups liken banning smoking in private to the 'Salem witch hunt,' says Gary Nolan, spokesman for The Smoker's Club, Inc. He says secondhand smoke is not dangerous. 'If we don't reverse this, they'll be telling us what we can eat and what we can feed our children,' Nolan says."

US Pushes For Conviction Of Driver In Human Smuggling Deaths. The AP (11/28, Lozano) reports, "A prosecutor on Monday described the truck driver at the center of America's deadliest human smuggling attempt as a 'vile and heartless person' who ignored the pleas of the illegal immigrants stuffed in his trailer as the temperature inside rose." The AP continues, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors in closing arguments that Tyrone Williams, a Jamaican citizen, was concerned only with getting paid, not the welfare of the illegal immigrants he was transporting during the failed 2003 smuggling attempt. Nineteen people died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation. … Williams' attorney, Craig Washington, acknowledged Williams is guilty of transporting illegal immigrants, but he insisted Williams never meant to hurt them." The AP adds, "Rodriguez said Williams failed to turn on his vehicle's air conditioning, which would have prevented the deaths. When Williams found out his passengers had punched holes through the trailer's back doors in an attempt to get fresh air and call for help, his only concern was getting more money to pay for the damage, Rodriguez said. … During his closing statements, Rodriguez showed the jury crime scene photos of the 19 victims. .. 'This government takes no pleasure in showing you these horrific photos,' Rodriguez said. 'These deceased individuals can only testify through these photos.' … Williams is charged with 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting illegal immigrants. He faces a possible death sentence if convicted."

Informant Denies Buying Drugs At Home Of Slain Elderly Atlanta Woman. CNN.com (11/28) reports, "An informant cited in a search warrant as having purchased narcotics at an elderly Atlanta woman's house denies buying drugs there, authorities say." CNN continues, "Undercover officers raiding the 88-year-old woman's house shot her to death last week after she fired on them while they broke down her door in a high-crime neighborhood. … Federal prosecutors will investigate the case, Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington announced Monday." CNN adds, "Pennington said the eight-member narcotics squad that took part in the raid has been placed on paid leave while investigators look into the informant's story and the circumstances surrounding the Nov. 21 death of Kathryn Johnston. The informant also told investigators from the Atlanta police internal affairs bureau that he was told to lie about the matter, the chief said. … 'The FBI will investigate his statements, along with the police officers' statements as well,' Pennington said. … Police said Johnston opened fire on police who tried to enter her home, prying off burglar bars and forcing open her door, during a "no-knock" drug raid last Tuesday. Officers returned fire, killing her. … Relatives put Johnston's age at 92, but Fulton County medical examiners said she was 88."

McKinney Calls For DOJ Probe Of Shooting. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/28, Gentry) reports, "U.S. Rep. Cynthia McKinney has added her voice to a growing chorus of prominent Americans concerned about a spate of high-profile police shootings, including one that killed a New York man the day of his wedding." The AJC continues, "The congresswoman has asked the Justice Department to investigate police-involved shootings around the nation, including in her home district of DeKalb County, where police have fatally shot a dozen people this year. … 'There is a belief by some citizens that the police-involved shootings are steeped in the intentional use of excessive force, even deadly force,' McKinney said in a Nov. 25 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. 'There definitely appears to be a developing national pattern of police misconduct and abuse resulting in an inordinately high number of serious injuries and deaths to the victims.'" The AJC adds, "McKinney has also asked the House Judiciary Committee to conduct hearings on 'the state of America's law enforcement agencies' use of force and deadly force and the impact on Americans on the basis of race and economic standing,' her letter said."

New York Mayor Calls Police Shooting "Unacceptable." The New York Times (11/28, Cardwell, Chan) reports, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg convened an extraordinary meeting of black religious leaders and elected officials at City Hall yesterday to calm frayed tempers over the fatal police shooting of an unarmed black man in Queens, calling the circumstances 'inexplicable' and 'unacceptable.' … 'It sounds to me like excessive force was used,' the mayor said of the conduct of the officers, who fired 50 shots outside a Queens nightclub early Saturday, killing Sean Bell, 23, hours before he was to be wed, and injuring two others. 'I can tell you that it is to me unacceptable or inexplicable how you can have 50-odd shots fired.'" The Times continues, "Mr. Bloomberg made the remarks after meeting with some of the city's most influential black politicians and community leaders, including Representative Charles B. Rangel, the Rev. Al Sharpton and dozens of others. … The mayor's decision to meet with Mr. Sharpton and other black leaders was a stark turnabout from the approach of Mr. Bloomberg's predecessor, Rudolph W. Giuliani, who did not reach out to black leaders in the immediate aftermath of the fatal 1999 shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed African immigrant who died in a hail of 41 police bullets." The Times adds, "Mayor Bloomberg's blunt assessment of events still under investigation was striking, although he took pains to point out that the facts were not all in, saying several times that he did not yet know what happened in the shooting, but that he expected that a grand jury would be impaneled by the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown. … In a move that suggests the officers feel their actions were justified, the lawyer representing the men said he had contacted Mr. Brown's office and offered to have the officers speak to prosecutors and appear before a grand jury voluntarily without immunity. The police have not released the officers' names, saying they are trying to protect them from retaliation or harassment."

The Washington Post (11/28, A3, Powell, Shulman) reports, "Once again a hail of police bullets has ended the life of an unarmed black New Yorker, and the city's mayor finds himself walking an uncertain line between reassuring black and Latino residents and defending his police force." The Post continues, "With a City Council member saying that black people are being 'murdered' and some black clergy signaling their discontent with Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R), who is white, walked into a news conference Monday and spoke of his profound unease with the shooting by undercover police that claimed the life of a bridegroom on his wedding day. … In a visible symbol of Bloomberg's concern, he was accompanied by a number of prominent black pastors and politicians, including activist preacher Al Sharpton and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.). The night before, Sharpton journeyed to the Community Church of Christ in the Jamaica neighborhood of Queens and vowed that he was going to 'keep this in the street.'"

The AP (11/28, Hajela) reports, "An angry crowd shouted 'No justice, no peace!' Some called for the ouster of the city's police commissioner. Many counted off to 50, the number of rounds that are estimated to have been fired by police at three unarmed men, killing one on his wedding day." The AP continues, "Several hundred people gathered Sunday for a vigil and rally to demand answers about why officers let fly a flurry of bullets at 23-year-old Sean Bell early Saturday, hours before he was supposed to marry the mother of his two young children. … The five officers were placed on paid administrative leave and stripped of their guns, said Paul Browne, chief spokesman for the NYPD. Police and prosecutors promised a full investigation. … But none of that stemmed the fury of a community outraged by the shootings. … 'We cannot allow this to continue to happen,' the Rev. Al Sharpton said at the gathering outside Mary Immaculate Hospital, where one of the two wounded men was in critical condition. 'We've got to understand that all of us were in that car.'" The AP notes, "Some in the crowd called for the removal of Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly, yelling 'Kelly must go!' … Kelly has said that police shot at the car after it drove forward and struck an undercover officer and an unmarked police minivan. The information was based on interviews with witnesses and two officers who did not fire their weapons, he said. … But a witness account emerged Monday disputing that version of events."

NYTimes Says Police Department Must Account For Shooting Of Unarmed Man. The New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Mayor Michael Bloomberg and his police commissioner, Raymond Kelly, are dealing differently with their own Diallo-style disaster. Police officers firing 50 rounds early last Saturday killed Sean Bell, an unarmed man who was to have married his high school sweetheart later in the day." Mayor Michael Bloomberg has "rightly called for a quick and impartial investigation. The officers must be held accountable for what has happened. But the Police Department must also confront the fact that a disaster that everyone swore to prevent seven years ago has repeated itself in Queens."

LAPD Probe Assigns No Blame In Shooting Death Of Toddler. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Mcgreevy, Winton) reports, "So many bullets were discharged during a siege last year at a South Los Angeles auto shop that investigators cannot determine which Los Angeles Police Department officer fired the shot that killed 19-month-old Suzie Pena, Chief William J. Bratton said Monday." The Times continues, "The finding, which comes after a 15-month investigation that used top outside weapons experts, complicates the Police Commission's task Tuesday in deciding whether the officers should be disciplined. … Suzie Pena was shot twice as her father held her in front of him as he exchanged gunfire with LAPD officers in July 2005. The fatal shot hit Suzie in the head but did not lodge there, and investigators could not determine which bullet fragment they recovered had hit her." The Times adds, "Her death set off a debate about LAPD tactics, prompting investigations by the FBI and Los Angeles County district attorney's office as well as calls for better rules in the way SWAT officers respond to hostage standoffs. … Bratton described the investigation as one of the most complex in LAPD history. It involved microscopic analysis of 250 fired bullets and casings, involving 13 firearms, and more than 80 interviews with witnesses and 36 DNA tests."

High Court Hears Pay-Bias Case. The AP (11/28, Sherman) reports, "Employees must complain about pay discrimination within six months or forfeit their claim, the Supreme Court was told Monday in a case closely watched by companies and civil rights groups." The AP continues, "Justices engaged in a lively but inconclusive debate about how to apply a 180-day deadline for complaining about discriminatory pay decisions under Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964." The AP adds, "Lilly Ledbetter sued Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., claiming that after 19 years at the company's Gadsden, Ala., plant, she was making $6,000 a year less than the lowest-paid man in the same job. .. Ledbetter claimed the disparity existed for years and was primarily a result of her gender. A jury agreed, but an appeals court overturned the verdict." The AP notes, "Lawyers for Goodyear and the Bush administration argued against her claim. … Glen Nager, Goodyear's attorney, said the appeals court was correct. … 'Bring that claim or lose it,' he said. … Justice Department lawyer Irving Gorenstein said if the court were to side with Ledbetter, 'it would undo the statute of limitations in pay cases.' … But Ledbetter's lawyer, Kevin Russell, told the justices that each smaller paycheck should be treated as a new act of discrimination."

The New York Times (11/28, Greenhouse) reports, "Federal law prohibits discrimination on the job, requiring employers to pay their employees without regard to race, sex, religion or national origin. Many complexities lie behind that simple statement, as a Supreme Court argument on Monday made abundantly clear." The Times continues, "The question for the court was how to treat a discriminatory action that happened long ago, beyond the statute of limitations for the federal Civil Rights Act, but that has effects that continue to the present day. Is each new paycheck, reflecting a salary lower than it would have been without the initial discrimination, a recurring violation that sets the clock running again? Or does the passage of time, without fresh acts of intentional discrimination, render the initial injury a nonevent in the eyes of the law?"

EEOC Seeks To Block Discovery In Sidley Age Bias Case. The New York Law Journal (11/28, Lin) reports, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which is suing law firm Sidley Austin for allegedly demoting around 30 partners on the basis of age, is seeking to block discovery concerning the subsequent job performance of several of the former partners, as well as the mental health of one." The Journal continues, "Chicago-based Sidley has denied having a mandatory retirement policy and claims that the partners at issue were demoted in 1999 due to performance factors, including low billable hours and poor business development skills. The firm is hoping to show that new employers encountered similar performance from demoted partners who left Sidley. … But in a motion for a protective order filed Nov. 17 in Chicago federal court, the EEOC asked that Sidley be denied discovery relating to the billable hours, equity status and business development efforts of six former partners now working at other firms. The agency, which is arguing that performance reasons for the demotions were pretextual, called the information sought by Sidley 'not relevant to any disputed fact' in the case. … 'Evidence concerning the Former Partners' hours, billings, business development and time devoted to specific clients at the Subsequent Firms would not have any tendency to prove or disprove whether such factors actually motivated Sidley's decision to change Former Partners' status in 1999,' the EEOC said in its motion before Judge James Zagel of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois." The Journal notes, "The agency, which has agreed to stipulate that Sidley's records concerning billable hours and other performance metrics are accurate, also highlighted a potential hazard to former partners of permitting the firm to seek such records from those partners' current firms."

Groups Plan To Press For ERA As Democrats Take Over Congress. The Washington Times (11/28, Wetzstein, 88K) reports, "The Democratic takeover of Congress should revive interest in an issue many Americans think is settled -- adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment -- as new bipartisan groups pursue the Republican-leaning states needed for its ratification. … Supporters say that despite advancements for women's rights since the ERA's official death in 1982 -- primarily prohibitions against sex discrimination -- the constitutional amendment is needed because women lag in career advancement and pay equity." The Times adds, "The ERA has its veteran supporters, such as the National Council of Women's Organizations. But in recent years, at least two new groups have emerged with the mission of getting three more state ratifications." The Time specifically cites the ERA Campaign Network and www.4ERA.org.

ANTITRUST:

Supreme Court Hears Arguments In Telecommunications Antitrust Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, Bravin, 2.04M) reports that in a "case with implications for antitrust enforcement, the Supreme Court heard arguments on how specific a plaintiff's allegations must be to claim anticompetitive behavior." The 1996 Telecommunications Act "gave the Bell system's regional successors, the Baby Bells, the right to sell long-distance service in return for opening their local networks to competitors. Despite Congress's expectation the law would create a competitive market, the Baby Bells have remained dominant in their respective regions." The plaintiffs, "a group of individuals who bought local telephone and Internet service since the law was enacted and represented by the class-action firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, filed suit in 2003, alleging the Baby Bells conspired to restrict entry into their territories of competitors in local telephone and Internet service." The plaintiffs had "no direct evidence of such a conspiracy, however, and instead based their claim on circumstantial indicators of anticompetitive behavior, such as the parallel conduct of the Baby Bells in declining to compete in each other's territory and allegedly impeding other carriers from connecting to their networks. The Baby Bells argued that without more -- such as an allegation of a specific meeting in which a deal was made to restrain trade -- the case should be dismissed without allowing the plaintiffs discovery of internal documents."

Market Watch (11/28, Anderson) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court Monday pressed both sides in its search for how much evidence plaintiffs must provide to litigate a private antitrust conspiracy lawsuit against several Baby Bell companies." Market Watch continues, "Verizon Communications Inc., BellSouth Corp., AT&T Inc.'s SBC Communications Inc. unit, and Qwest Communications International Inc. have all been trying to block a class-action lawsuit alleging they engaged in an anticompetitive conspiracy to restrict competition in the local telephone and broadband Internet markets. … The lawsuit is still in its early stages. The companies and the U.S. Justice Department, at oral arguments on the appeal, urged the Supreme Court to set private antitrust lawsuit standards that ends the case before expensive legal discovery takes place."

The Deal (11/28, Lindell) reports, "U.S. Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer on Monday didn't seem too impressed with the notion that competitors taking similar actions is enough to file a lawsuit charging antitrust violations. … 'If you're right,' Breyer told J. Douglas Richards, attorney for respondent William Twombly, who filed a class action against Bell Atlantic Corp. and the rest of the telecommunications companies, 'I guess we can engage in a major restructuring of our economy.'" The Deal continues, "Twombly charged the phone companies had violated the Sherman Act -- which prohibits conspiracies -- by agreeing not to compete outside the regions in which each was essentially the dominant phone provider. The proof that there was an actual agreement was a statement in the initial brief that said that the same decision by all the companies was contrary to the interest of the firms, Richards told the court. … 'Conduct against self interest is a way [for the court] to infer a violation' of the Sherman Act, Richards said. … But he was having a hard time arguing with eight justices who appeared incredulous and at times jockeyed for a chance to ask more questions, with only Justice Clarence Thomas remaining apart from his querulous brethren. … 'You have a suspicion and you want to use the discovery process to see if that is true, isn't that the case?' Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg asked Richards." The Deal notes, "The high cost of discovery, which would trigger class actions that businesses would have to settle rather than litigate, is the big fear of the various companies and individuals filing friend of the court briefs in this matter, including the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, The Commonwealth of Virginia and 15 other states, a group of economists, and MasterCard International Inc."

The AP (11/28) reports, "The case, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, stems from the deregulation of the telecommunications industry in the 1980s and 1990s, with some experts citing it as the most important antitrust case to reach the Supreme Court in 20 years. … The case is being closely watched by numerous companies, including airlines, credit card issuers and trade associations representing the wireless communications and pharmaceutical industries, all of whom have submitted or signed onto friend-of-the-court briefs." The AP adds, "A federal district court dismissed Twombly's case, finding that Twombly did not allege sufficient facts to indicate that a conspiracy would likely be proven during a trial. But Twombly argued that a conspiracy could be inferred from the so-called 'parallel conduct' or behavior of the defendants. … The Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the district court, however, finding in October 2005 that a plaintiff must submit only a 'short and plain statement of the claim' and not a detailed set of facts in order to survive a motion to dismiss. .. .The Baby Bells appealed to the Supreme Court. A low standard, corporations say, would enable 'meritless' and 'abusive' cases to go forward, forcing many businesses to settle those cases rather than endure the expense of litigation, including the discovery process in which defendants must produce documentation of certain facts for the plaintiff."

The Financial Times (11/28, Washington) reports, "The case could be the most important antitrust case before the court in 20 years, legal sources say. Big business has won all 11 of the court's recent decisions in antitrust cases. A decision in yesterday's case is expected by June." The Times adds, "The case turns on the question: how high a hurdle must private plaintiffs clear to force big companies to reveal private documents that might prove they conspired with others to commit an antitrust violation? … Ruling in the case, a federal appeals court set a fairly low hurdle, arguing that federal law makes no attempt to discourage such lawsuits. But the telephone companies who are the defendants in the suit argued that such a low standard would give plaintiffs' lawyers a powerful new weapon to force big companies to settle even frivolous lawsuits, since the high cost of 'discovery'…makes it very costly to fight such suits."

Bloomberg (11/28, Stohr) reports, "Business groups are backing the appeal. DuPont Co., MasterCard International, Visa USA, Northwest Airlines Corp., UAL Corp., Louisiana-Pacific Corp. and several industry trade groups all signed briefs siding with the phone companies. … It's one of two antitrust cases the high court will hear this week."

Russian Firm Emerges As Potential Buyer Of Former Weirton Steel Plant. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (11/28, Napsha) reports, "Steelworkers at the former Weirton Steel plant are anticipating that a new owner will be announced this week, one that might restart its steelmaking facilities and add 400 jobs, a union official said Monday." The PTR continues, "Russia's largest steelmaker, OAO Severstal, is the latest to surface as a potential buyer and is said to be in negotiations to acquire the mill, according to published reports in a Moscow newspaper. … Both Severstal and Arcelor Mittal, the current owner at Weirton, declined to comment on the report, which was in the same Moscow newspaper that recently said Severstal wanted to buy Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp. … 'There have been numerous interested parties ... and hopefully we'll have an announcement in the next few days,' said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union at Weirton. Glyptis said he had no firsthand knowledge of the Russian steelmaker's interest in acquiring the former Weirton Steel plant." The PTR adds, "The union is expecting a deal to surface because an agreement expires today between Arcelor Mittal and the U.S. Justice Department for Arcelor Mittal to divest itself of the tinmaking plant at Weirton, or one at Sparrows Point, Md., Glyptis said. .. .The Justice Department reached the deal because of Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor S.A., would give it a corner on tinmaking production in the eastern region of North America. Arcelor Mittal was unable to sell Dofasco Steel of Canada, which also has a tinmaking plant. … If a deal is not reached today, Arcelor Mittal could request a 60-day extension, Glyptis said." The PTR notes, "While the antitrust investigation into the Arcelor Mittal merger remains open, the Justice Department will not comment on the agreement, Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said yesterday. Talamona said she could not comment on whether Arcelor Mittal requested an extension."

Swift Rejects Buyout Offer From Former CEO. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, C4, Vuocolo) reports, "Swift Transportation Co. rejected a $2.2 billion bid from its largest shareholder, former Chief Executive Officer Jerry Moyes, and said it will try to negotiate a higher offer from him or other parties." The Journal continues, "Mr. Moyes is offering $29 a share for the Phoenix truckload carrier, which represented a 21% premium at the time it was made. A special committee of independent board members said the offer was inadequate. … The board committee, which is being advised by Goldman Sachs Group Inc., said it will negotiate with Mr. Moyes for a higher offer. The committee also said it has begun talks with 'other potential financial and strategic buyers.' The term financial buyers typically refers to private-equity firms. The term strategic buyers usually refers to corporations."

Google Gears Up For Antitrust Fight Over Search Rankings. The National Law Journal (11/28, Maclean) reports, "Relegated to electronic Siberia by the Google Inc. search rankings, KinderStart.Com Inc. saw its Web traffic plummet and ad revenue evaporate, so it fought back with an antitrust lawsuit challenging Google's popular ranking system." The Journal continues, "The 2006 suit in federal court in San Jose, Calif., has been dismissed once, and some observers say that the new amended version's antitrust and free speech claims may face an uphill battle to survive. U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel indicated in an Oct. 27 hearing that he may not issue a written ruling until early next year on Google's motion to toss the case. … But the suit raises larger questions about Google's future susceptibility to antitrust claims as the ubiquitous Internet search engine gains steam. … 'Google is so large it runs the risk of slamming into the kind of situation that Microsoft found itself in, in terms of bundling its services together,' said Robert B. Reich, former labor secretary in the Clinton administration and now professor at the University of California's Goldman School of Public Policy. … 'All this means is Google needs to be ready for litigation, even if ultimately it comes out in Google's favor. As a big dominant company playing the pivotal role it plays, it is a sitting duck for all sorts of potential litigation,' Reich said. … As such a big player in the Internet industry, 'not only do you become a target of antitrust plaintiffs, you also can easily use your market heft in such a way as to impose burdens, or disadvantages, on other players,' said Reich." The Journal notes, "Others who watch the high-tech industry closely don't foresee serious antitrust clouds looming on Google's horizon. … 'There is no question Google does have market power in its space,' said Eric Goldman, law and technology professor at Santa Clara University School of Law in Silicon Valley. 'That is a predicate' in antitrust."

Supreme Court To Hear Landmark Patent Case. The Legal Times (11/28, Mauro) reports, "When Kenneth Bass III clerked at the Supreme Court in 1969, his justice, the late Hugo Black, told him confidentially what he thought of patents. … 'He told me that in his lifetime, he had seen only one real invention -- the airplane -- and he wasn't even certain about that one,' says Bass. 'He just didn't like patents.'" The Times continues, "Bass has to hope the current justices don't share that view today, when the Court takes up what he thinks could be the most important patent decision in 40 years. … Now a partner in the D.C. firm Sterne, Kessler, Goldstein & Fox, Bass is part of the legal team that will be defending a disputed patent in the case of KSR International v. Teleflex, which will be heard today. And Black would probably not like the side Bass is on." The Times adds, "Bass represents Pennsylvania auto-parts manufacturer Teleflex, the owner of a patent on an adjustable automobile gas pedal. Teleflex argues in favor of a controversial standard, used by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit to varying degrees for decades, that enabled Teleflex to get and keep the patent. By requiring patent challengers to produce hard evidence, the standard makes it harder to topple a patent based on the assertion that the new product was an obvious extension of prior ideas. … Critics say the standard protects even the most thinly documented patents, opening the floodgates to junk patents for minor innovations and dubious inventions. … Too many easily won patents, critics say, slow creativity and the exchange of ideas, putting 'glue, not grease, into the gears of innovation,' in the words of a brief by the Progress & Freedom Foundation. … But if Teleflex loses and the Supreme Court devises a less-patent-protecting standard, says Bass' co-counsel Thomas Goldstein of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, it will open a very different floodgate. Because 'many millions' of patents were granted under the disputed standard and patents can be challenged at any time, Goldstein says, 'If the Supreme Court does decide to make a substantial change, it will call into question innumerable patents.'"

High Court More Willing To Decide Patent Law Issues. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A1, Bravin, 2.04M) reports that with the economy "increasingly dependent on technological innovation, the Supreme Court is scrutinizing more patent rulings made by a special court that critics say has tilted too far in favor of intellectual-property rights and could be stifling competition." The court on Tuesday "hears arguments in one of three patent cases on this term's docket," and it has "ruled in recent cases on the side of more flexibility in enforcing such rights. If that trend continues, it could translate into weaker protections for patent holders and promote greater access to inventions." The Supreme Court's "newfound assertiveness on core issues of patent law -- after hearing only a handful of cases in the field over 20-plus years -- comes amid a sharp debate over how to maintain American industry's competitive edge while upholding the protections that reward the risk-taking behind cutting-edge inventions." Critics – "including the Bush administration in today's case -- assert that the Federal Circuit has shifted too far toward patent holders, expanding the types of inventions that can be patented and broadening the scope of monopoly a patent affords its holder. The court's defenders say the Federal Circuit was created in part to strengthen patent protections, and that it has succeeded in clarifying the law."

States' Suit To Force EPA Action On Global Warming Reaches Supreme Court. The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, Richey, 59K) reports that seven years ago, a "group of state officials and environmentalists" asked "the EPA to get involved - to take an initial step in response to scientific evidence that suggests greenhouse gases are causing global warming." EPA "refused, saying there were too many unresolved questions about the causes and effects of global warming. The state officials took their case to court, charging that the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to take immediate action." This Wednesday, the dispute "arrives at the US Supreme Court, where the justices must decide whether the EPA is required to take action or whether the agency retains the discretion to decide for itself how best to respond to world-wide environmental threats." The case will "test the authority of special interest groups and state governments to sue federal agencies and force them to adopt certain regulatory policies that they favor. The case could also establish important legal precedents that might help or hinder state efforts to regulate greenhouses gases on their own in the absence of federal action."

The AP (11/28, Hebert) reports, "A dozen U.S. states as well as environmental groups and large cities are trying to convince the court that the Environmental Protection Agency must regulate, as a matter of public health, the amount of carbon dioxide that comes from vehicles." The AP adds, "Carbon dioxide is produced when fossil fuels such as oil and natural gas are burned. It is the principal 'greenhouse' gas that many scientists believe is flowing into the atmosphere at an unprecedented rate, leading to a warming of the earth and widespread ecological changes. One way to reduce those emissions is to have cleaner-burning cars. … The Bush administration intends to argue before the court on Wednesday that the EPA lacks the power under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide as a pollutant. The agency contends that even if it did have such authority, it would have discretion under the law on how to address the problem without imposing emissions controls." The AP notes, "The states, led by Massachusetts, and more than a dozen environmental groups insist the 1970 law makes clear that carbon dioxide is a pollutant - much like lead and smog-causing chemicals - that is subject to regulation because its poses a threat to public health. .. .A sharply divided federal appeals court ruled in favor of the government in 2005. But last June, the Supreme Court decided to take up the case, plunging for the first time into the politically charged debate over global warming. The ruling next year is expected to be one of the court's most important ever involving the environment."

NYTimes Says States Taking Right Course. The New York Times (11/28, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "A plain reading of the Clean Air Act shows that the states are right. The act says that the E.P.A. 'shall' set standards for 'any air pollutant' that in its judgment causes or contributes to air pollution that 'may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare.'"

Groups Launch Effort To Monitor Appalachian Trail For Environmental Problems. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, A17, Smith) reports, "The Appalachian Trail gives hikers a nearly 2,200-mile trek through mountains, meadows and forests stretching from Georgia to Maine. But to scientists and land managers, it is also a living laboratory that could provide warnings of environmental problems while there is still time to fix them." The AP continues, "A diverse collection of organizations have launched a project to begin long-term monitoring of the trail's environmental health, with plans to tap into an army of volunteer 'citizen scientists' and professionals." The AP adds, "Together, they will collect information about air and water quality, the health of plants, and animal migration patterns to build an early environmental warning system for the 120 million people along the Eastern Seaboard. … The Appalachian Mountains are ideal for the project because they are home to one of the richest collections of temperate-zone species in the world. They also have a variety of ecosystems that blend into one another -- hardwood forests next to softwood forests next to alpine forests. The trail along the mountain chain passes through 14 states and eight national forests." The AP notes, "The idea for the project, the Appalachian Trail Mega-Transect, is in its infancy, but it has support from the National Park Service, the U.S. Forest Service, Cornell University, the National Geographic Society and Aveda Corp., an environmentally conscious beauty-products company."

WPost Calls On Virginia To Guarantee Revenue For Chesapeake Cleanup. In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/28, A18, 690K) notes recent improvements in the Chesapeake Bay's "overall health." The Post opines, "[B]ay states are improving their record on protecting the estuary, if too slowly, and they have time to expand their programs. … Virginia, which lags behind Maryland in its bay cleanup efforts, should guarantee revenue to do the same -- so that farmers will be able to rely on timely support over many harvests. Both states should also expand programs that help farmers pay for other agricultural improvements, such as the construction and maintenance of riparian buffers, which are effective and natural pollution trappers."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Technical Glitch Repeatedly Crashes FBI Gun Background Check System. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/28) reports, "An FBI computer system that quickly screens gun buyers' backgrounds for criminal activity crashed several times over the past two days, officials said Monday. At times, the National Instant Criminal Background Check System was on the blink for up to a half-hour on Sunday and Monday -- potentially allowing buyers to purchase firearms without being screened if sellers gave up on making the required check. The computer crash was blamed on a technical glitch that was being worked on Monday evening, said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson. 'It's a performance issue that we've never encountered before,' he said."

Supreme Court Declines To Hear Case Over Professor's FBI File. The AP (11/28) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider the case of a Nobel Peace Prize-nominated law professor who wants the U.S. government to expunge his FBI file." The AP continues, "A federal appeals court found that information the government gathered on Cherif Bassiouni is pertinent to authorized law enforcement activity as part of President George W. Bush's campaign against terror. The records are important for evaluating the reliability of FBI intelligence sources, the appeals court found." The AP adds, "The government argued in the lower courts that even though Bassiouni is not a member of any terror organization, agents probably will continue to receive information about him because of his travels in the Middle East. … Bassiouni, an Egyptian who teaches in the United States, is serving the United Nations as an independent expert on human rights in Afghanistan and was chairman of the U.N. Security Council's commission to investigate war crimes in the former Yugoslavia. … In 1999, Bassiouni was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize for work on international criminal justice and for his contribution to the creation of the International Criminal Court." The AP notes, "Bassiouni was among the U.N. human rights experts expressing concern about possible irreversible psychiatric symptoms in some terrorism suspects from virtual solitary confinement at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba."

Former Virginia Sheriff Pleads Not Guilty To Drug-Scheme Role. The AP (11/28, Lindsey) reports from Roanoke, VA, "A former sheriff pleaded not guilty

Monday to federal charges that he took part in a scheme to sell drugs seized from criminals with a dozen former and current officers." The AP continues, "H. Franklin Cassell, 68, and two Henry County sheriff's deputies and a captain in the economically distressed county pleaded not guilty. The other defendants will be in court Wednesday. … The indictment returned Oct. 31 said Cassell looked the other way as officers sold drugs seized in criminal investigations, stole guns and other evidence and then resold cocaine, steroids, marijuana and other drugs to the public." The AP adds, "Cassell is charged with impeding a federal investigation and money laundering. If convicted, he faces up to 53 years in prison and a $1.25 million fine. … Charges against the other defendants include racketeering conspiracy, drug distribution, weapons counts, obstruction of justice and perjury. … A former sergeant, James Alden Vaught, agreed to cooperate with investigators. His planned guilty plea Monday was delayed because his lawyer was ill, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant."

There are more than 130 media references to former Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell's plea in a federal drug case in which he is accused of hindering the investigation. For example, the Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch (11/28) reports Cassell "pleaded not guilty yesterday to trying to thwart a federal investigation into a drug-dealing ring allegedly run by some of his deputies. Later, in the same federal courtroom where Cassell pleaded not guilty, the Henry man whose arrest prompted the indictment of Cassell, along with 12 of his employees, pleaded guilty to a single count of participating in a racketeering conspiracy. … Federal agents began their investigation of Cassell's department in March 2005, when U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Philadelphia tipped off their counterparts in Roanoke that a package containing 2 kilograms of ketamine, a sedative used as a date-rape drug, was in the mail and on its way to a Martinsville house."

The Roanoke (VA) Times (11/28) reports DEA agents "conducted an undercover delivery of ketamine, a date rape drug, at a Henry County residence in March 2005. According to court records…acceptance of the package served as the springboard for the investigation, which eventually resulted in the indictment of…Cassell, 12 current and former deputies and seven civilians."

The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (11/27) reported Cassell "faces five counts alleging his participation in a money laundering scheme, obstruction of justice, false statement to a federal agency and misprison (failing to tell law enforcement of a felony)."

Local TV Coverage. WRIC-TV, Richmond-Petersburg, Virginia (11/27, 12:00 p.m.) aired, "Cassell and 12 other current and former officers are accused of scheming to sell drugs seized from criminals. The other officers have also pleaded not guilty. Cassell stepped down from his post earlier this month."

WDBJ-TV, Roanoke-Lynchburg, Virginia (11/27, 5:00 p.m.) aired, "Former Sheriff Frank Cassell was back in federal court this morning for arraignment. The 68-year-old…was indicted last month for trying to cover up alleged drug dealing on the part of his deputies. They're among 22 people- in and out of the department- caught up in a DEA investigation that began a year and a-half ago. Cassell entered a plea of not guilty."

WFXR-TV, Roanoke-Lynchburg, Virginia (11/27, 10:00 p.m.) aired, "Former Henry County Sheriff Frank Cassell pleaded not guilty to federal charges he laundered drug money and lied to investigators. Federal law required Cassell to go before a judge today for his arraignment in the case. No trial date has been set."

California Supreme Court Ruling Said To Expand Protections For Medical Marijuana Users. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Dolan) reports people "charged with transporting marijuana may avoid conviction if they can show that the drug was for their personal medical use, the California Supreme Court ruled Monday. In a 6-1 decision, the state high court said California's medical marijuana law protects patients who transport even relatively large quantities of the drug if they can show that the amount was consistent with their medical needs and recommended by a licensed physician. … Monday's decision 'expands the defenses that can be used for medical marijuana,' including transportation and possession for sale, said Maureen J. Shanahan, who represented the defendant in the case."

Bay City News Wire (11/28) reports the ruling, "issued in San Francisco, concerns a 2003 state law that clarified California's medical marijuana law, which was passed by state voters in 1996 as the Compassionate Use Act. The Compassionate Use Act protects seriously ill patients from being prosecuted in state court for using marijuana when they have a doctor's approval. The protections apply only to state court prosecutions and not to criminal prosecutions in federal court. Federal drug laws do not allow an exception for California's medical marijuana law."

Conviction Upheld In Marijuana Case. In Santa Ana, the AP (11/28) reports an Orange County man's felony conviction for "transporting marijuana was upheld Monday by the California Supreme Court despite its ruling that later law allowing a medical marijuana defense for transportation applies retroactively. The decision in the case of Shaun Eric Wright, 43, resolves an important question regarding the Medical Marijuana Program, legislation adopted in 2004 to promote the implementation of Proposition 215 that in 1996 legalized marijuana for medicinal use, Nathan Barankin of the state Attorney General's office said. That question, Barankin said, is whether the law applies retroactively 'and it does resolve that issue for state law purposes.'"

Court Ruling In Marijuana Case Seen As Legally Correct, Morally Wrong. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/27) editorialized, "The Washington [State] Supreme Court, for hardly the first time in judicial history, has rendered a ruling that is at the same time legally correct and morally wrong. Yes, as the court ruled Thursday, state law enacted by the 1998 passage of Initiative 692 does require that anyone mounting a 'compassionate use' defense in a marijuana-related crime must meet specific criteria. And, yes, Sharon Lee Tracy failed that test. … Where the cops and courts failed, lawmakers can succeed, by rewriting the law to recognize medical marijuana prescriptions from any licensed physician."

FDA Issues Methadone Advisory. The AP (11/27) reported people "starting treatment with methadone have died and suffered life-threatening side effects, health officials said Monday in warning of the dangers of overdosing on the painkiller. Overdoses of the increasingly popular narcotic can cause slow or shallow breathing and dangerous changes in heart beat that patients might not feel, the Food and Drug Administration said. … The FDA warned that methadone only provides pain relief for four to eight hours, but can linger in the body for eight to 59 hours. That can lead patients to take more of the drug before it has been eliminated by the body, causing the drug to build up in the body to toxic levels, the FDA said."

The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (11/27) reported the FDA "has issued a health advisory for methadone after it reviewed reports of death and life-threatening side effects in patients taking the pain drug, the agency said Monday. … According to the advisory, posted on the FDA's Web site, methadone can cause slow or shallow breathing and 'dangerous changes in heart beat that may not be felt by the patient.' In addition, accidental overdose could happen because the substance stays in the body for more than eight hours, when pain relief from a dose lasts about four to eight hours."

Afghanistan's Anti-Drug Efforts Said To Be Ruined By Corruption. The Financial Times (11/28, Morarjee) reports, "Afghanistan's war on drugs has been marred by corruption that has strengthened the grip of an increasingly powerful mafia on the country's narcotics trade, a report by the World Bank and United Nations said. Over the past five years, the British-led counter-narcotics strategy had penalised the country's poorest farmers and strengthened networks of organised crime, consolidating the trade among a tiny elite of traffickers, the damning report said." The report claimed that the Afghan interior ministry had been "captured" by traffickers. The Financial Times continues, "To achieve long-term success in the battle against drugs eradication, the report found that efforts should be concentrated in the six Afghan provinces where there was relatively little opium cultivation to build up a line of defence against the spread of the trade. ... Even in this record year, opium took up less than 4 per cent of the total cultivated area in Afghanistan, with only an estimated 13 per cent of the population involved in poppy cultivation, which the report said was cause for hope."

The Financial Times (11/27, Burns, Morarjee) also reported Afghan government plans to "eradicate poppy farming in southern Afghanistan risk drawing British troops into fierce fighting with an already embittered local population, military officials and diplomats in the country have warned. The governor of Helmand has promised to push ahead with a drug eradication program early in the new year in the southern province where British troops faced unexpectedly fierce battles during the summer."

USA Today (11/28, Leinwand) says the report, "released today, is the latest indication of the difficulties faced by the British-led effort to eradicate Afghanistan's opium crop, which drives the economy in parts of the embattled nation and has helped to fund a resurgence of the Taliban. The report says the production of opium, whose poppies are used to make heroin, permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades."

Officials Search For Cause Of Fatal Missouri Group Home Fire. The AP (11/28, Kabel) reports from Anderson, MO, "An early morning fire broke out in a group home for the elderly and mentally ill Monday, killing 10 people and injuring two dozen others in a blaze that the governor said was being treated as a crime." The AP continues, The blaze reduced the privately run Anderson Guest House to a skeleton of cinder blocks and stunned this rural community of about 1,800 people tucked in the Ozark hills of southwest Missouri. … Gov. Matt Blunt said investigators were treating the fire as suspicious. … 'We're not saying it is definitely a crime scene, but we are treating it as if it is and trying to determine if the fire was set by somebody who had a nefarious motive,' Blunt said." The AP adds, "The home had 32 residents and two employees inside when the fire was reported around 1 a.m. The dead ranged in age from early 20s to elderly. Another 18 people were taken to hospitals, and six were treated at the scene, authorities said. … One of the dead was a worker in the home, and the other nine were residents, Blunt said. Authorities did not plan to release names until Tuesday because relatives of two victims haven't yet been notified. … Officials refused to say how the victims died or whether they had any warning. The home had fire alarms but no sprinklers."

Marshals To Help Track Maine Sex Offenders. The AP (11/28) reports, "The federal government will soon get involved in tracking down sex offenders in Maine who avoid registering with police." The AP continues, "The U.S. Marshals Service in Maine is being trained in the new responsibilities as part of a federal sex offender law passed in July, said John Cooper, the chief deputy U.S. marshal for Maine." The AP adds, "The new law creates a national sex offender database to allow law enforcement and communities to know where convicted sex offenders live and work. It gives the Marshals Service the task of tracking down offenders who dodge their obligations. … 'We have resources and databases that local agencies don't have,' Cooper said." The AP notes, "Maine and other states in recent years have created registries that list people convicted of certain types of sex crimes. The registries are viewed as informational and safety tools for police and the public. .. .But officials say there are a number of weaknesses in the system. … In Maine, failing to register with local police or the state is a crime, but only a misdemeanor that hasn't been listed on national databases that alert police to people who are wanted in other states. … Police say another weakness in the system is figuring out who should take the lead in searching for a sex offender who fails to register or report to police as required."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Communities Cool To Planned Fence. USA Today (11/28, Johnson, 2.27M) reports "ranching magnate Bill Moody" would "seem to be the type of person who would embrace the federal government's most provocative effort to stop illegals from entering this country: A plan to build 700 miles of fence along the 2,100-mile Southwest border, including Moody's land. Instead, Moody is a powerful voice in a growing alliance of border landowners and local law enforcement officials who oppose a fence." Most "everyone here agrees that more border security is needed to curb illegal immigration. Ranchers such as Moody and Dob Cunningham, who has a 700-acre spread north of here with 2 miles of river frontage, say they often give Border Patrol agents access to their land to help the agents track down illegals." But the "fence plan — the centerpiece of an immigration bill President Bush signed last month — has come to reflect the disconnect between many landowners here and officials in Washington who see the project as a key part of the nation's strategy to slow illegal immigration. Here, where the impact of illegal immigration is greatest, the fence is widely viewed as an economic and environmental threat. In Eagle Pass, a city of 25,000 that is 95% Hispanic, it's also seen as a rejection of the region's tradition of shared cultures and open ranges."

Thompson Warns Firm Of Criminal Charges Over Illegal Immigrant Crackdown. The Washington Times (11/28, Seper, 88K) reports Rep. Bennie Thompson, "in line to become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee," has "warned the nation's largest uniform supplier it faces criminal charges if it follows a White House proposal to recheck workers with mismatched Social Security numbers and fire those who cannot resolve the discrepancy in 60 days." Thompson said "in a letter to Cintas Corp. it could be charged with 'illegal activities in violation of state and federal law' if any of its 32,000 employees are terminated because they gave incorrect Social Security numbers to be hired." Thompson said, "I am deeply troubled by Cintas' recent policy change regarding the Social Security Administration's 'no match' letters. It is my understanding that hundreds of Cintas' immigrant workers have received these letters. I am extremely concerned about any potentially discriminatory actions targeting this community."

Democrats' Conflict Over Immigration Expected To Surface. In a New York Times op-ed (11/28), Thomas Edsall says, "The success of candidates attacking outsourcing and trade agreements like Nafta, combined with high Democratic margins among economically pessimistic voters, clearly point to middle-class wage stagnation and growing inequality as significant factors in the election this month." But the "result has shifted the balance of power within the Democratic Party in favor of the protectionist wing, and especially in favor of such major unions as the Teamsters, the steelworkers and the autoworkers, all key party supporters with money and manpower." The "strengthening of the Democrats' protectionist wing is virtually certain to force to the surface a second, and closely related, internal conflict between the party's pro- and anti-immigration wings. This conflict among Democrats remained submerged while President Bush and the Republican House and Senate majorities fought without resolution over the same issue."

Biden Blames Mexico's "Corrupt System" For Illegal Immigration, Drug Problems. The AP (11/28) reports Sen. Joe Biden "wants to get tough with Mexico, calling it an 'erstwhile democracy' with a 'corrupt system' responsible for illegal immigration and drug problems in the U.S. Biden, D-Del., was in Columbia [South Carolina] on Monday in his first post-election trip to this first-in-the-South presidential primary state as he continues to line up support for his presidential bid. … An even bigger problem are illegal drugs 'coming up through corrupt Mexico,' he said. 'People are driving across that border with tons, tons -- hear me -- tons of everything from byproducts for methamphetamines, to cocaine, to heroin.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Gates Likely To Start As Defense Secretary Before End Of Year. The AP (11/28, Burns) reports officials said Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates "is likely to assume the Pentagon post before year's end if he is confirmed by the Senate as expected." Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff "said Gates will have his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee early next week, with a vote expected by the full Senate by Dec. 12 or 13." Ruff added that in "preparation for the hearing, Gates is receiving a series of briefings by senior Pentagon officials." Even if Gates "is confirmed as expected, it is unclear when he would be sworn in to his new duties, Ruff said." The AP adds another Administration official, "who would discuss the Gates matter only on condition of anonymity, said that if confirmation goes as expected, then Gates would be sworn in well before the end of the year. No date is set."

Carter Expects Gates To Be Confirmed. Former President Jimmy Carter on CNN's Larry King Live (11/27) was asked whether Robert Gates would be an improvement over Secretary Rumsfeld. Carter said that Gates "was in the intelligence agency working for the Stansfield Turner when I was president. Stansfield Turner thought a lot of him. Everything everybody who has worked with him since that time have had accolades for him. I think he's certainly going to be an improvement and I think the nation is going to give him full support and I would presume the Congress will approve his appointment without any hesitation."

Missile Defense Makes Advances, But Undermined By Technical Glitches. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A1, Karp, 2.04M) reports that under President Bush, "the US has poured nearly $50 billion into" the missile defense program. The Pentagon "says it has put the system on alert more than 10 times and the US already has a 'limited' ability to shoot down enemy warheads. Yet the program's high-tech breakthroughs are at times undermined by technical snafus, and real missile defense always seems off in the future." A "big step forward came in September, when U.S. military personnel using satellite sensors, radar and long-range interceptor missiles that are part of the real missile shield shot down a test warhead in space over the Pacific. The success went some way toward answering critics in Congress who have demanded tests that resemble real-world situations." For "defense contractors and the Pentagon, which is spending $9.3 billion this year on missile defense, the September test was a vindication." Critics "nowadays generally concede the feasibility of knocking missiles out of the sky. But many believe the idea is either too expensive or too error-prone to make it worth rushing into operation." The Journal also examines the potential and problems of the SBX, or sea based X-band radar, that would be a vital link in the system."

Portman Says Bush Prepared To Veto Spending Bills. The Washington Times (11/28, Dinan, 88K) reports Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman says President Bush "will try to work out a deal on spending with the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill, but will be prepared to veto bills that exceed his total budget or that slice away at defense needs." In an interview, Portman said, "With the Democrat leadership, we'll try to be transparent and we'll try to be clear in our concerns upfront, and I hope we can work things out without resorting to a veto. But if necessary we will resort to a veto." The Times adds Portman, "a former six-term congressman from Ohio, has assumed the role of go-between, making use of his relationships with many of the top lawmakers to find areas of cooperation on annual spending and on thorny issues such as Social Security." He has "spoken with incoming Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel, the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate budget committees, and Sen. Max Baucus, who will head the Senate Finance Committee. He also has a meeting scheduled with Sen. Robert C. Byrd, the West Virginia Democrat who will head the Senate Appropriations Committee."

Government Contractors Face Stiffer Oversight Under Democratic Majority. The Washington Post (11/28, D1, Witte, Merle, 690K) reports that after "riding high for five years, government contractors are bracing themselves for increased oversight, tighter budgets and stepped-up regulations as Democrats take over on Capitol Hill and vow to keep a closer eye on how companies spend taxpayer dollars." While all companies that do "business with the government could feel the impact, but contractors that benefited most from work in Iraq and Afghanistan, from homeland security initiatives or from Hurricane Katrina are especially likely to be under the microscope. Big-ticket weapons programs are also expected to garner special attention, and it may become more difficult to get a no-bid contract, according to industry observers." In "a 44-page look at areas in need of oversight," Government Accountability Office investigators "focused substantial attention on contractors. The government spent $388 billion on contracts last year, the GAO said, and much of that money is exposed to 'potential waste and misuse' because of the way the government buys goods and services." Meanwhile, "in September, the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group, began holding seminars for Hill workers of both parties on how to conduct investigations, including sessions on the anatomy of a government contract and skits in which oversight hearings were acted out."

Watchdog Group Wants Investigation Of Hastert Over Prairie Parkway. The Chicago Tribune (11/28, Parsons, 617K) reports a government watchdog group "called for an official investigation into whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert broke the law by pushing for federal funding of a highway project near land he owned west of Chicago." Hastert (R-Ill.) and "two partners turned a profit of more than $3 million last year on land they bought and sold near the proposed route of the Prairie Parkway -- earnings that the group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington say the investors got because of federal funding pushed by Hastert. The group is asking the Justice Department to investigate Hastert's actions."

Hastings May Drop Bid For Intel Panel Chair After Tuesday Meeting With Pelosi. FOX News (11/27) reported on its website, "House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi will meet Tuesday with Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings, and those with knowledge of Pelosi's thinking told FOX News that Hastings will be told he is not going to be the next chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. Though no formal decisions have been announced and Pelosi aides say the situation remains fluid, they suggest that the meeting at Pelosi's Capitol Hill office was requested by Hastings so he could bow out of the race before Pelosi denies him the job. 'He knows he's not going to get it,' said one senior House Democratic aide. 'The question is why he didn't bow out long ago.'" In remarks "over the weekend, Hastings left the impression he was resigned to not receiving the chairmanship from Pelosi, due in large measure to his impeachment from the federal bench in 1989 for conspiring to accept a bribe…and then, according to the Senate impeachment trial, lying to cover it up. Pelosi aides have been scrutinizing the House and Senate proceedings in the Hastings impeachment, FOX News has learned, and apparently don't like what they have seen. 'It's ugly,' said one Pelosi aide. 'It's just really, really bad.'"

Hastings' Former Attorney Defends His Suitability. In a column appearing in the Washington Post (11/28, A19, 690K), Terence J. Anderson, the lawyer who represented Rep. Alcee Hastings when he was a judge, including during Hastings' impeachment proceedings, opines, "Ruth Marcus…and others have argued, however, that Hastings should not be appointed chairman" of the House Intelligence Committee "because of the Senate's decision 17 years ago to remove him from the federal bench. Such arguments ignore important facts that should be considered before the next speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, decides on the chairmanship." He enumerates three arguments: "First, no 'jury' that heard and considered all the evidence has been convinced that Hastings was guilty. … Second, in any fair view, perceived political necessity was a significant, perhaps decisive, factor in the decision to remove Hastings from the bench. … Third, senators who had not heard the evidence filed statements that make it clear that some voted for removal not because they were convinced Hastings was guilty but because they believed he had not proven his innocence."

Bush Approval Falls To 31% In Harris Interactive Poll. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M) reports President Bush's approval ratings "fell to the second-lowest of his presidency, according to a new Harris Interactive poll." The telephone survey, conducted over November 17 and November 21, shows "31% of U.S. adults called Mr. Bush's job performance 'excellent' or 'good' -- down from 34% who gave a positive assessment in a late-October poll; 67% said his performance is only "fair" or "poor," up from 63% in the previous survey2." Despite the "recent changes in Congress, Republicans and Democrats continued to receive low marks. Thirty-six percent of respondents said Democrats are doing an 'excellent' or 'good' job, better than the 29% in September. Democrats' highest positive rating was 68% in October 2001, a month after the 9/11 attacks. Meanwhile, Republicans' approval rating remained unchanged from September at 24%, and also well below their October 2001 high of 67%."

Hall First Professional Musician Elected To Congress. The Washington Post (11/28, C1, Segal, 690K) profiles Orleans band member and Democratic Rep.-elect John Hall, whose "singular place in American history" is that he is "the first professional rock musician elected to Congress. No, we're not counting Sonny Bono, because he didn't play an instrument, at least not onstage." Today, Hall "would blend in at a board meeting of any Fortune 500 company -- he is tall and serious and pretty formal. He actually sounds like a politician, too: He can speechify in that earnest and somewhat tedious way that only politicians can. No offense, but you've never met anyone who toggles so quickly between gripping anecdote and soporific spiel. … Frankly, he'd rather talk up his slate of left-leaning goals, such as raising the minimum wage, weaning the nation off fossil fuels or pushing for universal health care."

WSJournal Praises DeMint, Coburn For Blocking Earmarks. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M), in an editorial, praises "GOP Doctors, er, Senators Jim DeMint (South Carolina) and Tom Coburn (Oklahoma)," who have "been staging an intervention so their colleagues don't risk another overdose before they ride off into the minority." The "two rebel Senators…rallied enough of their mates to block any omnibus bill containing earmarks. The result is that the GOP Senate may return next week for its final lame duck days and instead pass a 'continuing resolution' that would fund the government at 2006 levels, kicking 2007 decisions over to the Democratic majority in January. By Mr. Coburn's estimate, taxpayers would save about $17 billion if Congress takes this approach."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Fall On Weak Dollar, Slow Retail Sales. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Hamilton, 850K) reports the stock markets "fell sharply on Monday, with a weakening U.S. dollar and tepid sales at retail giant Wal-Mart Stores giving investors the opening they were looking for to cash out some of the profits they've booked during the market's four-month surge." The Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500 index "each sank more than 1% for the first time since July 13." Investment pros "said the decline was not surprising given Wall Street's strength this year, especially through its seasonally weak period in September and October. They attributed the sell-off largely to profit taking by big institutional investors that are sitting on sizable recent gains." The Dow "sank 158.46 points, or 1.3%, to 12121.71, its biggest decline since a 1.5% slide on July 13. The S&P 500 was off 19.05 points, or 1.4%, to 1381.90. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index skidded 2.21%, tumbling 54.34 points to 2405.92."

NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Adding to a big downdraft on wall street some analysts were linking to a disappointing sales estimate by Wal-Mart." The Dow was down more than a 158 points [to close at 12,121.71]. NASDAQ took a hit as well fell nearly 54 points [to close at 2,405.92]. The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 5, 0:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Wall Street hasn't seen a day as bad as this one in months."

The New York Times (11/28, Peters, 1.16M) reports, "It was a day with little for investors to cheer, with the dollar continuing its slide against the euro and the price of a barrel of oil rising." The "decline on Wall Street spoiled what had been a steady run-up in stock prices in recent weeks." Some of "the steepest losses came in the shares of retailers like Wal-Mart, whose troubles reverberated throughout the stock market. The world's largest retailer reported Saturday that its sales in November fell for the first time in 10 years. Despite signs that retailers on average fared well during the first weekend of the holiday shopping crunch, the poor results from Wal-Mart raised questions about how much consumers will spend this season."

The Washington Post (11/28, D5, Brubaker, 690K) also cites "higher oil prices, a weakening dollar and an unexpectedly glum sales forecast from Wal-Mart." Yesterday's "stock sell-off also was driven by a 1.8 percent jump in crude-oil futures, fueled by reports that Saudi Arabia's oil minister may support a cutback in production at the next meeting of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries Light sweet crude for January delivery gained $1.08 to settle at $60.32 a barrel."

USA Today (11/28, Shell, 2.27M) reports some Wall Street strategists "said the 158.46-point drop to 12,121.71 suffered by the Dow Jones industrial average was long overdue given the Dow's uninterrupted run-up in recent weeks." Rod Smyth, investment strategist at Wachovia Securities, said, "It was simply a much-needed correction. I genuinely believe this (selling) has been building." USA adds, "Still, the broad market sell-off, which resulted in sizable losses for virtually every type of stock — blue chips, technology names and both large- and small-capitalization stocks — grabbed the attention of a complacent Wall Street caught up in Dow fever."

The Wall Street Journal (11/28, C1, McKay, Hudson, 2.04M) also reports, "Some Wall Street pros also said the stock market was due for a pullback, following more than a month of fresh records and last week's holiday-shortened trading." Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research in Chicago, "still figures the market is generally headed higher through the end of the year. But he said stocks were probably due for a short-term drop, considering that the S&P 500 hasn't had a decline of 2% from a high since mid-July." Bianco said, "This is the longest period without a 2% correction in 20 years. It just shows you how strong the market has been that we have to think in these terms now."

Sales Up 3.5% For Black Friday. ABC World News (11/27, story 8, 0:36, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, 'This Monday after the long Thanksgiving break, millions returned to work and promptly got busy shopping online. On this Cyber Monday, as it's known, an estimated 61 million people would buy something over the Internet. As for Black Friday and weekend, customers shelled out almost $15 billion at traditional stores, up about 3.5% from the same Friday and Saturday last year. Still the nation's largest retailer, Wal-Mart, says its November sales will be down."

NBC Nightly News (11/27, story 9, 2:10, Quintanilla, 9.87M) reported, "Retailers slashed prices to draw in shoppers, and they got them. 140 million spending $9 billion on Friday alone. At this retail resort near Denver Tracy Snow and her two girls braved the crowds and spent $400. Their budget this year is tight." There are "concerns about the health of the American consumer. Holiday central survey released today found only one in five shoppers will spend more than they did last year."

The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 6, 0:40, Bowers, 7.66M) reported, "After last week's Black Friday in stores like these, now it's on to the Internet and Cyber Monday. 60 million of us are expected to shop online today, that's 20% of the population. But experts say everyday has become Cyber Monday." Kurt Peters, Internet Retailer: "People are shopping online all the time. They're not waiting to get to the office on the Monday after Thanksgiving to start their Christmas shopping." Bowers: "Estimates are this year's online sales will be up 24% to $24 billion. Retailers used to think online shopping would hurt in-store sales. Now the message is ignore the Internet at your own peril."

Housing Market Slowdown Not Putting Crimp In Holiday Spending. USA Today (11/28, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports the "sharp slowdown in the housing market isn't darkening consumers' moods as feared, suggesting they will continue to be a source of strength in the economy through this year and possibly into 2007." Results from the "first few days of the key holiday shopping season point to increases in retail sales from a year ago, despite a mediocre performance at Wal-Mart, the nation's largest retailer." With consumer spending "accounting for more than two-thirds of U.S. economic activity, spending gains are good news for the broad economy as it faces a number of headwinds, including the housing slowdown and turmoil in the automobile industry."

Massachusetts To Sue Big Dig Firms For Negligence In Deadly Collapse. The Wall Street Journal/AP (11/28, A6) reports, "Massachusetts is preparing a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against the companies that worked on the Big Dig highway tunnel project, alleging their negligence led to the ceiling collapse that killed a woman, a spokesman said Monday." The AP continues, "Attorney General Tom Reilly is seeking unspecified damages for repairs, loss of tunnel use and toll revenue and other economic factors, spokesman David Guarino confirmed Monday. The lawsuit was to be filed Monday or Tuesday, he said. … 'This lawsuit is more than just about money, although we will be seeking monetary damages,' Mr. Reilly told a local radio station earlier Monday. 'What this case is has always been about is the tragic death of Milena Del Valle. That could have been any one of us.'" The AP adds, "The lawsuit, to be filed in Suffolk Superior Court, alleges project manager Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff and Modern Continental Construction Co. were 'grossly negligent' in constructing the ceiling that collapsed. The suit also names Gannett Fleming, the firm that designed the I-90 connector tunnel; as well as companies that supplied the epoxy or ceiling bolts used to hold up ceiling panels. … Four of the concrete panels, each weighing about three tons, fell on a car in which Del Valle, a 38-year-old from Boston, was a passenger July 10. Gannett Fleming also is being sued for breach of contract, Mr. Guarino said."

NCSL Report Calls For States, Colleges To Focus On Cost And Graduation Rates. The Christian Science Monitor (11/28, Arnoldy) reports the National Conference of State Legislatures found that "for every 100 ninth graders, only 18 will enter college and finish within six years." That is "not good enough" according to the report. It calls for "higher education and the states that oversee much of the system…to tackle spiraling tuition, poor college preparation, and the lack of help to keep students moving toward a degree." The report focuses on "the ballooning price of a bachelor's degree." It notes that "reducing the student-loan rate is an 'early action' item on the agenda for the Democratic-controlled Congress." Furthermore, "graduation rates for those who start college are finally inching up after years of setbacks." But it is "taking students a longer time on average to complete degrees, and the process is saddling them with more and more debt."

USA Today (11/28) reports the NCSL "agrees with most of the points raised by a national commission created by Education Secretary Margaret Spellings" with "one major exception: It says states, not the federal government, must be at the center of a nationwide higher-education reform movement." States "spend $70 billion a year on higher education and provide more funding and regulation of colleges and universities than any other level of government."

Recounts Start In Three House Races. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, A2) reports Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio) "won reelection Monday by a margin so slim that a recount will be required." Unofficial results "announced by Franklin County, the last to finish counting absentee and provisional ballots in central Ohio's 15th District, showed Pryce led Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy by 1,055 votes, or 0.4 percent of the vote. An automatic recount is triggered if the difference between the two candidates is less than 0.5 percent." Meanwhile, in North Carolina, "election officials said a manual recount of randomly chosen precincts will take place Wednesday and Thursday in the 8th District race between Rep. Robin Hayes (R) and Democrat Larry Kissell. Hayes leads by 329 votes." Florida officials will "start an audit Tuesday of electronic voting machines in the 13th District House race between Democrat Christine Jennings and Republican Vern Buchanan. The state certified Buchanan the winner by 369 votes, but Jennings contested, arguing that touch-screen voting machines had malfunctioned."

In Fourth Race, Bonilla Faces Rodriguez In Run-Off. The New York Times (11/28, Zernike, 1.16M) reports, "Forget recounts; in Texas, there is an actual campaign." Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla "faces a runoff on Dec. 12 after failing to gain a majority of votes on Election Day." Bonilla "won 48.6

percent of the vote. His opponent, Ciro Rodriguez, led a field of six Democrats with 19.9 percent."

Giuliani, Obama, McCain Top Poll Rating Of National Leaders. The Washington Post/AP (11/28, Christoffersen) reports Americans "have the warmest feelings about former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, according to a poll released Monday that scores the popularity of national leaders." The Quinnipiac University "thermometer reading," which was "taken the week after the Nov. 7 election, asked voters to rate their feelings for 20 leaders on a scale of 0 to 100. Giuliani, a Republican weighing a presidential bid in 2008, scored the highest at 64.2. Obama and McCain, who are also considering a 2008 campaign, finished next at 58.8 and 57.7." President Bush "was 15th out of 20 while his secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, was fourth and former President Clinton fifth." New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "scored ninth of the 20 leaders with a score of 49," while Sen. John Kerry, "who was roundly criticized before the election for suggesting that students who don't study could end up stuck in Iraq, came in last at 39.6." Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi, "in line to become the next House Speaker, improved her standing, moving from last to 12th in a few weeks. The next Senate Majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid, was 19th."

The Washington Times (11/28, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Quinnipiac assistant poll director Peter A. Brown said, "As we enter the presidential campaign of 2008, Giuliani and McCain are in enviable positions. They are well-regarded, and most Americans are quite familiar with them. Obama's showing is impressive, but 4 in 10 Americans still don't know enough about him to have an opinion." The Times adds, "Despite concerns that his liberal views on social issues will hurt him with Republican primary voters, Mr. Giuliani continues to lead the field in nearly every publicly released presidential poll."

Dionne Says GOP Alienated Moderate Voters. In his column in the Washington Post (11/28, A19, 690K), E.J. Dionne writes, "This fall's election defeat was inglorious for Republicans because it ratified Nixon's original worries about the cost of chasing away the GOP's moderates and revealed that the Barry Goldwater-Ronald Reagan political settlement has expired. You wouldn't know that listening to Republican congressional leaders who still think all will be well if the party just hugs the old conservative faith a little harder." Dionne cites Republicans' "new problems," including: "The party's credibility on national security has been shattered by the failure of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq." He also writes, "Pro-market libertarians and pro-family social conservatives are more aware than ever that their respective values and interests do not coincide."

Effort To Build Grassroots Internet Alternative Party Examined. In a USA Today op-ed (11/28), Don Campbell, a lecturer in journalism at Emory University, says, "I have a strong stomach, but the partisanship and political slander that in the past decade have come to characterize virtually every utterance have driven me to become nauseated almost every time a Washington politician appears on my TV screen. I had given up hope and interest in politics until I recently had conversations with two old political hands whose judgment I still respect. Hamilton Jordan, who masterminded Democrat Jimmy Carter's underdog campaign for the White House in 1976, and Douglas Bailey, the veteran Republican consultant and co-founder of the daily online news briefing The Hotline, have teamed up to lead a grassroots movement that promises an alternative to the partisanship that has polarized Washington. The objective of their movement, called Unity08 (www.unity08.com), is to use Internet balloting to forge an independent national ticket for 2008 in which the presidential nominee is from one major party and his or her running mate is from the other major party. Anyone can form a ticket and run, and the organizers hope eventually to attract some recognizable names."

Moved-Up South Carolina Primary Scrambles Democrats' Campaign Patterns. The New York Times (11/28, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports four days "after the midterm elections, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, a former Democratic presidential nominee vying to play that role again, flew to Greenville, S.C." Kerry's 2004 running mate, former Sen. John Edwards, "appeared in Columbia, S.C., the next weekend. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware addressed about 200 people yesterday at a Rotary Club in Columbia. And Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa had plans to swing through South Carolina early next week after appearing in Nevada as he introduces himself to voters as a presidential candidate." Though the candidates are not "writing off Iowa and New Hampshire," the Democratic Party's "decision to shuffle its presidential primary schedule, so that Nevada's caucus closely follows Iowa's and South Carolina gets a primary week of its own after New Hampshire's, is changing the early rituals of campaigning, forcing contenders to extend themselves in more states."

Gillespie Seen As Likely To Take Reins Of Virginia GOP. The Washington Times (11/28, McLaughlin, 88K) reports, "Virginia Republicans say they expect Ed Gillespie, former chairman of the Republican National Committee, to be named the new head of the state party. … Republicans yesterday told The Times that Mr. Gillespie's election appears imminent now that the other front-runners for the spot -- former Lt. Gov. John H. Hager and Chuck Smith, chairman of Virginia Beach's Republican Party

-- dropped out of the race last week in a telephone conference call with the state executive committee." The election "is scheduled for this weekend at the 23rd annual Donald W. Huffman Advance at the Homestead Resort in Hot Springs -- a Republican retreat where grass-roots activists and elected officials kick off the 2007 state legislative campaign season."

Supreme Court Declines Maine School Choice Case. The AP (11/28, Yost) reports the Supreme Court "decided Monday not to plunge into the issue of school choice, passing up a dispute over a Maine law that bars the use of public funds to send students to private religious schools." The conservative Institute for Justice "had asked the justices to take the case. The group is representing eight Maine families who would receive public tuition funds but for the fact that their children attend religious schools." Florida Gov. Jeb Bush "and President Bush's home state of Texas had weighed in, saying in filings to the Supreme Court that Maine is unconstitutionally discriminating against religion."

Public Funding For Stem Cell Research Seen As Counter-Productive. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (11/28, 850K) Sigrid Fry-Revere, director of bioethics studies at the Cato Institute, writes, "Politicians are right that stem cells hold the promise of incredible medical progress. But we won't achieve the promised results if we insist on public funding of the research. In fact, government-funded research has proved bureaucratic, expensive, wasteful, fickle and divisive. Since 2003, five states — Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey, Connecticut and California — have pledged billions of dollars to support stem cell research. But political opposition has prevented all but a few million dollars from reaching researchers. … Religious and taxpayer groups lost a first round in court, but their appeals, or any other state attempts to fund stem cell research, are likely to be tied up in court for at least another year."

WSJournal Criticizes Kennedy For Oil Alliance With Chavez. In an editorial (11/28), the Wall Street Journal says, "Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez is an ally of the Iranian mullahs, a supporter of North Korea, a close friend of Fidel Castro and a good customer for Vladimir Putin's weapon factories. Now he's also a business partner of Joseph P. Kennedy II." Kennedy, the former Democratic congressman, "describes the deal he's cooked up with Mr. Chávez as charity for low-income consumers of heating oil. But it's worth asking what the price of this largesse is to Venezuelans and to U.S. security interests." Chávez's "Citgo -- a Houston-based oil company owned by the Venezuelan government -- is supplying home heating oil to Mr. Kennedy's Citizens Energy Corporation at a 40% discount. Citizens, a nonprofit outfit, says it passes the savings onto the poor, aiming to help 400,000 homes in 16 states that would otherwise have trouble heating their homes. In the process, Mr. Kennedy happens to get a high-profile publicity plug. If you think you qualify, says the television ad that drew our attention to this partnership, just dial 1-877-Joe-4-Oil." Chávez is "trying to shape U.S. public opinion in the hope that more gringos will come to see the Chávez government as benevolent. Massachusetts Democrats seem especially eager to help."

Olmert Offers Palestinians Peace Incentives. ABC World News (11/27, story 3, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "reached out to the Palestinians today offering a package of incentives to stop the violence there. He promised to reduce check points, release frozen Palestinian funds and free prisoners, in exchange for a serious push for peace. It was the most conciliatory gesture yet by Olmert, but the Palestinian cabinet led by Hamas militants accused him of posturing." The New York Times (11/28, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the offer was made "in what was billed as a major policy speech, but it contained little that was new." However, the timing was "important, though, because Mr. Olmert and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, are eager to bolster their own political positions, begin a serious dialogue and stop a bloody cycle of violence." Separately, "expectations are high that Secretary…Rice may come here after Jordan to try to solidify the fragile attempt at reconciliation." The Times notes that one of the "new elements" in the Olmerts' speech was a suggestion that he "found parts of a 2002 Saudi peace initiative to be 'positive,' the first time an Israeli leader has done so."

The Financial Times (11/28, Devi) reports that Palestinians "welcomed the possibility of efforts to ease humanitarian conditions… But they still doubted Israel's intention to create a Palestinian state that is viable and settle thorny issues that remain at the heart of the conflict, such as the division of Jerusalem and refugees." The Times notes that Palestinian officials "said there was a possibility" of Abbas meeting Secretary Rice, while Israeli officials said "no talks between Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice and any Israeli officials were scheduled." The AP (11/28, Teibel) says Olmert's speech "raised the diplomatic stakes ahead of President Bush's scheduled trip to neighboring Jordan this week." Meanwhile, Palestinian official Saeb Erekat "said it was possible Abbas would meet with Bush there."

The Los Angeles Times (11/28, Boudreaux, 850K) calls the address "one of" Olmert's "most conciliatory speeches" and notes that the offer "was a switch for Olmert, who declared during his election campaign last spring that no Palestinian leader was capable of making a deal with Israel."

LATimes Urges Palestinians To Accept Olmert Offer. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (11/28, 850K) says if the Palestinian Authority -- including Hamas – "doesn't respond in kind" to Olmert's offer, "it will be yet another golden opportunity for Mideast peace squandered." The Times notes that Hamas is "not being asked to approve of the creation of Israel half a century ago, only to recognize that the modern Jewish state is a legal government endorsed by the United Nations and deserving of security." Although Yasser Arafat "dawdled and dissembled for years before finally accepting Israel's existence," the Times says his "belated accommodation to reality that led to a White House invitation for the erstwhile terrorist and the creation of the Palestinian Authority. If Hamas is willing to recognize the same fact of life, the benefits for the Palestinians could be even more dramatic."

Rice May Meet Separately With Olmert, Abbas. In an article on President Bush's visit to the Middle East this week, the New York Times (11/28, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "may add two stops -- Ramallah, in the West Bank, and Jerusalem --to her itinerary" in order to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. The Times says Rice "has argued in favor of stepping up work on the Israeli-Palestinian front, and several times this fall she has seemed to be on the verge of a major peace initiative, only to be overtaken by other crises."

The CBS Evening News (11/27, lead story, 2:15, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Arab countries want to see something from the United States if they're going to engage in lowering the temperature in Iraq. … So that's why you have State Department spokesmen saying that there's planning between Secretary Rice and Prime Minister Olmert as well as Palestinian President Abbas for possible meetings."

The AP (11/28, Gearan) reports Israeli officials "rejected the possibility of a summit between Abbas and Olmert on the sidelines of Bush's visit to neighboring Jordan later this week."

North Korean Nuclear Envoy Arrives In Beijing To Prepare For Talks. The AP (11/28, Ang) reports North Korea's nuclear envoy arrived in Beijing Tuesday "as his counterparts from the United States, China, South Korea and Japan gathered to hammer out plans to restart" the stalled six-party talks. The AP says the arrival of North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan has "heightened expectations he may meet" with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, "although no plans have been announced." In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said a meeting between Hill and Kim is "certainly an open possibility." Arriving in Beijing Monday, Hill said, "The issue for us is to make sure we are extremely well-planned and ready for the six-party talks, which we do anticipate will get going at some point very soon." Hill is expected to meet with representatives from Seoul and Tokyo today and Wednesday, but no multilateral talks have been scheduled, the AP reports.

Bush, Hu Discuss North Korea, Darfur. AFP (11/28) reports President Bush Monday spoke with Chinese President Hu Jintao on North Korea's nuclear program and developments in Sudan's Darfur region, a White House spokesman said. Bush spoke with Hu during his flight to the Baltics where he will attend a NATO summit. Bush asked for "continued Chinese leadership on various international issues such as the situation in North Korea and Darfur," said spokesman Gordon Johndroe. "The two presidents reviewed their good meeting in Hanoi on the margins of the APEC summit and agreed that US-China cooperation is moving forward well, to the benefit of both the American and Chinese people," he added.

Estonian President To Discuss Concerns Regarding Putin With Bush. The Washington Post (11/28, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "On the eve of the first visit to" Estonia "by a sitting US president, Estonia's new president [Toomas Hendrik Ilves] voiced concern Monday over the poisoning death of a prominent Kremlin critic in London, portraying it as another worrisome signal about the political situation in Russia. … His comments suggested that Bush will also be discussing growing concern in Europe and the United States over rising authoritarianism in Russia under President Vladimir Putin and his hostile relations with some of the new democracies on Russia's borders. Bush will participate in a round of meetings Tuesday morning with Ilves and other Estonian leaders before flying to Riga, Latvia, for the NATO summit. Ilves said he would be discussing Russia's difficult relations with some of its neighbors, especially Georgia, which he visited last week for consultations."

OECD Criticizes Russian Government's Economic Interference. The Financial Times (11/28, Ostrovsky) reports the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development "slammed the Russian government for its expansion into key economic sectors and raised concern about the 'seemingly insatiable appetite' of Gazprom, its state-run energy giant. In a critical report on the Russian economy, the OECD also said that the Kremlin's expansion into key economic areas was a 'disturbing trend' that 'bodes ill' for the country's growth. … 'The expansion of state ownership in important sectors will probably contribute to more rent-seeking, less efficiency and slower growth,' the OECD said."

US Urged To Regard Putin As An "Enemy." The Wall Street Journal's Bret Stephens (11/28) writes, "It's time we start thinking of Vladimir Putin's Russia as an enemy of the United States. … The foreign policy of Russia has become openly, and often gratuitously, hostile to the U.S." According to Stephens, "It was George W. Bush who first saw gold in Mr. Putin's soul, sometime after the Russian had decimated the city of Grozny. It was Condoleezza Rice who came up with the formulation after the Iraq war that the U.S. should 'punish France, ignore Germany and forgive Russia.' And it was this administration that agreed last week to Russian membership in the World Trade Organization, with Mr. Bush thanking Mr. Putin for 'your time and friendship.'"

US Visit Seen As Opportunity For Ukraine's Yanukovych. The Washington Post (11/28, Finn, 690K) reports Ukraine's so-called "Orange Revolution has been kindest to the man who played the villain to the waves of protesters who rolled onto the streets of this capital two years ago. Viktor Yanukovych, once cast as the bluff hack who tried to steal Ukraine's presidential election, is back in power as prime minister thanks to free and fair parliamentary elections in March that were made possible only by the street protests of late 2004. As he prepares for his first official trip to Washington, a four-day visit beginning Sunday, Yanukovych is suddenly projecting himself as the voice of democratic reform. He also appears eager to assure his White House hosts that his popular image as a pro-Russian straw man is a gross distortion. Now, he suggests that he, too, was a catalyst in the transformation of this once stagnating country into the most politically competitive of all the post-Soviet states, a nation where debate is dynamic and where power, ultimately, resides with the people."

Substance Used To Poison Litvinenko Not As Rare As Previously Thought. ABC World News (11/27, story 4, 2:31, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In London, potential clues surfaced in the radiation poisoning death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko." ABC added, "British investigators found traces of the radiation that killed Alexander Litvinenko in three more places the former Russian spy visited but still no real suspects in his poisoning. Just theories. One theory, the Russian security services, the FSB, acting on orders from the government or on their own. Another, President Vladimir Putin's enemies orchestrated the murder to embarrass him and more bizarrely, that Litvinenko killed himself." ABC notes polonium 210 "can be found in commercially-available photo equipment." Professor Peter Zimmerman, nuclear physicist: "It's a lot easier to get a lethal dose of polonium and to prepare it for administration than we thought on the weekend. I think there's a lot of people that could do this." The CBS Evening News (11/27, story 8, 0:50, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "So far, at least three people are being tested for radiation poisoning. They're all reporting some kind of illness. One word the police are not using is 'murder.' They are calling Litvinenko's death suspicious, but they also say they are not ruling anything in or out."

Radiation Reportedly Detected At Berezovsky's Office. The New York Times (11/28, Lyall, 1.16M) reports, "Four days after Mr. Litvinenko died…the police do not seem any closer to solving the mystery of how he was poisoned. … The BBC reported that radiation had been detected in a West End office building and at a building in Mayfair. [Wire services and the Tuesday Guardian cited various sources as saying that one of the buildings included the office of Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian tycoon, who had a long association with Mr. Litvinenko, and the Guardian said, citing anonymous sources, that traces had been found there.]" The Washington Post (11/28, Sullivan, 690K) reports Berezovsky "said in a telephone interview last week that he visited Litvinenko in the hospital during his illness and said Litvinenko told him he had 'no doubt' that he had been poisoned on the 'order from President Putin to kill him.'" The Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (11/28, A19) writes, "every once in a while, an episode such as the death of Alexander Litvinenko comes along to boost the morale of conspiracy theorists -- and remind the rest of us that there does exist a secret world full of characters and plotlines so bizarre and implausible that the bard of betrayal, novelist John le Carre, would be embarrassed to write them."

Thousands Protest Pope's Trip To Turkey. ABC World News (11/27, story 5, 1:43, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "an extraordinary security mobilization is under way in Turkey tonight ahead of the Pope's four-day visit, beginning tomorrow. … The Vatican is so worried about hostile crowds that Benedict won't be using the Popemobile at all this trip. Instead, he'll ride in more heavily armored cars with several decoys. Beneath his papal cassock he may be wearing a bullet-proof vest. He embarks on his first papal trip to a Muslim country Benedict expressed respect and esteem friendship for the Turkish people. But thousands in Istanbul don't share that goodwill. Their banners said 'Pope Don't Come.'"

Pope's Visit Said To Expose Instability Of Turkey's Secular Society. The New York Times (11/28, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "A short 24 hours before a visit by Pope Benedict XVI to this Muslim country, its prime minister finally agreed to meet him publicly. The venue: the airport, on the Turkish leader's way out of town. The elaborate, last-minute choreography pointed to the deep divide that has festered within Turkish society since the foundation of the modern state. … The pope's visit, which begins Tuesday, falls squarely on that sensitive fault line and has brought into stark relief a slow but steady shift: Turkey is feeling its Muslim identity more and more. The trend worries secular Turkish politicians, who believe the state's central tenet is under threat."

Impasse Over Cyprus Stalls Turkey EU Bid. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, A4, 2.04M) reports, "A failure to get a deal on Cyprus will lead to at least a two- to three-year pause in Turkey's negotiations to enter the European Union, analysts, officials and business leaders say. … Negotiations in Helsinki over Cyprus between Turkey and the EU collapsed yesterday. The EU had demanded Turkey open its ports to trade with the Greek-speaking part of Cyprus. Turkey had demanded that the EU open its borders to trade with Turkish-speaking Northern Cyprus."

Author Discusses Turkey EU Bid, Pope Visit. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/28, A14, 2.04M) Hugh Pope, author of "Sons of the Conquerors: The Rise of the Turkic World," writes, "If the much-bruised Turks agonize long and loud about when they'll ever be accepted as Europeans, the Europeans seem willfully blind to the Turks. Another crisis looms in the long-running negotiations over Turkey's possible membership of the European Union, this time over the conveniently distracting issue of access to Turkish ports for Cypriot ships. Meanwhile the reigning pope, who wants to reclaim Europe for Christianity to the exclusion of the Turks, today touches down in this Muslim land."

Activist Who Exposed Forced Abortions In China Subjected To Second Trial. The New York Times (11/28, Kahn, 1.16M) reports, "A Chinese legal expert who exposed abuses in the country's population control policies began a rare second trial on Monday, but his lawyers accused local authorities of preventing them from mounting a vigorous defense. The legal expert, Chen Guangcheng, was sentenced in August to four years and three months…for destroying property and organizing a mob to disrupt traffic. A higher court later quashed the verdict and ordered a new trial, which some supporters of Mr. Chen cited as an important breakthrough for China's Communist Party-run judicial system. But the first day of the new trial, held in the same county court, ended in acrimony. Several of Mr. Chen's most important witnesses were prevented from attending the hearing by thugs who had the backing of local officials, his lawyers said, and the judges in the case declined to grant a defense request to delay the trial." The Washington Post (11/28, Fan, 690K) reports, "The retrial of a blind legal activist kicked off in eastern Shandong province Monday, but not without some of the same courtroom tumult that characterized his first trial, which was widely denounced by human rights advocates, lawyers said. … Chen "highlighted abuses in family planning programs around Linyi. … Officials, whose promotions depended on not exceeding birth quotas, had forced thousands of men and women to have abortions and sterilizations, often conducting midnight raids and beating or holding residents hostage until they complied."

Rebels Attack Darfur Oil Field. The AP (11/28, De Montesquiou) reports, "Darfur rebels attacked an oil field in a rare extension of their campaign east toward the Sudanese capital and said Monday the military garrison guarding the field had surrendered. But the government said its forces repelled the assault and were in full control of the Abu Jabra oil field Monday. The attack on the field on the edge of South Darfur appeared to be another sign that Darfur's violence was spreading across the region. … A Sudanese official in the oil industry said Abu Jabra's capacity had been damaged in the attack, but insisted it would not affect overall production. The state-owned facility pumps up to 10,000 barrels per day — a relatively small output."

UN Facilities In Chad Looted. The AP (11/27, Faul) reports, "With gunfire sounding in the distance, workers took stock Monday of looted U.N. warehouses and government offices in this town in eastern Chad, the latest victim of unrest that started in Sudan's Darfur region and has spread across a swath of Africa. Chadian rebels who have bases in Darfur seized this hub for humanitarian workers Saturday, and government forces retook it Sunday. Amid the upheaval, looters pillaged some $1.5 million in U.N. aid and carted off goods from a courthouse, a national bank office, a cigarette factory and the state archives, said Ouaddai provincial Gov. Mahamat Nimir Hamata."

Ecuador's Likely Next President Promising Radical Reforms. The AP (11/27, Hayes) reports Rafael Correa, "the leftist nationalist headed to victory in Ecuador's presidential race, is already planning radical reforms when he takes office in January. That is putting him on a fast track to a dangerous confrontation with the country's opposition-controlled Congress — a body he has called a 'sewer' but which he needs to carry out his reforms." Correa "calls himself a 'personal friend' of Venezuela's anti-U.S. President Hugo Chavez."

Latin America Resists Liberalized Abortion Laws. The Washington Post (11/28, Aizenman, 690K) reports on the "debate over the proper limits on abortion that is raging…across Latin America. With the exception of Cuba, every nation in this predominantly Catholic region either totally prohibits abortion or limits it to extreme circumstances. And while the global trend over the past decade has been to liberalize abortion laws, efforts to do so in Latin America have been met by an equally determined campaign to strengthen them further. So far, the anti-abortion camp's greatest triumph has been in El Salvador, where in 1998, at the public urging of San Salvador's Archbishop Fernando Saenz Lacalle, lawmakers removed all exceptions to the nation's ban on abortion and increased penalties to up to 50 years' imprisonment."

Castro Government Cracks Down On Rock Climbing. The Wall Street Journal (11/28, 2.04M) reports, "As Cubans begin contemplating life after Fidel Castro, rock climbing has emerged as an improbable political battleground between the government and young Cubans eager to embrace the latest foreign fashions. In 2003, amid a broad crackdown on civil liberties and fraternizing between tourists and Cubans, the government announced that rock climbers henceforth would be required to obtain a special permit. But the government has never granted the required permit to the many climbers who have requested one. Many Cubans and foreigners have continued climbing."

Bush Twins Reportedly Defied US Embassy's Request To Leave Argentina. ABC News' "The Blotter" (11/27) reported, "Amid a growing barrage of front-page headlines, U.S. embassy officials 'strongly suggested' President Bush's twin daughters, Jenna and Barbara Bush, cut short their trip to Buenos Aires because of security issues, U.S. diplomatic and security sources tell ABC News. But the girls have stayed on, celebrating their 25th birthday over the weekend and producing even more headlines about their activities. Officials say the media coverage upstaged publicity plans for the new U.S. Ambassador Anthony Wayne, who had only recently arrived in the country. The Argentinean press blitz followed a report on 'The Blotter' last week that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were stolen last weekend while dining at the popular San Telmo outdoor marketplace despite being guarded by the Secret Service. … According to sources, the U.S. embassy encouraged the two girls to cut their stay short because the added attention was making their security very difficult. But to the dismay and anger of some U.S. embassy and security staff, the girls stayed on."

Embassy Denies ABC News Report. The Washington Post's "Reliable Source" column (11/28, Argetsinger, Roberts) reports, "Late yesterday, the US Embassy there issued a statement denying an ABC News report that embassy officials had 'strongly suggested' the twins cut their trip short because of security issues. … Rather, embassy officials provided 'close support and cooperation.' Barbara left the country late Sunday night; plans called for Jenna to party on until Thursday."

LATimes Celebrates Nepalese Peace Accord. The Los Angeles Times (11/28, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "let us take a moment to celebrate developments in Nepal, whose people danced in the streets last week after Maoist rebels signed a peace accord with the government to end a decade-long insurgency that has killed 13,000 people. Nepal's political progress has been nothing short of remarkable. In less than seven months, its demonstrations of 'people power' have forced a tyrannical king to surrender power and pushed the violent insurgents to the negotiating table."

THE BIG PICTURE:

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice Dept. To Examine Its Use Of NSA Wiretaps (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

The Justice Department's inspector general yesterday announced an investigation into the department's connections to the government's controversial warrantless surveillance program, but officials said the probe will not examine whether the National Security Agency is violating the Constitution or federal statutes.

In a letter to House lawmakers, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said his office decided to open the probe after conducting "initial inquiries" into the program. Under the initiative, the NSA monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the United States and others overseas without court oversight if one of the targets is suspected of ties to terrorism.

The "program review" will examine how the Justice Department has used information obtained from the NSA program, as well as whether Justice lawyers complied with the "legal requirements" that govern it, according to Fine's letter. Officials said the review will not examine whether the program itself is legal.

The announcement signals a new level of scrutiny for the NSA program, which was launched shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and revealed in news reports in December 2005. The program has been ruled unconstitutional by one federal judge, but Bush and other administration officials have strongly defended it as a legal and efficient way to protect the nation from terrorist attacks.

The probe comes amid a dramatically changed political environment. Democrats who have been sharply critical of the surveillance program will soon control the Judiciary and intelligence committees, which oversee Justice and the NSA. Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, called Fine's investigation "long overdue."

Several other House Democrats said the inquiry should be broadened to include the questions of whether the program violated federal laws and how it was approved. Rep. Maurice D. Hinchey (D-N.Y.) also said he is "skeptical about the timing" of the announcement.

"I wonder whether this reversal is only coming now after the election as an attempt to appease Democrats in Congress who have been critical of the NSA program and will soon be in control and armed with subpoena power," Hinchey said in a news release.

Fine has previously declined requests from lawmakers to conduct a broader probe into the legality of the NSA program, arguing that such an inquiry is beyond his jurisdiction. Those requests were referred to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which was forced to abandon its effort after President Bush refused to grant security clearances to lawyers who needed them.

Fine wrote in his letter to lawmakers yesterday that the White House has promised the security clearances necessary to conduct the new investigation. White House spokeswoman Dana Perino declined to comment.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Fine's review "will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern operation of the program."

The probe comes as a newly active presidential civil liberties board received its first detailed briefing about the NSA program. The Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, which was established by Congress and whose five members were appointed by Bush, was provided details about the workings of the NSA program last week.

One member, Lanny J. Davis, a White House lawyer in the Clinton administration, said in an interview that he was "pleasantly surprised" by the privacy protections built into the program. He declined to discuss the program in detail because of secrecy restrictions.

"I was astonished at the extent to which they are all concerned about the legal and civil liberties and privacy implications of what they were doing," Davis said. "It was a constant theme of concern, awareness and training way beyond what I expected."

DOJ_NMG_0098752

Davis said the briefings convinced him that the program had been carefully constructed from the start. "It was clear that as they thought about it, they put it together in a way that minimized problems to the best extent that they could," he said.

Justice Review Will Assess NSA Surveillance Conduct (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General will review President Bush's domestic terrorist surveillance program to see whether federal prosecutors are following laws governing the handling of information gathered by the National Security Agency on suspected U.S.-based terrorists.

"After conducting initial inquiries into the program, we have decided to open a program review that will examine the department's controls and use of information related to the program," Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said in a letter to the House Judiciary Committee leadership.

The Justice Department has described the surveillance program, initiated after the September 11 attacks, as "an essential tool for the intelligence community" in its war on terror, adding that it "ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack."

"In the ongoing conflict with al Qaeda and its allies, the president has the primary duty under the Constitution to protect the American people," the department said in a briefing paper. "The Constitution gives the president the full authority necessary to carry out that solemn duty, and we believe the program is lawful and protects civil liberties."

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales has called the program's scope "very narrow," saying it focused only on communications with al Qaeda. He said it had been "very effective" in protecting the United States and that reviews of it by lawyers at the Justice Department and the NSA found it to be legal.

The White House has agreed to give investigators from the inspector general's office special clearances to probe the program, Mr. Fine noted in his letter, which was sent to Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican, and the panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan.

Earlier this year, Mr. Fine said his office did not have jurisdiction to open an investigation into the program. An inquiry by the Justice Department Office of Professional Responsibility also was blocked this year by the administration when repeated requests for security clearance were denied.

Democrats and Republicans in both the House and Senate have questioned Mr. Bush's constitutional authority to conduct wiretapping, saying -- among other things -- that the program improperly bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court established by Congress to approve or reject secret surveillance or searches of those suspected of terrorism or espionage.

The inspector general's review was conducted in the wake of conflicting rulings by two federal judges.

In Washington, U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle disagreed with the People for the American Way Foundation, a liberal advocacy group that unsuccessfully sought records from the NSA under the Freedom of Information Act to discover how many wiretaps were approved and who reviewed the program.

Judge Huvelle said that even if the program ultimately was found to be illegal, the requested documents were classified and not covered by the act.

In Detroit, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor agreed with a challenge from the American Civil Liberties Union, which said the program was unconstitutional. The judge granted a permanent injunction halting the program but delayed implementing her order pending a Justice Department appeal.

Justice Department Eyes Spy Program (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 28, 2006

The Justice Department has begun an internal investigation into its handling of information gathered in the government's domestic spying program. However, Democrats criticized the review as too narrow to determine whether the program violated federal law.

DOJ_NMG_0098753

The inquiry by Glenn A. Fine, the department's inspector general, will focus on the role of Justice prosecutors and agents in carrying out the warrantless surveillance program run by the National Security Agency.

Fine's investigation is not expected to address whether the controversial program is an unconstitutional expansion of presidential power, as its critics and a federal judge in Detroit have charged.

"After conducting initial inquiries into the program, we have decided to open a program review that will examine the department's controls and use of information related to the program," Fine wrote in a letter dated Monday to House Judiciary Committee leaders. The four-paragraph letter was obtained by The Associated Press.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the agency welcomes the review: "We expect that this review will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern the operation of the program."

In January, Fine's office rejected a request by more than three dozen Democrats to investigate the secret program, which monitors phone calls and e-mails between people in the U.S. and abroad when a link to terrorism is suspected.

Fine's letter outlining his review was welcomed by congressional Democrats. At the same time, they said it falls short of examining issues at the heart of the debate — how the spying program evolved, and whether its creation violated any laws.

"A full investigation into the program as a whole, not just the DOJ's involvement, will be necessary," said Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif.

The review could include whether the spying program complies with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires judicial authorization for electronic surveillance and physical searches of people suspected of espionage or international terrorism on behalf of a foreign power. The Justice Department requests surveillance approval from the FISA court.

Democrats also questioned the timing of the review. Fine's letter noted that his office asked the White House on Oct. 20 for additional security clearances that were approved just last week — following the Nov. 7 elections that gave Democrats control of Congress.

Noting Democrats' renewed power to subpoena Bush administration officials next year, Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., questioned that Fine's investigation "is only coming now after the election as an attempt to appease Democrats" who have been critical of the NSA program.

The letter was sent to House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., and the panel's top Democrat and incoming chairman, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich. Sensenbrenner had no comment. Conyers called the review "a long overdue investigation of a highly controversial program."

The Justice Department has called the program a necessary tool in the fight against terrorism, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is pushing congressional Republicans to authorize it by law before they cede power at the year's end — a prospect with at best a slim shot of approval.

Former Reagan administration national security official Robert F. Turner, now associate director at the Center for National Security Law at the University of Virginia, said congressional demands for sensitive information about the program puts them at odds with long-standing presidential powers over the collection of foreign intelligence.

"It's good that the executive branch, on its own, is making sure that someone's not abusing this power," Turner said. "But when Congress usurps power vested in the president by the people through the Constitution, then it becomes the lawbreaker."

Countering, Caroline Fredrickson, the director of the ACLU's office in Washington, urged Fine "to seek the hidden truth about this program. ... No one, not even the president, is above the law."

Justice Department Begins Internal Review Of Spying Program (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098754

WASHINGTON - Justice Department investigators have launched an inquiry to determine whether the Bush administration's use of the warrantless surveillance program has complied with government procedures.

Glenn Fine, the Justice Department's inspector general, said in a letter to congressional committee leaders Monday that his investigation would be limited to the department's use of information arising from the surveillance and "compliance with legal requirements."

The inquiry won't seek to address questions about the legality of the administration's decision to spy on U.S. residents without court approval.

Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., said a broader investigation was needed because Congress had been kept largely in the dark about the workings of the program and couldn't determine whether the administration's use of the program was legal. In January, Fine declined a request from Lofgren and other Democrats for a more sweeping probe, saying his office lacked jurisdiction.

"Congress needs to craft legislation so that terrorists can be the subject of surveillance while the Constitution of the United States is honored," Lofgren said. "To do that, a full investigation into the program as a whole, not just the (Justice Department's) involvement, will be necessary."

After turning down the request, Fine had referred it to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, which reviews allegations of wrongdoing by Justice Department employees. But the Office of Professional Responsibility was denied security clearances to conduct the investigation.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales later revealed that President Bush had personally refused to grant the security clearances.

In his letter Monday, Fine said he already had a security clearance. He said he asked Gonzales on Oct. 20 for additional clearances for the internal inquiry. Last week, Fine received word that the White House had granted his request.

A spokeswoman for the Inspector General's office declined to comment on what had prompted the investigation.

Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., said he was "skeptical about the timing."

"I wonder whether this reversal is only coming now after the election as an attempt to appease Democrats in Congress," he said.

The Bush administration authorized the eavesdropping program to monitor telephone and Internet communications in and out of the United States when officials have "reasonable grounds to believe" that one party is a member of al-Qaida or an affiliated terrorist organization.

In August, U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit found the program violated the U.S. Constitution's provisions that enumerated separation of powers and the right to free speech and privacy. The Bush administration is appealing the ruling.

Administration officials said the program is subject to extensive oversight and is reviewed every 45 days. The administration kept the program under wraps until the New York Times revealed its existence in late 2005.

Last week, Gonzales defended the program.

"Common myths about the Terrorist Surveillance Program are that it is an invasion of privacy and an unlawful eavesdropping tool," Gonzales said. "I want to be very clear about the facts here: The Terrorist Surveillance Program does not invade anyone's privacy, unless you are talking to the enemy in this time of war."

Meanwhile, the Associated Press reported Monday that a government board, which Congress created and whose members Bush appointed, has been given details about the program.

Board members said they were impressed by the government's oversight of the program.

"If the American public, especially civil libertarians like myself, could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy while still protecting us from attacks, we'd be more reassured," said Lanny Davis, a board member and a former special counsel to President Clinton.

Justice Official Opens Spying Inquiry (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — After months of pressure from Congressional Democrats, the Justice Department's inspector general said Monday that his office had opened a full review into the department's role in President Bush's domestic eavesdropping program and the legal requirements governing the program.

Democrats said they saw the investigation as a welcome step that could answer questions about the operations and legal underpinnings of the program, which allows the National Security Agency to monitor, without obtaining court warrants, the international communications of Americans and others inside this country with suspected terrorist ties.

"This is a long overdue investigation of a highly controversial program," said Representative John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat who will take over as chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

Last December, more than three dozen Democrats called for the Justice Department inspector general, Glenn A. Fine, to open an investigation.

Mr. Fine declined at the time, saying a review of the program's legality fell outside his jurisdiction. He referred the matter to another arm of the Justice Department, the Office of Professional Responsibility. That office sought to examine ethical issues surrounding the roles played by Justice Department lawyers in the eavesdropping program. But its review was blocked this year when Mr. Bush personally refused security clearances for its investigators.

Democrats have since renewed their calls for a full Justice Department investigation, accusing the Bush administration of stonewalling. On Monday, Mr. Fine informed members of Congress in a letter that he was opening an investigation after the White House had agreed to approve the necessary security clearances for members of his staff.

The review will have a somewhat different scope than the investigation sought and rejected last year. The review, Mr. Fine said in his letter, will examine the controls in place at the Justice Department for the eavesdropping, the way information developed from it was used, and the department's "compliance with legal requirements governing the program."

Officials said the investigation could examine the legal authority given to the Justice Department under a secret executive order first signed by Mr. Bush in October 2001, as well as the laws and procedures governing intelligence wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which was approved by Congress in 1978 after the Watergate scandal and required a special court warrant for wiretaps on Americans. The review could also look at how intelligence generated by the eavesdropping was used to seek traditional court warrants and to pursue criminal cases, the officials said.

An official with the inspector general's office, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the office's position had not changed since it declined to review the program in January. "It was beyond our jurisdiction, and it still is beyond our jurisdiction, to review the legality or the constitutionality of the program, and that's not what we're doing here," the official said.

Congressional Democrats said they were eager to see what areas the inspector general would decide to review. Mr. Fine has a reputation as a strong and independent watchdog within the Justice Department, and he has issued a number of highly critical reports about the department's policies and practices since the terrorism attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Still, several Democrats suggested that the timing of his review might be tied to their takeover of Congress in this month's midterm elections as a way to pre-empt expected Democratic investigations of the N.S.A. program.

"It's hard to ignore the fact that there is a correlation in the timing," said Representative Zoe Lofgren, a California Democrat who helped lead the push for a Justice Department investigation.

"I don't know why the White House would stonewall for a year, then within a month of the election, agree to these security clearances" for the inspector general's staff, Ms. Lofgren said in an interview. "We don't know what it means, but we'll find out."

Mr. Fine said in his letter to members of Congress that he decided to open his investigation after "conducting initial inquiries" into the eavesdropping operation. That initial inquiry was limited to Mr. Fine and two other supervisors in his office who had security clearance to review the program, but it will now be widened to include investigators and staff members, officials said.

The Justice Department said it welcomed the inspector general's investigation. "We expect that this review will assist Justice Department personnel in ensuring that the department's activities comply with the legal requirements that govern the operation of the program," said Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman.

The administration has strongly defended the legality of the eavesdropping program, but a federal judge in Detroit ruled in August that the program was illegal and unconstitutional. The Bush administration is now appealing that decision.

Domestic Spying Program To Get Internal Review (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27, 2006 — The Justice Department's inspector general has informed the Judiciary and Intelligence committees of both the House and Senate that he will begin a review of the controversial NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program.

In a letter to the committees, Inspector General Glenn Fine wrote that the review would be to examine the Justice Department's "controls and use of information related to the program and the department's compliance with legal requirements governing the program."

The inspector general's office had previously deferred a congressional request to review the NSA program and the attorney general's authorization of the program to the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, an internal DOJ watchdog that monitors the activities of DOJ lawyers.

In March, Fine noted in a report to Congress on the USA PATRIOT Act, "Under the department's interpretation of the jurisdictional authority of the OIG and OPR, allegations regarding the attorney general's legal authorization of NSA surveillance fell within DOJ OPR's jurisdiction, not the OIG's."

After an initial review by OPR earlier this year, the congressional oversight committees were informed by the chief OPR attorney, Marshall Jarrett, that his attorneys had repeatedly been denied proper security clearances by the White House.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee in July 2006 that the decision not to grant the clearances was ultimately made by President Bush.

"As with all decisions that are non-operation in terms of who has access to the program, the president of the United States makes the decision," Gonzales said.

Members of Congress have been asking for the internal Justice Department review since the program was first disclosed by the New York Times last year.

"After trying for nearly a year to get DOJ to conduct an investigation of the NSA's warrantless spy program, I am very pleased to learn that the agency's inspector general is finally opening an investigation," Rep. Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., said in response to Fine's letter.

Oversight Board Briefed On NSA Program (AP-Y)

By John Solomon

AP, November 28, 2006

After a delay of more than a year, a government board appointed to guard Americans' privacy and civil liberties during the war on terror has been told the inner workings of the government's electronic eavesdropping program.

Members say they were impressed by the protections.

The briefing for the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board had been delayed because President Bush was concerned — after several press leaks — about widening the circle of people who knew the exact details of the secret eavesdropping program.

The board, created by Congress but appointed by Bush, focused on other classified work since it was named in spring 2005 but it continued to press for a formal briefing by the National Security Agency.

A breakthrough was reached in recent days and the five members were briefed by senior officials during Thanksgiving week.

Board members told The Associated Press they were impressed by the safeguards the government has built into the NSA's monitoring of phone calls and computer transmissions and wished the administration could tell the public more about them to ease distrust.

"If the American public, especially civil libertarians like myself, could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy while still protecting us from attacks, we'd be more reassured," said Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House lawyer who is the board's lone liberal Democrat.

Davis said he believes the administration could tell the public more about the program's protections without compromising national security.

Alan Raul, a former Reagan White House lawyer and the board's vice chairman, said he too was impressed.

"We found there was a great appreciation inside government, both at the political and career levels, for protections on privacy and civil liberties," said Raul, author of a book of privacy and civil liberties. "In fact, I think the public may have an underappreciation for the degree of seriousness the government is giving these protections."

The board members are prohibited from discussing any specific protections or tactics because the NSA program remains classified.

While board members were impressed, the top Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee urged colleagues on Monday not to approve legislation formally legalizing the NSA program until Congress gets more answers.

"The fact is, despite repeated assurances from the administration, members of Congress remain in the dark and cannot answer fundamental questions about the program's scope, effectiveness or legal justification," said Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va. "As one of the few members who have received the most detailed information to date, I can say that the administration has not been able to document convincingly the benefits of the program."

The board was created as a compromise between Congress and the White House amid growing public and congressional concerns about the government's tactics in the war on terror and their impact on civil rights.

Those concerns were fueled in part by news leaks that divulged the existence of the NSA's eavesdropping program, a similar terrorist finance tracking system and secret CIA prisons where high value targets have been interrogated.

Democrats, who are about to take over Congress in January, have been concerned the board doesn't have enough independence because the political compromise struck in late 2004 left the board under the authority of the president.

Some have discussed elevating the board to an independent body like the Sept. 11 review commission. Board members were meeting Monday at the White House with two dozen congressional staffers to discuss those concerns and options.

After meeting in private 16 times over the last year to discuss classified matters and to be briefed by every major U.S. intelligence agency, the board has scheduled its first public hearing Dec. 5 to solicit testimony from nongovernment privacy experts.

The forum, to be held at Georgetown University, will hear from some of the administration's privacy critics, including the American Civil Liberties Union and the Electronic Privacy Information Center, as well as conservative and academic voices.

Court Clears Way For Prosecutor To Review Records In Times Case (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

The United States Supreme Court refused yesterday to stop a federal prosecutor from reviewing the telephone records of two reporters for The New York Times. The records, the newspaper said, include information about many of the reporters' confidential sources.

In a one-sentence order offering no reasoning and noting no dissenting votes, the Supreme Court rejected a request from The Times to stay a lower court's decision while the paper tried to persuade the justices to review the case.

Yesterday's order effectively allows the United States attorney in Chicago, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, to begin reviewing the records, which he has already obtained from the reporters' phone companies, as early as this week.

The Justice Department told the Supreme Court on Friday that Mr. Fitzgerald was under enormous time pressure. "The statute of limitations," the government said, "will imminently expire on Dec. 3 and 13, 2006, on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating."

The grand jury, in Chicago, is looking into who told the reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, about actions the government was planning to take in December 2001 against two Islamic charities in Illinois and Texas. The disclosures to the reporters, the government lawyers wrote on Friday, may have amounted to obstruction of justice.

In August, a three-judge panel of the federal appeals court in Manhattan ruled, 2 to 1, in favor of Mr. Fitzgerald, saying that the reporters were not entitled to shield their sources in the unusual circumstances of the case. The government contended that the reporters had tipped off the charities to the impending actions against them. The Times said the reporters had engaged only in routine newsgathering.

The appeals court also rejected The Times's argument that the grand jury subpoenas, issued directly to the phone companies, were too broad. The subpoenas, the government said, covered 11 days in September and December 2001. Lawyers for The Times said the requested records could expose scores of confidential sources, most of them unrelated to the two charities.

The appeals court responded by sending the case back to the trial judge to allow The Times an opportunity to black out information concerning those other sources. But because that exercise would, in effect, identify the sources of interest to Mr. Fitzgerald, lawyers for the paper have indicated that they will not cooperate.

In a letter to the Supreme Court on Friday, government lawyers said they hoped to obtain authorization from the trial judge, Robert W. Sweet of Federal District Court in Manhattan, to begin their review as soon as tomorrow.

Ms. Miller, who retired from The Times last year after serving 85 days in jail in connection with an unrelated leak investigation also supervised by Mr. Fitzgerald, said the phone records by themselves might not satisfy the government.

"It doesn't end there," Ms. Miller said. "Then there will be subpoenas for, 'What did you say to that person?' "

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald, declined to comment.

Yesterday's decision is the latest in a series of setbacks for the press in the federal courts. "It's more bad news for the First Amendment," Ms. Miller said, "and therefore it's more bad news for the public's right to know."

Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for The Times, said the decision was a battle lost in a larger war.

"This case is the latest of a number of skirmishes in an ongoing and far from concluded conflict about the public's right to information" Mr. Abrams said. "We remain hopeful that in the end, whether in the courts or in Congress, that right will be vindicated."

Court Rejects N.Y. Times On Leak Probe (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court ruled against The New York Times on Monday, refusing to block the government from reviewing telephone records of two Times reporters in a leak investigation concerning a terrorism-funding probe.

The one-sentence order came in a First Amendment battle that involves stories written in 2001 by Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The stories revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald is trying to track down the reporters' confidential sources for the stories. Fitzgerald's spokesman, Randall Samborn, declined to comment on the Supreme Court's order.

The case marks the second refusal by the court in as many years to sort out a clash between the federal government and the Times over press freedom.

In June 2005, the Supreme Court refused to take up the Times' request to hear an appeal in the CIA leak investigation involving the outing of Valerie Plame. In that case, Miller, who retired from the Times a year ago, spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a federal grand jury. Fitzgerald, in a role as a special counsel, conducted that leak investigation as well.

Monday's rejection "is just further indication that we're getting absolutely nowhere with the court when it comes to protecting confidential sources," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

The case points out a growing problem of reporters trying to protect their sources in the information age, press advocates say. Rather than threatening reporters with jail if they don't testify, the government can go through the back door to hunt down confidential sources by amassing phone records and credit card receipts.

"It's impossible to operate on cash only and face-to-face and do your job as journalists," said University of Minnesota media ethics and law professor Jane E. Kirtley.

Dalglish said that protection of phone record confidentiality is among the issues that should be addressed in federal shield law legislation she and other press advocates are urging Congress to consider.

DOJ_NMG_0098759

Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for the Times, said the current case is part of a larger dispute over the public's right to information.

"We remain hopeful that in the end, whether in the courts or in Congress, that right will be vindicated," Abrams said.

The current dispute stems from Shenon and Miller calling the two charities for comment after learning of the planned freeze on their assets from confidential sources.

The Justice Department says the reporters' calls tipped off the charities of upcoming government raids. A federal judge who ruled in the Times' favor said there is no evidence in the case even suggesting that the reporters tipped off the charities about the raids or that the reporters even knew the government would raid either charity.

In August, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 that federal prosecutors could see the two reporters' phone records.

The government says the fact that the reporters relayed disclosures from a government source to "targets of an imminent law enforcement action substantially weakens any claim of freedom of the press."

At issue are 11 days of phone records the government plans to review from 2001 - for the dates Sept. 27-30, Dec. 1-3 and Dec. 10-13. In a declaration this month, Fitzgerald said the statute of limitations "on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating" will expire on Dec. 3 and Dec. 13 of this year.

The current leak probe is in Fitzgerald's capacity as U.S. attorney in Chicago. The Libby prosecution is in Fitzgerald's role as a special counsel who was selected by a Justice Department superior to conduct that investigation.

New York Times Loses Bid To Protect Phone Records (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court ruled against the New York Times, refusing to block the government from reviewing the phone records of two Times reporters in a leak investigation of a terrorism-funding probe.

The one-sentence order came in a First Amendment battle that involves articles written in 2001 by New York Times Co. reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The articles revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

The dispute stems from Mr. Shenon and Ms. Miller calling two charities for comment after learning of the planned freeze on their assets from confidential sources.

The Justice Department says the reporters' calls tipped off the charities to coming government raids. A federal judge who ruled in the newspaper's favor said there is no evidence in the case to suggest that the reporters tipped off the charities about the raids or that the reporters even knew the government would raid either charity.

In August, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 that federal prosecutors could see the two reporters' phone records.

The government says the fact that the reporters relayed disclosures from a government source to "targets of an imminent law enforcement action substantially weakens any claim of freedom of the press."

At issue are 11 days of New York Times phone records from 2001. The government is seeking the court's permission to review the records, which the government already has in its possession. The next step is likely to be a hearing this week to determine how much leeway the Times can have to delete phone numbers of sources in the records that have nothing to do with the case in question, said Floyd Abrams, a lawyer for the Times: "The question here is are there any limits the court may place on the government's review?"

Mr. Abrams said yesterday the decision highlighted legal uncertainty about journalists' protection under the First Amendment. "This area of law remains confused and inconsistent and often incoherent," he said. "Sooner rather than later the Supreme Court is likely to review the issue."

Like the CIA leak investigation into who in the Bush administration revealed the identity of Valerie Plame, the current Justice Department probe is being conducted by Patrick Fitzgerald, who is prosecuting Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff in the Plame case.

Court Won't Hear Case On Reporters' Phone Records (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday refused a request from the New York Times to stop federal prosecutors from examining the telephone records of two of its reporters, part of a grand jury probe of an alleged leak in a terrorism-funding investigation.

The court's decision not to get involved opens the way for U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald in Chicago to review the telephone records of Times reporter Philip Shenon and former reporter Judith Miller. He has said the statute of limitations will expire on Dec. 3 on certain offenses a grand jury is investigating, and on Dec. 13 on others.

The Times had asked Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg to stay an appeals court ruling in the government's favor. She referred the matter to the full court, and it declined yesterday in a one-sentence order that did not state its reasoning.

It was the second time in as many years the court has refused to get involved in a case pitting the government against the Times, and it lets stand a ruling that is the latest in a string of court decisions to go against media organizations that resist revealing confidential sources.

The current case arises from Fitzgerald's post-Sept. 11, 2001, investigation of possible links between al-Qaeda and two U.S.-based Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

In December 2001, the Times reporters learned of plans to freeze the groups' assets, and called for comment shortly before FBI agents raided the offices. Fitzgerald is trying to find out if any government officials illegally leaked information to the reporters, and said disclosure of the government's plans tipped off the charities, endangering law enforcement officials. The Times disputes this.

Two years after the stories, and after the Times had declined to reveal its confidential sources, Fitzgerald said he planned to subpoena approximately three weeks' worth of the reporters' telephone records. The Times contends that could reveal the identities of sources who have no relationship to the investigation.

"The issue in this case is whether reporters have any protection at all against compelled disclosure of their sources and whether the government may overcome such protections that do exist based only on a conclusory affidavit of counsel lacking anything that resembles clear and specific evidence," the newspaper's motion said.

A district judge in New York in 2005 agreed with the Times that it had a right to protect confidential sources. But a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit disagreed, ruling 2 to 1 that the Times had no First Amendment or other legal right to block the government from reviewing the records.

The Justice Department told the court that the case did not rise to the level that would compel the court's interest.

"In light of that potential bar to the grand jury's completion of its work, delay holds a serious potential to thwart the full scope of a criminal investigation," its motion argued.

"In contrast, the harm to applicant is not nearly so great as it suggests. The court's narrow holding in this unusual case does not create a far-reaching precedent allowing disclosure into the confidentiality of a reporter's sources."

The Supreme Court's action continues a losing streak for media organizations that are being challenged to reveal their sources and is the second involving Fitzgerald and Miller.

Acting as a Justice Department special counsel, Fitzgerald sought testimony from Miller and other reporters in his investigation into whether Bush administration officials revealed the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame. Miller spent 85 days in jail before testifying to a grand jury, which indicted Vice President Cheney's then-chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

The Supreme Court in June 2005 declined to get involved in that case.

Both nuclear scientist Wen Ho Lee and former Army scientist Steven J. Hatfill, in civil suits, have convinced courts that journalists must answer questions about confidential sources who they say have damaged their reputation.

Lawyer Floyd Abrams, who represents the Times, said there is no doubt that "a number of recent decisions have gone against the press, particularly in areas where the government is using grand juries and had a national security claim of one sort or another."

But he contends there is a "significant split" among lower courts and an "enormous amount of confusion in the law" about whether journalists have a First Amendment privilege, which will have to be addressed by the high court or Congress.

Gingrich Raises Alarm At Event Honoring Those Who Stand Up For Freedom Of Speech (UL)

By Riley Yates

Union Leader.com, November 28, 2006

MANCHESTER – Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich yesterday said the country will be forced to reexamine freedom of speech to meet the threat of terrorism.

GINGRICH

Gingrich, speaking at a Manchester awards banquet, said a "different set of rules" may be needed to reduce terrorists' ability to use the Internet and free speech to recruit and get out their message.

"We need to get ahead of the curve before we actually lose a city, which I think could happen in the next decade," said Gingrich, a Republican who helped engineer the GOP's takeover of Congress in 1994.

Gingrich spoke to about 400 state and local power brokers last night at the annual Nackey S. Loeb First Amendment award dinner, which fetes people and organizations that stand up for freedom of speech.

Gingrich sharply criticized campaign finance laws he charged were reducing free speech and doing little to fight attack advertising. He also said court rulings over separation of church and state have hurt citizens' ability to express themselves and their faith.

Last night's event, held at the Radisson Hotel-Center of New Hampshire, honored a Lakes Region newspaper and a former speaker of the House for work in favor of free expression.

The Citizen of Laconia was given the Nackey S. Loeb First Amendment Award, which is named after the longtime President and Publisher of the Union Leader Corporation, owner of New Hampshire's statewide newspaper.

The Citizen scrutinized the Newfound Area School Board beginning last year over a series of e-mail discussions held before public meetings. It also used the right-to-know law to uncover costly decisions by the town of Tilton this year.

Executive Editor John Howe said the decision to pursue the stories led to at least one advertiser canceling its business with the paper.

"We try to practice what we preach, even if it costs us business," Howe said. "And it has and it will in the future.

Also honored was Marshall Cobleigh, former House speaker and a longtime aide to former Gov. Meldrim Thomson.

Cobleigh introduced an amendment to the state Constitution defending free speech. He also helped shepherd the state's 1967 right-to-know law through the Legislature.

Gingrich's speech focused on the First Amendment, but in an interview beforehand, he also hit upon wide-ranging topics.

Gingrich said America has "failed" in Iraq over the past three years and urged a new approach to winning the conflict. The U.S. needs to engage Syria and Iran and increase investment to train the Iraqi army and a national police force, he said. "How does a defeat for America make us safer?" Gingrich said. "I would look at an entirely new strategy." He added: "We have clearly failed in the last three years to achieve the kind of outcome we want."

Political parties in Presidential primary states should host events that invite candidates from both parties to discuss issues, said Gingrich, who criticized the sharpness of today's politics.

Gingrich said voters unhappy with the war, the response to Hurricane Katrina and pork barrel spending were the main drive behind the GOP's rejection at the polls. But he argued Republicans would have retained the Senate and just narrowly lost the House if President Bush had announced the departure of embattled Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld before, instead of after, the election.

Gingrich said he will not decide whether he is running for President until September 2007.

The event last night was sponsored by the Nackey S. Loeb School of Communications. The school was founded in 1999 to promote journalism and other forms of communication.

PATRIOT ACT:

Raided Muslim Charity Sues Bank Over Plan To Close Accounts, Says Patriot Act Unconstitutional (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098762

(AP) - DETROIT-A Muslim charity raided by federal agents in September has sued a bank, saying it violated the charity's civil rights by planning to close its accounts.

The charity, Life for Relief and Development, based in Southfield, Michigan, also seeks an injunction to stop Comerica Bank from giving other banks any information it might have about the organization. The charity is challenging the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act, which allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity.

The Patriot Act, approved by Congress shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, was designed to give law enforcement agencies more tools to combat terrorism, but some provisions were challenged on constitutional grounds for restricting civil liberties.

Comerica had told the charity that it planned to terminate the accounts Nov. 15, but granted an extension, according to the lawsuit.

Comerica Vice President Kathy Pitton declined to comment on the lawsuit, filed Wednesday in federal court.

FBI agents assigned to a terrorism task force searched Life's offices Sept. 18, seizing computer servers, donor records and other financial documents. They also searched the homes of the charity's chief executive, an ex-employee and two board members.

The FBI would not say what agents were looking for, but charity officials have said it might be related to relief work the group did in Iraq. The international humanitarian organization also is active in Afghanistan.

No charges have been filed. The charity has sought to reassure the Detroit area's Muslim community that it is legal to donate money to the organization, which was founded in 1992 by Iraqi immigrants.

Muslim Charity Sues Comerica Over Accounts (FREEP)

By Niraj Warikoo, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, November 28, 2006

A Muslim charity based in Southfield has filed suit against Comerica, saying the bank violated the charity's civil rights by planning to close its accounts.

Life for Relief and Development also is challenging the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act that allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity with each other and with the federal government.

The suit asks the court for an injunction that would prevent Comerica from giving other banks any information it might have about Life.

Federal agents raided the Islamic charity's office two months ago, but no charges were filed and no allegations have been made.

The lawsuit was filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Detroit.

The filing occurred days after a senior vice president with Comerica, James Garavaglia, met with Arab-American leaders to explain how the Patriot Act requires banks to work with the government.

Charity officials worry that Life's reputation would be harmed if Comerica officials spread allegations about the group to other banks.

"A charity, especially a Muslim charity, has to live by its reputation," said Shereef Akeel, attorney for Life.

Comerica had planned to terminate the charity's checking accounts on Nov. 15, but after protests, the bank granted an extension.

On Friday, Comerica Vice President Kathy Pitton would not comment on the lawsuit. "It is our policy to not discuss customer relationships," she said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

At National Airport, Prayers Against Profiling (WP/AP)

By Leslie Miller

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

Imams, ministers and a rabbi staged a pray-in yesterday at Reagan National Airport and demanded an apology from US Airways for barring six Muslim clerics from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight last week.

The religious leaders called for an end to racial profiling, saying it was unacceptable in the United States.

"These things are troubling to us," said Mahdi Bray, executive director of the Muslim American Society Freedom Foundation.

Imam Omar Shahin, one of the six imams detained last Monday at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport, said they had not done anything suspicious.

The imams, who were returning from a religious conference, had prayed on their prayer rugs in the airport before the flight. After they boarded the flight, a passenger, who was alarmed by their activity, passed a note to a flight attendant. The men were taken off the airplane, handcuffed and questioned.

"It was the worst moment in my life," Shahin said.

US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said prayer was never the issue.

"Apparently, as they were boarding, one passenger overheard them saying what they thought were anti-U.S. statements," Rader said.

She also said the men got up and moved around the airplane, so the flight crew consulted with the airline about whether they might pose a security risk. Local law enforcement and the FBI thought they did, she said.

"We're sorry the imams had a difficult time, but we do think the crews have to make these calls, and we think they made the right one," she said. US Airways plans to meet with the imams this week, Rader said.

Yesterday, Shahin and a handful of other Muslims bowed down on rugs and prayed in National's Terminal A, near the US Airways ticket counter. Jewish and Christian clergy also said prayers.

After the prayer session, Shahin and other religious leaders boarded a US Airways flight to demonstrate their determination to continue praying and flying.

Hilary Shelton, director of the NAACP national office, called on Congress to pass legislation to bar racial profiling. The bill is necessary because airlines are unclear how to deal with racial and ethnic profiling, he said.

In the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, four airlines accused of breaking federal anti-discrimination laws settled with the government. Transportation Department investigations found that the airlines had unlawfully removed passengers because of their perceived ethnic or religious backgrounds.

Though the air carriers -- American Airlines, United Airlines, Delta Air Lines and Continental Airlines -- admitted no wrongdoing, they agreed to carry out civil rights training for their employees.

The Transportation Department hasn't received any complaints about the latest incident, said spokesman Brian Turmail.

"Should someone file a complaint, then we would investigate," Turmail said.

The Homeland Security Department's Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties said last week that it was investigating the US Airways incident.

Clerics Protest With Prayer At Reagan National (USAT)

A small group of Muslim imams, Christian ministers and a Jewish rabbi staged a “pray-in” demonstration Monday at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. They demanded an apology from US Airways for barring six Muslims from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight. The clerics also called for an end to racial profiling.

Imam Omar Shahin, one of the six imams detained Nov. 20 at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport, said they hadn't done anything suspicious. The imams had prayed in the airport before the flight. After boarding, a passenger passed a note to a flight attendant, and the men were taken off the plane, handcuffed and questioned.

US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said prayer was never the issue. “Apparently … one passenger overheard them saying what they thought were anti-U.S. statements,” Rader said.

Court turns down ‘Times,' won't hear vouchers appeal

The Supreme Court ruled against The New York Times, refusing to block the government from reviewing the phone records of two reporters in a leak investigation of a terrorism-funding probe.

The order came in a First Amendment battle that involves stories written in 2001 by Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The stories revealed government plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

The court also declined to hear a challenge to a Maine law that bars the use of public funds to send students to private religious schools. School districts in 145 small towns in Maine that have no high schools currently offer tuition for 17,000 students to attend high schools of their choice, public or private, except for religious schools.

Inspector general to probe terrorism wiretap program

The inspector general's office at the Department of Justice has opened an investigation into the agency's use of information gathered in the government's warrantless surveillance program. In a letter to House Judiciary Committee leaders obtained by the Associated Press, Inspector General Glenn Fine said the probe would focus on the department's role in carrying out the spying program run by the National Security Agency. The review comes a week after a federal judge ruled that the NSA is not required to release details on its wiretapping program, which targets communications between people in this country and people overseas when a link to terrorism is suspected.

Meanwhile, members of the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board told the Associated Press they were impressed by safeguards the government has built into the NSA's eavesdropping program. The board was briefed on the inner workings of the program during Thanksgiving week. “If the American public … could be more informed about how careful the government is to protect our privacy … we'd be more reassured,” said Lanny Davis, a former Clinton White House lawyer.

How The Imams Terrorized An Airliner (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Muslim religious leaders removed from a Minneapolis flight last week exhibited behavior associated with a security probe by terrorists and were not merely engaged in prayers, according to witnesses, police reports and aviation security officials.

Witnesses said three of the imams were praying loudly in the concourse and repeatedly shouted "Allah" when passengers were called for boarding US Airways Flight 300 to Phoenix.

"I was suspicious by the way they were praying very loud," the gate agent told the Minneapolis Police Department.

Passengers and flight attendants told law-enforcement officials the imams switched from their assigned seats to a pattern associated with the September 11 terrorist attacks and also found in probes of U.S. security since the attacks -- two in the front row first-class, two in the middle of the plane on the exit aisle and two in the rear of the cabin.

"That would alarm me," said a federal air marshal who asked to remain anonymous. "They now control all of the entry and exit routes to the plane."

A pilot from another airline said: "That behavior has been identified as a terrorist probe in the airline industry."

But the imams who were escorted off the flight in handcuffs say they were merely praying before the 6:30 p.m. flight on Nov. 20, and yesterday led a protest by prayer with other religious leaders at the airline's ticket counter at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport.

DOJ_NMG_0098765

Mahdi Bray, executive director of the Muslim American Society Freedom Foundation, called removing the imams an act of Islamophobia and compared it to racism against blacks.

"It's a shame that as an African-American and a Muslim I have the double whammy of having to worry about driving while black and flying while Muslim," Mr. Bray said.

The protesters also called on Congress to pass legislation to outlaw passenger profiling.

Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, Texas Democrat, said the September 11 terrorist attacks "cannot be permitted to be used to justify racial profiling, harassment and discrimination of Muslim and Arab Americans."

"Understandably, the imams felt profiled, humiliated, and discriminated against by their treatment," she said.

According to witnesses, police reports and aviation security officials, the imams displayed other suspicious behavior.

Three of the men asked for seat-belt extenders, although two flight attendants told police the men were not oversized. One flight attendant told police she "found this unsettling, as crew knew about the six [passengers] on board and where they were sitting." Rather than attach the extensions, the men placed the straps and buckles on the cabin floor, the flight attendant said.

The imams said they were not discussing politics and only spoke in English, but witnesses told law enforcement that the men spoke in Arabic and English, criticizing the war in Iraq and President Bush, and talking about al Qaeda and Osama bin Laden.

The imams who claimed two first-class seats said their tickets were upgraded. The gate agent told police that when the imams asked to be upgraded, they were told no such seats were available. Nevertheless, the two men were seated in first class when removed.

A flight attendant said one of the men made two trips to the rear of the plane to talk to the imam during boarding, and again when the flight was delayed because of their behavior. Aviation officials, including air marshals and pilots, said these actions alone would not warrant a second look, but the combination is suspicious.

"That's like shouting 'fire' in a crowded theater. You just can't do that anymore," said Robert MacLean, a former air marshal.

"They should have been denied boarding and been investigated," Mr. MacLean said. "It looks like they are trying to create public sympathy or maybe setting someone up for a lawsuit."

The pilot with another airline who talked to The Washington Times on condition of anonymity, said he would have made the same call as the US Airways pilot.

"If any group of passengers is commingling in the terminal and didn't sit in their assigned seats or with each other, I would stop everything and investigate until they could provide me with a reason they did not sit in their assigned seats."

One of the passengers, Omar Shahin, told Newsweek the group did everything it could to avoid suspicion by wearing Western clothes, speaking English and booking seats so they were not together. He said they conducted prayers quietly and separately to avoid attention.

The imams had attended a conference sponsored by the North American Imam Federation in Minneapolis and were returning to Phoenix. Mr. Shahin, who is president of the federation, said on his Web site that none of the passengers made pro-Saddam or anti-American statements.

The pilot said the airlines are not "secretly prejudiced against any nationality, religion or culture," and that the only target of profiling is passenger behavior.

"There are certain behaviors that raise the bar, and not sitting in your assigned seat raises the bar substantially," the pilot said. "Especially since we know that this behavior has been evident in suspicious probes in the past."

"Someone at US Airways made a notably good decision," said a second pilot, who also does not work for US Airways.

A spokeswoman for US Airways declined to discuss the incident. Aviation security officials said thousands of Muslims fly every day and conduct prayers in airports in a quiet and private manner without creating incidents.

Bottle And Threatening Note Found (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0098766

Authorities closed the Lincoln Memorial for more than two hours yesterday after receiving reports of a suspicious liquid and a threatening note on the grounds, officials said. Tests showed no evidence of a harmful substance.

D.C. firefighters received a call at 12:40 p.m. reporting that a bottle believed to contain a liquid was found in the women's restroom in the base of the memorial, fire and federal homeland security officials said.

While a hazardous materials unit was en route, U.S. Park Police became concerned about a letter discovered on the statue of Lincoln in the main chamber of the memorial. According to officials, the letter asked, "Do you know what anthrax is?" and "Do you know what a bomb is?" In addition, a thermos that police found on the memorial steps was initially considered suspicious, officials said.

Officials closed the memorial, and the objects were tested by police explosives experts and the fire department's hazardous materials team, according to Wayne Benson, battalion fire chief in the Special Operations Division. They were deemed harmless and turned over to police and the FBI for a criminal investigation, officials said.

The Gatorade bottle found in the restroom was empty, said Alan Etter, a fire department spokesman. Etter said police were given the threatening letter by someone who found it on the statue of Lincoln.

The monument reopened about 3 p.m.

Park Police put out an alert to look for a man seen leaving the site about 12:30 p.m. He was described as white, about 6 feet tall and 200 pounds, with blond hair and wearing a green knit hat and green shirt. He appeared to be 30 to 35, according to the bulletin.

Lincoln Memorial Closed Briefly (AP-Y)

By Lubna Takruri

AP, November 28, 2006

Authorities briefly closed the Lincoln Memorial on Monday after finding suspicious containers and a note reading, "Do you know what anthrax is?" and "Do you know what a bomb is?"

The scare began about noon when a visitor to the memorial discovered the note in a plastic document holder near the steps of the memorial.

After evacuating the area, U.S. Park Police found a travelers' coffee mug near the note on the steps and a Gatorade bottle in a women's restroom, said Wayne Benson, a battalion chief with the District of Columbia fire department.

None of the objects was found to be a threat, Benson said.

The memorial was reopened less than three hours later. No injuries were reported.

Benson would not confirm the contents of the note. An official from the Department of Homeland Security, who asked to not be identified because his agency was not in charge of the incident, quoted the questions about anthrax and bombs.

During the closure, hazardous materials crews in protective suits were seen working at the site, and the public was kept about 50 yards from the base of the memorial. Explosives experts and K-9 units were also called to the scene, Benson said.

Park Police Lt. Donald Robinson said his agency and the FBI continued to investigate.

Union Looks To Democrats On TSA Screener Rights (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

Baggage and passenger screeners at the Transportation Security Administration are not allowed to bargain over the terms and conditions of their employment, but the largest federal union hopes to get the Democratic majority in the next Congress to take another look at whether that ban is justified.

The American Federation of Government Employees, headed by John Gage, won a favorable opinion from a Geneva-based, U.N. agency, the International Labor Organization, on the issue of screener rights.

The ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association, in an opinion this month, said that it was concerned that the TSA's decision in 2003 to invoke national security considerations to block union representation "may impede unduly upon the rights of these federal employees."

DOJ_NMG_0098767

Screeners, the committee said, are not engaged in "making national policy that may affect security" and are not engaged "in the administration of the state." Under those criteria, the committee said, TSA's 45,000 screeners should have collective bargaining rights.

The United States is a member of the ILO, which seeks to set worldwide labor standards. But ILO committee opinions are not binding, and the TSA said that the opinion will not change the agency's stance toward union representation.

In a statement, the TSA said Congress left it to the agency to decide whether to grant bargaining rights. The leeway to ban unions is contained in the 2001 Aviation Transportation Security Act, which created the agency after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

"Given the critical national security mission of our security officers, collective bargaining is not appropriate, and would reduce TSA's ability to make changes rapidly in response to threats," the TSA statement said.

Proposals to allow TSA screeners to unionize have not gained traction in Congress, but AFGE officials hope that will change when Democrats take control of the House and Senate next year. Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), who lost a vote on an amendment that would have let screeners engage in bargaining, plans to push the issue, her spokeswoman said.

Efforts by the AFGE to overturn the TSA ban through litigation also have been rebuffed by the government and in U.S. courts.

A key ruling came in 2003, when a regional director for the Federal Labor Relations Authority, which hears labor-management disputes inside the government, found that screeners were not entitled to a vote on union representation and that "Congress intended to treat security screeners differently than other employees of the agency."

Since Congress created the TSA, the agency has been folded into the Department of Homeland Security, where thousands of Border Patrol agents, Customs and Border Protection officers and others are represented by unions. The White House and Congress proposed curbing union rights at Homeland Security, but U.S. courts blocked the effort. The issue of how to deal with unions is back before the department.

Mark Roth, general counsel at the AFGE, said some members of Congress might have looked at collective bargaining as an impediment to a speedy launch of the agency, but he noted that four years have passed and that the TSA suffers from high turnover in the screener workforce.

"The agency has been stood up and is part of DHS. To keep its employees as separate and with less rights than other DHS employees, I think we can make the case that is no longer rational," he said.Retirement

Eileen Hayes Hurley, a leading intelligence research specialist in federal law enforcement, will retire Thursday after more than 40 years of federal service. Her career has included work on terrorism, organized crime and drug trafficking at the Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Customs Service, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Naval Criminal Investigative Service and, currently, at the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, where she is a branch chief.

Intelligence Agencies Invest In College Education (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, November 28, 2006

Community seeks skilled recruits on campuses. Some uncomfortable with financial link to academia.

The U.S. intelligence community pours millions into higher education, paying for hundreds of scholarships, intelligence-related courses and fellowships at nearly a dozen universities, public documents and interviews with officials show.

Last month, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) more than doubled the number of schools in its program. The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) is also developing a program for nuclear scientists.

The sponsoring agencies, including the CIA, say the programs help ensure they get enough recruits skilled to wage the war on terrorism. The programs began in 2004.

Agencies also pay for internships and summer “spy camps” aimed at attracting high school students to study intelligence.

Since 2004, more than $16 million has been appropriated for courses and overseas fellowships in Middle Eastern and South Asian language studies, engineering, computer science, analytical thinking, Islamic studies and other specialties.

DOJ_NMG_0098768

The new programs differ from earlier government assistance plans such as the Title VI fellowships and the National Security Education Program. Those programs sponsor language study for students interested in careers in foreign affairs but are not tied to intelligence agencies.

The programs recognize that 21st-century intelligence officers need skills that can "translate to a variety of areas," says Lenora Peters Gant, who runs the ODNI's university outreach program. "We want to hire an engineer that understands world cultures and religions and speaks Urdu and Farsi or maybe Korean. That's where (intelligence) is going."

The programs also target more women and minorities, Gant says. Three of the 10 schools backed by the agency are historically black colleges. More than 90% of students at a fourth college are women.

"We need really good, young officers off of U.S. college and university campuses," says Charles Allen, a 47-year CIA veteran who is chief intelligence officer for the DHS. "We need young, bright aggressive Americans who really want to serve their country."

The programs have revived a decades-old debate about the proper relationship between intelligence agencies and academia. They have also invited comparisons to the 1950s, when the FBI sometimes encouraged students to report on professors' political leanings, and the 1960s, when the CIA paid for the National Student Association and tapped its members for intelligence work.

One program, the Pat Roberts Intelligence Scholars, keeps the identities of its participants secret.

"Secrecy, in particular, is a problem," says David Price, anthropology professor at St. Martin's University in Spokane, Wash., and author of a book on FBI surveillance of academics in the 1950s.

"I've looked at far too many old FBI documents to ever be comfortable with the idea" of such agencies funding students, Price says.

Academic and intelligence communities share a complicated history. During World War II, the Office of Strategic Services, the CIA's predecessor, recruited historians, anthropologists and other specialists, according to historian Robin Winks' book Cloak & Gown. In the 1950s and '60s, faculty members at Yale, Harvard, MIT and other elite universities served as talent spotters, steering promising students into intelligence careers.

Intelligence recruiters also liked small Catholic schools such as Trinity University in Washington, D.C., says Robert Maguire, an international relations professor who coordinates Trinity's intelligence studies program.

These days, demographics make Trinity a target for intelligence agency recruiters. More than 90% of Trinity's approximately 1,000 undergraduates are women. About 70% are minorities.

"The intelligence community of the 21st century has to look and think a lot more like the world around it," says T.J. Waters, a former CIA officer who teaches in the Eckerd College intelligence program in St. Petersburg, Fla. "These (programs) are a recognition of that."

The intelligence community's sometimes dark reputation made an undergraduate intelligence program a hard sell for faculty members, Maguire says. "The usual reaction to the word 'intelligence' was images of the CIA and nuns being murdered in Guatemala."

What sold the program at Trinity was its popularity with students, says Leah Martin, 21, student body president and intelligence student.

Trinity professors received stipends to revise courses and design new ones when ODNI started its first Center of Academic Excellence there in 2004. Intelligence students study creative problem solving, contemporary diplomatic history and social science research methods. The dozen or so who pursue an "intelligence certificate," essentially a minor in intelligence studies, are required to serve as summer "spy camp" counselors, chaperoning high school students who visit the CIA and attend lectures by intelligence professionals.

Janie Pacheco, 21, an economics major who is pursuing an intelligence studies certificate, took "Written and Oral Briefings for Professionals" to improve her writing skills. The course assigned a standard 20-page paper — hers was on the economic impact of Hurricane Katrina — but added this twist: Students had to boil their research down into a single paragraph that could be used in an oral briefing to policymakers.

"It was really about designing information, depending on how it's ultimately going to be used," says Pacheco of Mount Rainier, Md. "You can see the worth of this (to) intelligence, but really, this is a skill that transfers to almost any job."

DOJ_NMG_0098769

Intelligence work, Martin says, appears to combine travel, excitement and, in the post- 9/11 environment, something approaching job security. “You get to travel, to do something different every day, you're challenged in your work and you get to serve your country,” says Martin, 21. “How cool is that?”

Inside The CIA (WT)

By Gary Anderson

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

Among the agencies of the federal government, three are legendary: the Marine Corps, the FBI and the CIA. One of the things that put them into that category is the unique culture of each. If they have anything in common it is that their field officers all go through a similar basic training and education course.

Each course has its own unique objectives and methods, but all three have a rite of passage as well as the training they accomplish. The FBI Academy and the Marine Corps Basic School are both located just a few miles apart on the Quantico Marine Corps base.

As a former officer of Marines, I am fairly familiar with both schools and the cultures that they produce. However, until reading "Class 11," I was not aware of how closely the basic schooling of CIA officers is to that of the Marines and the FBI.

Class 11 was the first post-September 11 class at the CIA. Consequently, it was larger and much more diverse than its predecessors, reflecting an agency policy decision that it had to recruit from a broader base of skill sets to adjust to the post-September 11 era. T.J Waters is a graduate of that class and obtained CIA permission to tell the unclassified portions of his story. The result is an education regarding a little-known, but much imagined, world.

Mr. Waters' classmates were a truly diverse lot. They included stockbrokers, successful businessmen, lawyers and even a former pro football player; all were drawn by the opportunity to avenge the attacks on September 11, and perhaps more important, to help prevent a future tragic event.

In many ways, the CIA curriculum is very similar to that of the Marine Corps and FBI. All three teach different skills, but they all create a socialization process that absorbs the students into the organization's culture, ethos and heritage. All three combine lecture followed by practical application; they all stress physical fitness and they bond students together into a lifetime fraternity.

The difference is that a person can usually spot a Marine officer or FBI agent in a crowd, even in civilian clothes. The CIA trains its students to be studiously inconspicuous. Students are encouraged and forced to bond. Those who survive the agency's screening process and get into the program, but prove to be incompatible with the organization, are quietly weeded out. This is rare because CIA screening is rigorous, but it sometimes happens.

The agents do learn how to use disguises and gadgets, developed by the storied CIA "toy factory," but they also learn the mundane tasks of surveillance avoidance, recruiting foreign agents and how to write coherent and useful reports. Most of the CIA's training takes place in diverse locations, but the real crucible is at the legendary "Farm" in central Virginia for the final leg of the course.

The book also relates some of the humorous incidents in training, such as one where CIA and Defense Department intelligence agents get cross-wired when two covert training exercises, not coordinated between the two agencies, collide in Alexandria, Va. Washington-area readers will appreciate the fact that most of the book takes place in familiar surroundings. Local police also occasionally spot students acting suspiciously and detain them, which results in some amusing asides.

However, a grim note ensues when the 2002 Washington sniper crisis brings a forbidding note of realism into training. Harmless field exercises suddenly become dangerous and the students, and faculty have to grapple with the question of what they would do if they stumble upon the real sniper. Do they blow their agency cover or intercede? In this reviewer's opinion, they come up with the right answer.

This is Mr. Waters' first book. He has done a credible job. He still maintains a contractual relationship with the agency and also consults with the Defense Department. At times, we learn a little more about his personal life than we want to, but the purpose is to show the kind of sacrifice that CIA officers and their families have to make.

The author obviously loves and admires the organization. He gives it credit for trying to keep up with the times, but he is honest enough to question whether or not it is changing fast enough to keep up with our adaptive non-state opponents. This is a question pertinent to the entire federal government. Nonetheless, the reader comes away with a deeper understanding of one of our most misunderstood organizations.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Broadens Diplomatic Efforts On Iraq (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 28, 2006

President Bush intensified diplomatic efforts on Monday to quell rising violence in Iraq and Afghanistan, turning to allies as his national security adviser said the conflict in Iraq had entered "a new phase" requiring changes.

"Obviously everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One as Bush flew eastward.

The president was spending Monday night in this tiny Baltic nation ahead of a two-day NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, expected to deal with deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan, where NATO has 32,000 troops.

Both Estonia and Latvia are former Soviet republics that are strong allies in the war on terror.

Bush will head to Amman, Jordan, for talks Wednesday and Thursday with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and King Abdullah of Jordan.

From Air Force One, the president spoke to the leaders of France and Egypt.

Addressing the upcoming meetings with al-Maliki, Hadley said, "We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase."

Bush and al-Maliki "need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support" Iraq's leaders, Hadley said.

The adviser rejected suggestions that Iraq had already spiraled into a civil war and said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. "We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan," Hadley said.

Hadley also said he believed that al-Maliki — rather than Bush — seemed more likely to bring up the subject of dealing with Iran and Syria, saying the Iraqi leader had strong views on the subject.

The New York Times on Monday quoted a senior U.S. intelligence official who said the Iranian-backed Hezbollah had been providing training for the Mahdi Army, the Iraqi Shiite militia led by anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. The anonymous official told the Times that 1,000 to 2,000 Shiite fighters had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon.

U.S. officials have previously accused Iran of military interference in Iraq. Earlier this month, CIA Director Michael Hayden told a congressional panel, "The Iranian hand is stoking violence and supporting even competing Shiite factions" in Iraq. In March, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld accused Tehran of sending elements of its Revolutionary Guard to stir trouble inside Iraq.

Bush received a briefing Sunday night at the White House from Vice President Dick Cheney, who had gone to Saudi Arabia over the weekend as part of the administration's expanded efforts to draw Iraq's neighbors into the search for a solution.

In further signs of a worsening situation, a mortar attack ignited a huge fire Monday night at an oil facility in northern Iraq, shutting the flow of crude oil to a major refinery. And a U.S. Air Force jet crashed in Anbar province, a hotbed of the Sunni-Arab insurgency, officials said. Al-Jazeera reported that the pilot was killed.

Meanwhile, Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, and Poland and Italy announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops as well.

In the U.S., the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, was working on a set of strategies for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0098771

The bipartisan group, which will also meet Tuesday, appeared ready to endorse drawing Iran and Syria into the effort to end violence in Iraq and resuming Middle East peace talks, said a former U.S. official knowledgeable about some of the commission's recent deliberations.

The commission seemed unlikely to propose a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy surrounding the commission's work. But some members seemed to favor setting a date for only an initial withdrawal, an idea that has been pushed by many congressional Democrats.

United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan discussed the situation in Iraq Monday afternoon in a teleconference with members of the group, which was meeting in Washington.

The president is expected to urge NATO members to increase military spending at the summit in Riga. Violence has increased markedly in recent days, particularly in the southern part of Afghanistan, where the Taliban are resurgent.

Bush is trying to persuade many European allies to contribute more for the Afghanistan effort. He'll also promote his plan to invite several major non-NATO countries, including Japan, Australia and South Korea, into some joint missions with NATO.

Bush is the first sitting U.S. president to visit Estonia.

His brief stopover in this medieval capital was seen as a token of American gratitude for the Baltic ally's strong support in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

Unlike in most of Europe, there is hardly any public criticism here of Bush's administration or the Iraq war. A small protest by anarchists was planned in Tallinn on Tuesday but was not expected to cause any major disruption.

Bush will meet with Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip and U.S.-educated President Toomas Hendrik Ilves. Bush and Ilves planned a joint news conference.

The U.S. president also was expected to meet democracy activists and Estonian soldiers who have served on foreign missions.

Aides said Bush also spoke by phone from Air Force One to Chinese President Hu Jintao on relations between the two countries and their recent meeting on the sidelines of a summit in Vietnam of Asian-Pacific nations. Bush also phoned former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who was hospitalized for tests after he fainted during a rally.

White House Says Iraq In 'New Phase' (AP-Y)

President Bush intensified diplomatic efforts on Monday to quell rising violence in Iraq and Afghanistan, turning to allies as his national security adviser said the conflict in Iraq had entered "a new phase" requiring changes.

"Obviously everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One as Bush flew eastward.

The president was spending Monday night in this tiny Baltic nation ahead of a two-day NATO summit in Riga, Latvia, expected to deal with deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan, where NATO has 32,000 troops.

Both Estonia and Latvia are former Soviet republics that are strong allies in the war on terror.

Bush will head to Amman, Jordan, for talks Wednesday and Thursday with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and King Abdullah of Jordan.

From Air Force One, the president spoke to the leaders of France and Egypt.

Addressing the upcoming meetings with al-Maliki, Hadley said, "We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase."

Bush and al-Maliki "need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support" Iraq's leaders, Hadley said.

The adviser rejected suggestions that Iraq had already spiraled into a civil war and said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. "We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan," Hadley said.

DOJ_NMG_0098772

Hadley also said he believed that al-Maliki — rather than Bush — seemed more likely to bring up the subject of dealing with Iran and Syria, saying the Iraqi leader had strong views on the subject.

Bush received a briefing Sunday night at the White House from Vice President Dick Cheney, who had gone to Saudi Arabia over the weekend as part of the administration's expanded efforts to draw Iraq's neighbors into the search for a solution.

In further signs of a worsening situation, a mortar attack ignited a huge fire Monday night at an oil facility in northern Iraq, shutting the flow of crude oil to a major refinery. And a U.S. Air Force jet crashed in Anbar province, a hotbed of the Sunni-Arab insurgency, officials said. Al-Jazeera reported that the pilot was killed.

Meanwhile, Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, and Poland and Italy announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops as well.

In the U.S., the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, was working on a set of strategies for Iraq.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan discussed the situation in Iraq Monday afternoon in a teleconference with members of the group, which was meeting in Washington.

The president is expected to urge NATO members to increase military spending at the summit in Riga. Violence has increased markedly in recent days, particularly in the southern part of Afghanistan, where the Taliban are resurgent.

Bush is trying to persuade many European allies to contribute more for the Afghanistan effort. He'll also promote his plan to invite several major non-NATO countries, including Japan, Australia and South Korea, into some joint missions with NATO.

Bush is the first sitting U.S. president to visit Estonia.

His brief stopover in this medieval capital was seen as a token of American gratitude for the Baltic ally's strong support in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

Unlike in most of Europe, there is hardly any public criticism here of Bush's administration or the Iraq war. A small protest by anarchists was planned in Tallinn on Tuesday but was not expected to cause any major disruption.

Bush will meet with Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip and U.S.-educated President Toomas Hendrik Ilves. Bush and Ilves planned a joint news conference.

The U.S. president also was expected to meet democracy activists and Estonian soldiers who have served on foreign missions.

Aides said Bush also spoke by phone from Air Force One to Chinese President Hu Jintao on relations between the two countries and their recent meeting on the sidelines of a summit in Vietnam of Asian-Pacific nations. Bush also phoned former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who was hospitalized for tests after he fainted during a rally.

Civil War In Iraq Near, Annan Says (WP)

By Robin Wright And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

The Iraq Study Group began two days of intensive behind-closed-doors deliberations yesterday as the White House conceded that Iraq has moved into a dangerous new phase of warfare requiring changes in strategy. In a sign of the growing global concern about Iraq's fate, U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan appealed for immediate steps to prevent the country from crumbling into all-out civil war.

"Given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there. In fact, we are almost there," Annan said when a reporter asked about the prospects of civil war in Iraq.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters traveling to Estonia with President Bush: "Obviously, everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough." Washington must find ways to "adapt," he added.

Events over the past week, including the deadliest attacks since the war began in March 2003, have created a new sense of diplomatic urgency about finding a viable strategy to contain Iraq's violence and limit spillover damage across the region. The White House again resisted assertions that Iraq is now in a civil war, but that stance is increasingly hard to defend, according to analysts, diplomats and even some U.S. officials in private.

DOJ_NMG_0098773

"While the situation on the ground is very serious, neither Prime Minister [Nouri al-] Maliki nor we believe that Iraq is in a civil war. The Iraqi government is making slow but sure progress on important issues that will help stop the violence and bring the country together," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said yesterday.

At least one Iraqi leader says otherwise. "It's worse than a civil war. In a civil war, you at least know which factions are fighting each other," lamented a senior member of Iraq's government in an interview a few hours after Johndroe's comments. "We don't even know that anymore. It's so bloody confused."

Saudi Arabia is so concerned about the damage that the conflict in Iraq is doing across the region that it basically summoned Vice President Cheney for talks over the weekend, according to U.S. officials and foreign diplomats. The visit was originally portrayed as U.S. outreach to its oil-rich Arab ally.

In a reflection of the growing new dimension of civil strife, a senior U.S. intelligence official said yesterday that the militia of radical Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr has grown eightfold over the past year and now fields 40,000 to 60,000 men. That makes it more effective than the Iraqi government's army, the official indicated.

The Iraqi army has about 134,000 men, but about half are doing only stationary guard duty, the official said. Of the half that conduct operations, only about 10 battalions are effective -- well under 10,000 men.

Sadr is so powerful that if provincial elections were held now, he would sweep most of the south and also take Baghdad, said the intelligence officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his position.

Iraq's prime minister "doesn't have any coercive powers of his own," he said, calling Maliki "beholden to Sadr." Maliki won the prime minister's job with backing from Sadr, whose political bloc holds 30 seats in parliament.

Addressing the sectarian problem by engaging Iraq's neighbors, notably Iran and Syria, is an idea gaining favor within the 10-member, bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is in the final phase of its eight-month search for a new policy. But the panel was still deeply divided over recommendations going into its meeting yesterday.

The group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), hopes to issue its recommendations before Congress adjourns next month. Although deliberations are secret, the five Republicans and five Democrats are exploring ideas that include a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Some Democrats on the panel favor a plan by congressional Democrats to name a date to begin withdrawal, as a way to pressure Iraqis to show more leadership. Members of the board were divided, however, over how many troops and how fast to withdraw, sources close to the group said.

President Bush is due to meet with Maliki on Thursday in Jordan to review the situation. "We're clearly in a new phase, characterized by this increasing sectarian violence that requires us obviously to adapt to that new phase, and these two leaders need to be talking about how to do that," Hadley told reporters.

He said he expects the two leaders to discuss whether Washington should talk to Iran and Syria, although he thinks Maliki, not Bush, will raise the issue. Maliki has "strong views," he added, that any conversation with Syria and Iran "ought to be a conversation by Iraqis."

In a subtle nod to the Iraq Study Group, Hadley said that the president plans to listen to the range of voices for ideas but that Bush will reassure Maliki the president "will be crafting the way forward on Iraq" primarily in collaboration with Baghdad.

But in a sign of the discord in Washington, the senior U.S. intelligence official said the situation requires that the administration abandon its long-held goal of national reconciliation and instead "pick a winner" in Iraq. He said he understands that means the Sunnis are likely to bolt from the fragile government. "That's the price you're going to have to pay," he said.

The United States also needs to reexamine other basic assumptions, he said. To be effective, for example, the Iraqi security forces -- including army and police -- should be roughly doubled from the current goal of 325,000 to about 650,000, which would require about three years of recruiting and training, he said. The expanded military, he added, would probably become overwhelmingly Shiite and Kurdish -- an outcome that many Sunnis fear.

The United States also needs to deal quickly with a serious problem of overcrowded prisons that has led the government to free about 2,000 fighters each month to make room for new prisoners, he said. Those released are not scofflaws, he said: "These are the hard-core guys."

DOJ_NMG_0098774

The intelligence official said that he "never saw any evidence" that Sadr's organization sent personnel to Lebanon this summer to fight against Israel, but said he had heard talk that some were sent there to be trained by Lebanese members of Hezbollah, an organization funded by Iran's Shiite government.

He said there was evidence that the Iranian government this year had escalated its efforts inside Iraq.

"The whole year, yes, it has stepped up," he said. "More training in and out of Iraq. More coordination with Hezbollah. More advisers."

A War Of Words Over Iraq (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With sectarian violence raging in Iraq and President Bush grasping for options, the question of whether Iraqis are locked in a civil war has taken on new urgency.

The term is fraught with emotional overtones and policy implications, which is why it sparks lively arguments and strong pushback from the White House. Bush vehemently rejects the idea that Iraq is engaged in a civil war, while a growing chorus of scholars and strategists says that is exactly what the staggering civilian death toll and factional strife amount to.

The national news media are grappling with the issue as well, as evidenced by Monday's announcement from NBC News that, after much consideration, it had decided to use the phrase.

In a nod to how sensitive the topic has become, the network's Matt Lauer noted, "We didn't just wake up on a Monday morning and say, 'Let's call this a civil war.' This took careful deliberation."

Bush has said he would not allow U.S. troops to be caught "in the crossfire between rival factions." Conceding that a civil war has broken out in Iraq could undermine that promise and increase pressure for a quick withdrawal of American forces.

At the same time, labeling the conflict as a civil war could deepen public distaste for keeping U.S. troops in Iraq, replacing Bush's stated goals -- annihilating terrorism and planting the seeds of Middle Eastern democracy -- with a referee's role that would be harder to justify, analysts said.

The White House continued to resist the notion that Iraq had descended into civil war. Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, sidestepped a question on whether the label applies, saying that Iraqis do not believe there is a civil war.

"It is what it is. There is a high level of sectarian violence. It is a challenge for the Iraqis. It's a challenge for us," Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One en route with the president to a NATO conference in Europe.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, who also talked with reporters aboard Bush's plane, said what's happening in Iraq does not fit the definition of a civil war.

"What you do have is sectarian violence that seems to be less aimed at gaining full control over an area than expressing differences and also trying to destabilize a democracy, which is different than a civil war, where two sides are clashing for territory and supremacy," Snow said.

Still, most scholars agree that civil war is defined as a situation in which clearly defined groups from the same country battle each other for political influence. The conflict must claim significant casualties, many say at least 1,000 lives. Sunni and Shiite violence, including brutal revenge killings, has escalated steadily in Iraq this year, and Iraq's health minister estimated this month that up to 150,000 civilians had been killed in the war.

Some of the Bush administration's strongest allies now openly use the term civil war to describe what is going on in Iraq.

Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister of Iraq, said last spring that with 50 to 60 Iraqis dying each day, "If this is not civil war, then God knows what civil war is." Nouri al-Maliki, the current prime minister, has said there will "never be a civil war in Iraq."

Top administration and military officials, including Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, have said that Iraq could be on the brink of civil war, though Bush has never accepted that characterization. Instead, the president says it is up to U.S. forces to prevent Iraq from devolving into such a conflict.

King Abdullah II of Jordan, who is to meet with Bush Wednesday in Amman to discuss the war, warned over the weekend that given the conflict in Iraq, tensions in Lebanon and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, "We're juggling with the strong potential of three civil wars in the region." He told ABC that strong steps had to be taken to avert a "tremendous crisis."

DOJ_NMG_0098775

Anthony Cordesman, a national security analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said there is no question that the situation on the ground in Iraq constitutes civil war. Arguing over whether that's true is "a remarkably silly semantic debate" that yields no solutions for the steadily increasing violence, he added.

"If you accept civil war, it is seen as marking yet another step toward what is perceived as defeat politically," Cordesman said of the Bush administration. "You have people using the term because they're dramatizing the problems, and you have the White House making the argument because it wants to stay the course."

Bush's pledge not to get U.S. troops caught in a crossfire is moot, Cordesman said. "They are already in Baghdad, trying to separate ethnic factions that are shooting at them," he said.

Bush is going to "convoluted lengths" to avoid the term civil war because he wants to avoid appearing to take sides in a raging internal battle, Peter W. Galbraith wrote in the most recent edition of New Republic magazine.

"But saying it isn't civil war doesn't make it so," said Galbraith, a former U.S. diplomat and Bush critic who has proposed partitioning Iraq. "Training and equipping Iraq's security forces as the United States is doing only produces more lethal combatants in the country's internecine conflict."

The potency of the term civil war comes from the fact that "it's not what we signed up for," said David Rothkopf of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "We went in there to replace a despotic government with a democratic government. We said we were there to get rid of terrorists. Well, which side are the terrorists?

"Now we find ourselves being a referee in a civil war. Neither side is us. It means that the premise for our national involvement and policies has been challenged and compromised," Rothkopf said.

Describing the situation in Iraq as a civil war would further reduce support for the war among the American people, who, research shows, will not tolerate U.S. casualties from intervention in that kind of conflict, analysts said.

"As bad as public support for the war is, it's likely to get worse if they see this as a civil war. It's a battle that the administration has largely lost already," said Christopher F. Gelpi, a Duke University researcher on war and public opinion. "It will raise the question in their minds, 'Well then, if this is a civil war, should we withdraw?'"

The term civil war is often used by critics of U.S. involvement to stoke public opposition, Gelpi added.

The Democratic Party pounced on NBC's announcement, accusing Bush of trying to "spin" the Iraq war by "splitting hairs."

"If you're lying dead on the street in Baghdad, I don't imagine it makes much difference" what the conflict is called, Rothkopf said, adding that the debate is "taking us away from" looking at the key moral and strategic questions about how the United States should handle it.

NBC To Use 'Civil War' To Describe Iraq (LAT)

By Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

NEW YORK — NBC News said Monday that its reporters and anchors would begin referring to the ongoing sectarian strife in Iraq as a "civil war," a move that reflects the news media's use of increasingly stark language to characterize the escalating violence gripping the country.

NBC's decision, which came after a particularly deadly series of retaliatory attacks in Baghdad, makes it the first television network to officially adopt the term "civil war," a description the Bush administration has resisted.

The Times was the first major news organization to formally adopt the description when it began to refer to the hostilities as a civil war in October, without public fanfare. No other major media outlet has made the phrase a matter of policy, although it has cropped up in various news reports.

The White House has exerted pressure on the media not to use the term, journalists said, which led to newsroom caution over the issue. NBC's announcement spotlights a shift in semantics that has quietly taken place on the airwaves and in newsprint as the violence has worsened along with the public's view of the situation in Iraq.

"Today" co-anchor Matt Lauer explained NBC's position at the beginning of the morning show, saying news executives had concluded that the current fighting met the definition of a civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0098776

"For months now the White House has rejected claims that the situation in Iraq has deteriorated into civil war, and for the most part, news organizations like NBC have hesitated to characterize it as such," Lauer said. "But after careful consideration, NBC News has decided a change in terminology is warranted, that the situation in Iraq with armed militarized factions fighting for their own political agendas can now be characterized as civil war."

The White House continued to object to the description.

"What you do have is sectarian violence that seems to be less aimed at gaining full control over an area than expressing differences, and also trying to destabilize a democracy — which is different than a civil war, where two sides are clashing for territory and supremacy," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told reporters on Air Force One on Monday as President Bush flew to Tallinn, Estonia.

The Times began referring to the violence as a "civil war" in an Oct. 7 article after several months of internal discussions.

"For some time now we believe it has been a fairly simple call: Inside one country you have different armed groups fighting with each other," said Marjorie Miller, the newspaper's foreign editor. "That is the definition of a civil war."

The newspaper uses the term to characterize the violence in the center of Iraq and Baghdad, but editors noted that the fighting in other areas, such as the western province of Al Anbar, where Marines engage in regular combat with insurgents, was sometimes described differently. The newspaper has used "civil war" dozens of times, although Miller said it had not appeared as consistently as she would have liked.

"I had to keep up the conversation to make sure we called it what it is, a civil war," she said.

The New York Times has decided to let correspondents describe the conflict as a civil war when they and their editors believe it is appropriate, Executive Editor Bill Keller said.

"It's hard to argue that this war does not fit the generally accepted definition of civil war," Keller said in a statement, but he added that the term does not capture the complexity of the violence.

"We expect to use the phrase sparingly and carefully, not to the exclusion of other formulations, not for dramatic effect," he said.

CNN, which does not have an official policy regarding the term, has left the description of the violence in Iraq up to its correspondents, many of whom have used "civil war" in the last several months.

"Anyone who still remains in doubt about whether this is civil war or not is suffering from the luxury of distance," CNN reporter Michael Ware said on the air Monday as he reported from Baghdad.

John Daniszewski, international editor at the Associated Press, said editors there had not decided whether to adopt the term.

"From a dictionary and academic point of view, many experts already consider Iraq to be immersed in a civil war," he said in a statement. "However, there is a contrary school of thought that a civil war should be more narrowly defined as one cohesive force opposing another inside a country — whereas in Iraq the fighting and violence often seem multifaceted, chaotic and anarchic."

Political analysts said NBC's public embrace of the term further complicated the administration's efforts to maintain that the violence had not spun out of control.

"Words have power, and naming it a civil war does begin to shape people's perception of what's happening there," said Thomas Hollihan, a professor at USC's Annenberg School for Communication who studies political rhetoric.

The midterm election results, widely seen as a repudiation of the administration and its policy in Iraq, may have emboldened news organizations to adopt a characterization the White House has rejected, he added.

"The media has, by and large, been very fearful of being perceived of being liberally biased," Hollihan said. "Now that the election has occurred, there may be more license on the part of the media to say what the public has been feeling."

NBC's decision applies to newscasts, including the network's flagship evening program, anchored by Brian Williams, as well as those on cable channel MSNBC. Spokeswoman Allison Gollust said executives decided to adopt the term after extensive conversations with military experts, historians and correspondents in Iraq.

"There was unanimous agreement that this was not an inappropriate label," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0098777

Retired Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey, one of those consulted in NBC's discussions, told Lauer on Monday that he had considered the situation in Iraq a "low-grade conflict" civil war for the last 18 months.

"Now it's on the verge of spinning out of control," said McCaffrey, an NBC News analyst.

On Thursday, at least 215 people were killed by multiple bombings in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad, triggering a series of deadly retaliatory attacks throughout the weekend. In a rare public comment about the fighting, United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Monday that he believed Iraq was on the brink of civil war.

Although there is not a universally accepted definition of the term, many experts agree that such a war consists of fighting between organized groups pursuing a political agenda within the recognized borders of one country.

Administration officials have maintained that the current situation in Iraq does not meet that standard, contending that the fighting has been largely centered on Baghdad and that the various insurgent forces are not unified.

A Fox News spokeswoman said the cable network had no plans to change its terminology, while CBS News said its correspondents and producers chose how to describe the fighting in their reports.

Last week, ABC anchor Charles Gibson raised the issue on the air during a conversation with senior national security correspondent Jonathan Karl.

"Military officials say it could escalate into a full-scale civil war, but with 3,700 people dying in a month and 100,000 people leaving the country and the kind of sectarian violence we're seeing, aren't we in a full-scale civil war already?" Gibson asked during the Nov. 22 afternoon webcast of "World News."

"That is certainly a debate that you can hear in the halls here at the Pentagon," Karl said. "It's a question of definitions."

NBC: Iraq In 'civil War' (USAT)

USA Today, November 28, 2006

The politically charged use of the term "civil war" to describe the violence in Iraq came to a head Monday when NBC News said that the conflict fit its description of a civil war and that NBC would call it that.

The announcement by Today's Matt Lauer put the network at odds with the White House — which said Monday that although the conflict in Iraq is serious, it is not a civil war — and prompted renewed discussion among news outlets.

CBS, ABC, CNN and Fox News said that as sectarian violence has risen, their reporters have called the conflict a civil war, and will continue, though they plan no formal change in policy.

On CNN Monday, correspondent Michael Ware said, "If this isn't a civil war, I don't know what is."

Recent dispatches in outlets such as the Los Angeles Times and New York Times also have referred to a civil war. USA TODAY calls the conflict "the war in Iraq" and refers to "sectarian violence or "religious fighting."

Tom McPhail, a journalism professor at the University of Missouri/St. Louis, says NBC's move is "a defining and negative moment" in the war in Iraq, "like when Walter Cronkite said on air that the Vietnam War was lost."

Kofi Annan Says Iraq Close To Civil War (AP-Y)

By Ben Feller

AP, November 28, 2006

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan said Monday that Iraq is close to civil war, as the Bush administration stepped up diplomatic efforts to stabilize the wartorn country.

Annan talked to reporters in New York as members of the Iraq Study Group were to discuss recommendations for changes in U.S. war strategy. President Bush left for a NATO summit in Europe, but much attention was directed toward a meeting he'll have later in the week with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan.

Asked by reporters at the U.N. if Iraq is in a civil war now, Annan replied, "I think given the developments on the ground, unless something is done drastically and urgently to arrest the deteriorating situation, we could be there. In fact we are almost there."

Sectarian violence in Iraq is at its worst level in the roughly 3 1/2 years since a U.S.-led coalition invaded the country and toppled Saddam Hussein. Bush's summit this week comes in the wake of talks that Vice President Dick Cheney held over the weekend in the region and as members of the special study commission mull recommendations.

DOJ_NMG_0098778

The New York Times reported in Monday's editions that a draft report by the study panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III recommends aggressive regional diplomacy, including talks with Iran and Syria.

Anonymous officials who had seen the draft report told the Times it does not specify any timetables for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, although the commissioners are expected to debate the feasibility of such timetables.

The panel is expected to release its findings and recommendations in December.

Appearing Monday on ABC's "Good Morning America," former President Jimmy Carter said that "at this point everybody is waiting" for the report. "My guess is that President Bush will take their advice as much as he possibly can," he added.

Carter said he would agree with any call for direct U.S. talks with Iran and Syria over Iraq, adding: "This is one of the most counterproductive policies that I've ever known, ... not to talk to the people who disagree with you unless they agree in advance to everything you demand."

Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a potential presidential contender in 2008, said "it's not too late for the United States to extricate itself honorably from an impending disaster in Iraq."

"If the president fails to build a bipartisan foundation for an exit strategy, America will pay a high price for this blunder — one that we will have difficulty recovering from in the years ahead," Hagel wrote in Sunday's Washington Post.

As the U.S. involvement in Iraq surpassed the length of America's participation in World War II, lawmakers have dwindling confidence in the U.S.-supported Iraqi government.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a spokesman for coalition forces in Iraq, declined Monday to say whether Iraq had plunged into civil war.

"No. What we have right now... What I would tell you is, ... we have violence that are at unacceptable levels at the moment," he said in an interview from Baghdad with Associated Press Radio. "It had been on a downward trend for about four solid weeks."

"The vast majority of the citizens here want to live in a peaceful secure city. That's what their desire is," Caldwell said.

The Bush-Maliki summit on Wednesday and Thursday, coupled with Cheney's trip to Saudi Arabia on Saturday, is evidence of the administration's stepped-up effort to bring stability to the region.

The host of the meeting, Jordan's King Abdullah, said Sunday the problems in the Middle East go beyond the war in Iraq. He said much of the region soon could become engulfed in violence unless the central issues are addressed quickly.

The king said he was hopeful the leaders will find a way to reduce the level of violence. "We hope there will be something dramatic. The challenges, obviously, in front of both of them are immense," he said.

Iraq's leaders promised Sunday to track down those responsible for the recent attacks, and al-Maliki urged his national unity government of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to curb the violence by stopping their public disputes.

The Iraqi prime minister is under pressure from Shiite politicians loyal to the radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr who have threatened to boycott parliament and the Cabinet if al-Maliki meets with Bush.

"This is all political posturing. It's all red herring. It's an anti-threat. This is a very stable government," responded Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie. He said he had no doubt the prime minister would meet with Bush in Jordan.

Bush Asking Arab Friends For Iraq Help (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — As President Bush and his top diplomats try to halt the downward spiral in Iraq and Lebanon, they seem intent on their strategy of talking only to Arab friends, despite increasing calls inside and outside the administration for them to reach out to Iran and Syria as well.

Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are traveling to Jordan this week for talks that are to include Iraq's prime minister and a number of Sunni Arab leaders but exclude the Iranians and Syrians, despite the influence they wield in Iraq and Lebanon.

Meanwhile, one of Ms. Rice's most trusted aides, Philip D. Zelikow, announced Monday that he was resigning his post as State Department counselor. Mr. Zelikow, widely viewed as a voice of candor in the administration on the Iraq crisis, said in his resignation letter that he would return to teaching at the University of Virginia. He cited a "truly riveting obligation to college bursars" for his children's tuition.

An administration official said Mr. Zelikow had been frustrated with administration policy on the Middle East, including Iraq, and North Korea.

There have been signs of strain within the administration, particularly at the State Department, where career Foreign Service officials have argued for increased dialogue with Iran and Syria to try to stem the violence in Iraq and Lebanon. "We've got a mess on our hands," said a senior State Department official, who, like others discussing the subject, spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the subject publicly.

When Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice arrive in Amman on Wednesday, they will try to enlist help from Sunni Arab leaders to try to rein in the violence in Iraq by putting pressure on Sunni insurgents. That was part of Vice President Dick Cheney's message to King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia during a brief visit on Saturday, administration officials said, and Mr. Bush will repeat that entreaty with King Abdullah II of Jordan, as will Ms. Rice when she meets for talks with Persian Gulf foreign ministers at the Dead Sea on Thursday and Friday.

Specifically, the United States wants Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt to work to drive a wedge between the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and the anti-American Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army has been behind many of the Shiite reprisal attacks in Iraq, a senior administration official said. That would require getting the predominantly Sunni Arab nations to work to get moderate Sunni Iraqis to support Mr. Maliki, a Shiite. That would theoretically give Mr. Maliki the political strength necessary to take on Mr. Sadr's Shiite militias.

"There's been some discussion about whether you just try to deal first with the Sunni insurgency, but that would mean being seen to be taking just one side of the fight, which would not be acceptable," the administration official said, speaking on condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic practice.

But getting Sunni Arab nations to urge Iraqi Sunnis to back Mr. Maliki in the hopes of peeling him away from Mr. Sadr is a tall order under any circumstances, and it was made even taller last week after the killing of more than 200 people by bombings in a Shiite district of Baghdad, the deadliest single attack since the American invasion. The attacks led to violent reprisals; vengeful Shiite militiamen attacked Sunni mosques in Baghdad and Baquba.

"We're clearly in a new phase, characterized by this increasing sectarian violence," Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, told reporters aboard Air Force One on the way to Estonia for a NATO summit meeting before Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. Maliki. "That requires us, obviously, to adapt to that new phase, and these two leaders need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support them."

In return for helping on Iraq, the Sunni Arab countries have asked the Bush administration for a new push toward an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord. Mr. Bush has largely shied away from that longstanding demand, but things may be changing.

Ms. Rice may add two stops — Ramallah, in the West Bank, and Jerusalem — to her itinerary this week, administration officials said. While her schedule has not been made final, Ms. Rice is considering meeting with Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, and Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president.

Ms. Rice has argued in favor of stepping up work on the Israeli-Palestinian front, and several times this fall she has seemed to be on the verge of a major peace initiative, only to be overtaken by other crises.

A new cease-fire began Monday after Israeli and Palestinian leaders agreed to end five months of fighting in Gaza. The truce got off to a shaky start when Palestinian militants associated with Hamas and Islamic Jihad fired nine rockets into southern Israel, but American, Arab and European diplomats said this may be the most important chance in some time to end the fighting.

Mr. Olmert, in a speech on Monday, even suggested that the cease-fire could revive peace efforts. A visit by Ms. Rice to the region could further prod those efforts, American officials said.

"We have seldom seen the U.S. administration so focused on all of the constituent parts of putting the Middle East together as they are at this point," a European diplomat said. "They seem to suddenly have got that this isn't just about Iraq. It's about a number of parts of the Rubik's Cube that they have to put together again."

DOJ_NMG_0098780

Beyond Israel, another part of the puzzle is whether America will directly engage Iran and Syria, something the administration remains loath to do, despite indications that a bipartisan study group will recommend a regional diplomatic initiative to include both countries. The pressure to begin talks is rising, with former administration officials joining the call.

"The Syrians are saying, 'We can negatively affect the situation in Lebanon and hurt your friends, we can negatively affect Iraq, but that's all right, don't talk to us,' " said Theodore H. Kattouf, President Bush's former ambassador to Syria. "With diplomacy generally, if you're not prepared to achieve your aims through warfare, then you have to engage in some horse-trading. Unfortunately, there isn't much give-and-take between the U.S. and Syria right now."

Bush And Maliki Make Last-ditch Effort To Keep Control Of Iraq In Amman Talks (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington And Roula Khalaf In London

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

When US President George W. Bush and the Iraqi prime minister last met in the White House in late July, Mr Bush praised the courage of Nouri al-Maliki. The US president promised more troops to reinforce Baghdad and a continued US commitment to the Iraqi people who were demonstrating their attachment to democracy.

Since then, according to the United Nations, Iraqis are being killed at a rate of 100 a day, with 3,700 deaths in October alone. During this period, 400,000 Iraqis have fled the country, and 300 US troops have died.

Officials close to Moqtada al-Sadr are reported to have said the radical Shia cleric is threatening to pull out of the national unity government if Mr Maliki does not put a stop to attacks on the Shia. They have also warned him against meeting Mr Bush in Amman, Jordan, tomorrow and Thursday.

US politicians have repeatedly called for pressure on Mr Maliki to rein in Mr Sadr, whose militia, the Mahdi army, is believed to be involved in sectarian killings.

With his own party increasingly split over his Iraq policy following their rout by the Democrats in the mid-term elections for Congress, Mr Bush is also under extreme political pressure to start bringing troops home.

Senator Trent Lott, the incoming number two in the Republican Senate leadership, said at the weekend that Mr Bush had to be "very aggressive and specific" with Mr Maliki, suggesting that the prime minister was becoming "part of the problem".

Reflecting the views of many Americans who express exasperation with how Iraq has responded to "liberation", the senator said that if Iraqis did not respond to US help in training and reconstruction and setting guideposts for the future, "then we're going to be done with it".

The Amman summit is widely seen in Washington as a last-ditch effort by Mr Bush to demonstrate to his fragmented party and a sceptical US public that he has a grip on the situation. If not, the president will find himself with little room for manoeuvre before the new Congress convenes in early January and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by James Baker, former secretary of state, and former Democrat congressman Lee Hamilton, put forward their policy recommendations, possibly in mid-December.

Meanwhile, the US military is not ruling out sending more soldiers into Baghdad to join the 7,000 reinforcements that were not able to secure and hold the city in August.

An Iraqi government spokesman said the Amman summit would chart a "map" for future relations between the US and Iraq, particularly on the security front.

Ali al-Dabbagh told the FT that Mr Maliki wanted an accelerated programme for the training of Iraqi security forces. The Iraqi government, he said, was also looking for a separate agreement with the US to "organise" and "regulate" the coalition presence - but only after the extension of its UN mandate, which comes up for renewal next month.

*Jalal Talabani, Iraq's president, said yesterday security was "the most important issue" in negotiations with Iran as he began a state visit, Gareth Smyth reports from Tehran.

Mr Talabani's trip comes amid speculation in the US over opening dialogue with Iran and Syria on Iraq's future.

Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad promised Tehran would do "whatever we can to help establish security" in Iraq and that "a secure, developed and powerful Iraq benefits the Iraqi nation, Iran and the whole region".

But Iranian officials suggested Tehran was in no mood to offer comfort to Washington.

Iraq Diplomacy Heats Up With Meetings (AP)

Iraq's president turned to Iran on Monday for help to stem the bloodshed, and Iraqi officials said talks this week between President Bush and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will focus on giving Iraqis more control so U.S. forces can withdraw.

"We are in dire need of Iran's help in establishing security and stability in Iraq," Iran's state-run television quoted Iraqi President Jalal Talabani as saying after he met with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran.

The increased pace of diplomacy comes as a bipartisan U.S. panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton is expected to put forth recommendations soon to the White House on alterations to Iraq policy. Seeking help from Iran and Syria was believed to be among the Iraq Study Group's proposal following American elections and calls for a speedy U.S. withdrawal.

Looking ahead to the Bush-Maliki summit in Amman, Jordan, the Iraqi side viewed the talks as the most important between leaders of the two countries since the ouster of Saddam Hussein, according to the two top officials with intimate knowledge of planning for the Wednesday-Thursday meeting.

Iraqi officials believe the summit will deal with giving Iraqi forces more control over security. The Iraqis expect President Bush to agree to such an arrangement, and they say al-Maliki will then ask for the Americans to start discussing a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, according to one of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

But Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, said it was unlikely Bush would address with the Iraqi leader the issue of any U.S. troop withdrawals. "We're not at the point where the president is going to be in a position to lay out a comprehensive plan," Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One.

The second Iraqi official, who spoke anonymously for the same reason, said American officials had indicated in preparatory talks in Baghdad that Bush was open to increasing the pace of the security hand-over.

"The responsibilities of U.S. troops will decrease when security is transferred to Iraqis, and that will mean the Americans have more soldiers here than they need," the second official said.

Also on the Iraqi agenda, the officials said, would be al-Maliki's insistence that the United States pressure its Sunni Arab allies in the region to stop what Baghdad claims is support for the Iraqi insurgency.

Lastly, al-Maliki wants to get an outline of the U.S. view of the strategic relationship that would exist as the Americans draw down their presence in the country, the Iraqi officials said.

Hadley said the conflict in Iraq had entered "a new phase" requiring changes.

"Obviously everyone would agree things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough," he said. "We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase."

Bush and al-Maliki "need to be talking about how to do that and what steps Iraq needs to take and how we can support" Iraq's leaders, Hadley said, rejecting suggestions that Iraq had already spiraled into a civil war.

As the summit approached, Britain said on Monday it expected to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, and Poland and Italy announced the impending pullout of their remaining troops.

The Iraqi officials said they expected al-Maliki would brief Bush on the outcome of Talabani's meetings with Ahmadinejad.

Al-Maliki also was expected to explain his thoughts on how Syria, Iraq's western neighbor, could play a role in calming violence. Al-Maliki lived in exile in Syria during Saddam's rule.

Hadley said he believed that al-Maliki — rather than Bush — seemed more likely to bring up the subject of dealing with Iran and Syria, saying the Iraqi leader had strong views on the subject.

As Iraqi officials reached out to both Iran and the U.S., speculation rose that Mideast peace might also be on Bush's agenda. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday delivered one of his most conciliatory speeches yet, and Palestinian legislator Saeb Erekat said it was possible that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas would meet with Bush in Jordan, whose king faces new vulnerability because of violence in Gaza and floods of Iraqi refugees.

Jordan's King Abdullah said Sunday the problems in the Middle East go beyond the war in Iraq and that much of the region soon could become engulfed in violence unless the central issues are addressed quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0098782

"We could possibly imagine going into 2007 and having three civil wars on our hands," he said, citing conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the decades-long strife between the Palestinians and Israelis.

Key players in those conflicts are Syria and Iran, which has a major influence over fellow Shiites in Iraq, including the Shiite-led government.

The meeting between Talabani and Ahmadinejad, which was delayed for two days because of a security clampdown in Iraq, provided Tehran an opportunity to try to assert its role as the top regional power broker to counter Washington's influence on Baghdad.

During their talks, Ahmadinejad pledged Tehran's support in helping to improve security in Iraq.

"Definitely, the Iranian government and nation will stand next to its brother Iraq and will do every help it can to strengthen security in Iraq," state-television quoted him as saying.

"We believe a stable, developed and powerful Iraq is in the interest of the Iraqi nation, Iran and the whole region," Ahmadinejad said, according to the television report.

Iran had been trying to organize a summit joining Ahmadinejad, Talabani and Syrian President Bashar Assad, but Damascus decided against attending.

Talabani flew to Tehran on Monday after the government ended a three-day curfew on vehicle traffic and reopened the international airport. The curfew and closure were imposed after bombings Thursday killed 215 people in Sadr City, Baghdad's main Shiite Muslim enclave.

Iran's potential for heavy influence in Iraq is particularly troubling to the Bush administration. Many in Iraq's new Shiite-dominated power structure have deep ties to Iran, and many of the key players spent considerable time in exile in Iran during Saddam's rule. The two main Shiite militias in Iraq are believed to rely heavily on Iran for training, funding and weapons.

The United States has been estranged from the Shiite theocracy that has run Iran since the pro-U.S. shah was toppled nearly three decades ago, and the difficult relationship has only worsened as Washington accuses Iran of trying to develop nuclear weapons in disregard of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Thus, inviting Iran to become a formal player in an attempt to quell violence in Iraq would be an extraordinarily delicate diplomatic maneuver for the White House.

It faces the same problem with Syria, which the United States has basically shunned in recent years, especially since the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Syrian agents have been implicated in that crime and the U.S. has pointed to Damascus in the killing last week of another anti-Syrian Lebanese leader, Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel.

In Diplomatic Turn, Iraqi Reaches Out To Iran (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 27 -- In the latest sign of a budding diplomatic relationship, Iraq's President Jalal Talabani arrived in Iran on Monday to seek his neighbor's help in ending his country's sectarian conflict, as Britain said it expects to withdraw thousands of troops by the end of next year.

The diplomatic maneuvering came on a day when a U.S. Air Force fighter jet with one pilot aboard crashed north of Baghdad, officials announced. The U.S. military provided no details on how the plane crashed or what happened to its pilot.

Talabani's visit to Tehran was delayed by a three-day curfew imposed after a series of car bombs exploded in the Shiite Muslim stronghold of Sadr City on Thursday, setting off a wave of reprisal killings. There were reports of sporadic violence Monday as the curfew was lifted.

"We are in dire need of Iran's help in establishing security and stability in Iraq," state-run television quoted Talabani as saying after he met with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran.

Ahmadinejad pledged his support in helping Iraq stop the escalating violence. "Definitely, the Iranian government and nation will stand next to its brother Iraq," he said on state-run television. "We believe a stable, developed and powerful Iraq is in the interest of the Iraqi nation, Iran and the whole region."

DOJ_NMG_0098783

The United States has been leery of Iran's effort to position itself as a regional power broker. Relations between Iran and the United States deteriorated this year, as a defiant Ahmadinejad refused demands that he suspend his country's uranium enrichment program. The Bush administration has also accused Iran of fomenting the violence in Iraq by assisting Shiite militias, an allegation that officials in Tehran have denied.

In Washington, the Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton, is seriously considering recommending next month that President Bush begin discussions with Iran and Syria, another adversary in the Middle East, on how to stabilize the region.

Bush is scheduled to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan, on Wednesday and Thursday.

In London, British Defense Secretary Des Browne said that many British soldiers will leave Iraq over the next year, as control of two southern provinces is transferred to Iraqi forces. Britain, the United States' main coalition partner, has 7,000 troops in the country.

"Even when all the provinces are handed over, we will still be providing a force to mentor and back up the Iraqi army and police and to protect coalition supply routes," Browne said in a speech to the Royal Institute of International Affairs. "But I can tell you that by the end of next year, I expect numbers of British forces in Iraq to be significantly lower -- by a matter of thousands."

Also Monday, Polish President Lech Kaczynski said his country would pull out its remaining 900 soldiers by the end of 2007. And Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said the last of Italy's 60 or 70 soldiers will leave this week.

Bush is under intense pressure to withdraw U.S. troops after a 3 1/2 -year presence but has said he cannot do so until Iraqi forces are ready to secure their own country.

The violence that engulfed Iraq after last week's bombings illustrated how far the Iraqi government is from that goal. Security forces are widely seen as ineffective at best and in collusion with militias and death squads at worst.

Among Monday's discoveries were 39 bodies in Baghdad, apparently victims of death squads, the Associated Press reported.

The U.S. military announced that three soldiers were killed and two wounded in fighting in Baghdad on Sunday.

A U.S. Air Force F-16 fighter jet crashed about 20 miles northwest of Baghdad about 1:35 p.m. local time while it was engaged in combat operations, the Air Force reported.

The al-Jazeera satellite television network showed footage that it said depicted the wreckage and said it had video of a dead pilot.

East of Fallujah, Lt. Col. Ayman Falah, the deputy chief of police in the town of Haswa, said he had requested the help of U.S. forces to confront a group of terrorists. He said that the jet arrived, flying at a low altitude, and that the terrorists brought it down with missiles. Afterward, American forces sealed off the area and imposed a curfew, he said.

U.S. military officials would not comment on Falah's account.

In Canberra, a special inquiry cleared Australia's government on Monday of wrongdoing in an Iraqi oil-for-food scandal, but recommended that top officials of the monopoly wheat exporter face charges for paying more than $200 million to Saddam Hussein's government, the Associated Press reported.

Iran Promises To Help Iraq In Ending Violence There (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

TEHRAN, Nov. 27 — Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, pledged Monday in a meeting with the Iraqi president that Iran would do all it could to stop the growing violence in Iraq.

"The Iranian government and people will stand by their brothers in Iraq and will do anything to help bring peace into Iraq," Mr. Ahmadinejad said in a news conference with the Iraqi president, Jalal Talabani, state-run television reported. "A safe, developed and strong Iraq is better for Iran and also for the region," he said.

In an effort to increase its role as an influential power in the region, Iran also invited the Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, to join the talks. But Mr. Assad did not respond to the invitation, according to an official at Mr. Ahmadinejad's office who requested anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0098784

Analysts believe that Mr. Talabani is here to urge Iranian officials to hold direct talks with the United States to help stop the bloodshed in Iraq. Iran has close ties with Shiite leaders in Iraq, and it might be able to call on them to exert restraint. Many of them lived in Iran in exile when Saddam Hussein ruled Iraq.

A draft report by an American bipartisan commission studying new strategies for Iraq urges that the United States conduct direct talks with Iran and Syria, according to American officials who have seen all or part of the document.

In the press conference, Mr. Talabani, a Kurd who had close ties to Iran, said Iraq needed Iran's help to bring peace.

"We seriously need Iran's help to restore stability and security," he was quoted as saying.

Iran and Iraq fought a bloody war from 1980 to 1988. Mr. Talabani was Iraq's first president to travel to Iran when he came a year ago, and Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, visited Iran in September.

In Iraq on Monday, an American fighter jet crashed in Anbar Province about 20 miles northwest of Baghdad, the American military command reported. The Air Force F-16, which had one pilot on board, was supporting combat troops when it went down, the military said, offering no further details.

Mohammed al-Obeidi, a resident in the nearby town of Karma who witnessed the crash, told The Associated Press that the jet had been flying erratically before it plunged into a field and exploded. Al Jazeera television reported that two Iraqi militant groups, Mujahedeen Army and the Mujahedeen Shura Council, claimed that they had brought down the plane, according to [a news service].

Three American soldiers were killed in the capital and two were wounded during combat operations on Sunday, according to a military press statement.

American forces opened fire on civilians in the Husseiniya neighborhood in northeast Baghdad late Monday night, killing five and wounding eight, an Interior Ministry official said. An American military spokeswoman in Baghdad said she had no information on the shooting.

On Monday, the government lifted a curfew it had imposed on Baghdad after a series of car bombs on Thursday killed more than 200 people in the Shiite neighborhood of Sadr City.

The curfew gave way to scattered violence on Monday. According to the Interior Ministry official, three guards were kidnapped from the Municipal Building, the latest in a series of brazen daylight attacks against government buildings.

At least six people were killed and 20 wounded in attacks in the capital, including a mortar bombardment, two clashes between gunmen and Iraqi security forces, and another kidnapping, the official said.

The Iraqi police found at least 39 bodies scattered around Baghdad and another five dumped just east of the city, according to the official.

In Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, gunmen killed a store owner in the town of Muqdadiya, then hid a bomb in the store and detonated it when a group of civilians arrived to retrieve the owner's body, the ministry official said. Four of them were killed and 25 were wounded, according to the official. Twelve more people were killed in other incidents around Baquba, the provincial capital, the official said.

Hezbollah Said To Help Shiite Army In Iraq (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — A senior American intelligence official said Monday that the Iranian-backed group Hezbollah had been training members of the Mahdi Army, the Iraqi Shiite militia led by Moktada al-Sadr.

The official said that 1,000 to 2,000 fighters from the Mahdi Army and other Shiite militias had been trained by Hezbollah in Lebanon. A small number of Hezbollah operatives have also visited Iraq to help with training, the official said.

Iran has facilitated the link between Hezbollah and the Shiite militias in Iraq, the official said. Syrian officials have also cooperated, though there is debate about whether it has the blessing of the senior leaders in Syria.

The intelligence official spoke on condition of anonymity under rules set by his agency, and discussed Iran's role in response to questions from a reporter.

DOJ_NMG_0098785

The interview occurred at a time of intense debate over whether the United States should enlist Iran's help in stabilizing Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, directed by James A. Baker III, a former Republican secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic lawmaker, is expected to call for direct talks with Tehran.

The claim about Hezbollah's role in training Shiite militias could strengthen the hand of those in the Bush administration who oppose a major new diplomatic involvement with Iran.

The new American account is consistent with a claim made in Iraq this summer by a mid-level Mahdi commander, who said his militia had sent 300 fighters to Lebanon, ostensibly to fight alongside Hezbollah. "They are the best-trained fighters in the Mahdi Army," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The specific assertions about Iran's role went beyond those made publicly by senior American officials, though Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, did tell Congress this month that "the Iranian hand is stoking violence" in Iraq.

The American intelligence on Hezbollah was based on human sources, electronic means and interviews with detainees captured in Iraq.

American officials say the Iranians have also provided direct support to Shiite militias in Iraq, including explosives and trigger devices for roadside bombs, and training for several thousand fighters, mostly in Iran. The training is carried out by the Iranian Revolutionary Guards and the Ministry of Intelligence and Security, they say.

In Congressional testimony this month, General Hayden said he was initially skeptical of reports of Iran's role but changed his mind after reviewing intelligence reports.

"I'll admit personally," he said at one point in the hearing, "that I have come late to this conclusion, but I have all the zeal of a convert as to the ill effect that the Iranians are having on the situation in Iraq."

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, offered a similar assessment in his testimony.

Neither General Hayden nor General Maples described Hezbollah's role during the hearing.

In the interview on Monday, the senior intelligence official was asked for further details about the purported Iranian role.

"They have been a link to Lebanese Hezbollah and have helped facilitate Hezbollah training inside of Iraq, but more importantly Jaish al-Mahdi members going to Lebanon," the official said, describing Iran's role and using the Arabic name for the Mahdi Army.

The official said the Hezbollah training had been conducted with the knowledge of Mr. Sadr, the most influential Shiite cleric.

While Iran wants a stable Iraq, the official said, it sees an advantage in "managed instability in the near term" to bog down the American military and defeat the Bush administration's objectives in the region.

"There seems to have been a strategic decision taken sometime over late winter or early spring by Damascus, Tehran, along with their partners in Lebanese Hezbollah, to provide more support to Sadr to increase pressure on the U.S.," the American intelligence official said.

Some Middle East experts were skeptical about the assessment of Hezbollah's training role.

"That sound to me a little bit strained," said Flynt Leverett, a senior fellow at the New America Foundation and a Middle East expert formerly on the National Security Council staff. "I have a hard time thinking it is a really significant piece of what we are seeing play out on the ground with the various Shiite militia forces."

But other specialists found the assessment plausible. "I think it is plausible because Hezbollah is the best in the business, and it enhances their position with Iran, Syria and Iraq," said Judith Kipper, of the Council on Foreign Relations.

The Mahdi Army and other militia fighters traveled to Lebanon in groups of 15 and 20 and some were present during the fighting between Hezbollah and Israel this summer, though there was no indication they had taken part in the fighting, the American intelligence official said.

Asked what the militia members had learned, the official replied, "Weapons, bomb-making, intelligence, assassinations, the gambit of skill sets."

There is intelligence that indicates that Iran shipped machine tools to Lebanon that could be used to make "shaped charges," sophisticated explosive devices designed to penetrate armor, American officials have said. But it is not known how the equipment was in fact used.

The officials said that because the Iraqi militia members went through Syrian territory, at least some Syrian officials were complicit. There are also reports of meetings between Imad Mugniyah, a senior Hezbollah member; Ghassem Soleimani of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards; and Syrian representatives to discuss ways of stepping up the pressure on the United States in Iraq.

The mid-level Mahdi commander interviewed this summer said the group sent to Lebanon was called the Ali al-Hadi Brigade, named for one of two imams buried at the Askariya Mosque in Samarra. The bombing of that shrine in February unleashed the fury of Shiite militias and accelerated sectarian violence.

According to the Mahdi commander, the brigade was organized and dispatched by a senior Mahdi officer known as Abu Mujtaba. It went by bus to Syria in July, and was then led across the border into Lebanon, he said. He said the fighters were from Diwaniya and Basra, as well as from the Shiite neighborhoods of Shoala and Sadr City in Baghdad.

"They travel as normal people from Iraq to Syria," one of the militiamen said. "Once they get to Syria, fighters in Syria take them in."

Among American officials, concern over the purported Iranian, Syrian or Hezbollah role grew recently when an advanced antitank weapon, an RPG-29, was used against an American M-1 tank in Iraq.

"The first time we saw it was not in Iraq," Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, told reporters in September. "We saw it in Lebanon. So to me, No. 1, it indicates an Iranian connection."

American intelligence officials said the source of the weapon was still unclear.

General Abizaid also said it was hard to pin down some details of relationships between armed factions in the Middle East, adding: "There are clearly links between Hezbollah training people in Iran to operate in Lebanon and also training people in Iran that are Shia splinter groups that could operate against us in Iraq These linkages exist, but it is very, very hard to pin down with precision."

Rising Violence Swells Ranks Of Iraq's Militias (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Retaliatory attacks sparked by last week's massive bomb assault on a Shiite neighborhood here are driving more Iraqis into the ranks of sectarian militias amid rising distrust of government security forces, newly recruited gunmen and residents said Monday.

Besieged Iraqis, many with no previous affiliation with established militias, are taking up arms, barricading their communities and joining new Shiite Muslim militia cells or increasingly militant Sunni Arab neighborhood-watch groups.

"We have zero trust in the Iraqi army and minus-zero trust in the police," said Ahmed Suheil Juburi, 33, a Sunni Arab who has thrown in his lot with a group of former military officers in Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime patrolling the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora.

Thousands of unsanctioned fighters have been on high alert since the car bombings Thursday in Sadr City, a poor Baghdad neighborhood that is home to the Al Mahdi militia, a Shiite force loyal to anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Since the attack, which killed at least 215 people, Sadr's fighters have struck back at Sunni neighborhoods with mortar shells, rockets and machine-gun raids from fast-moving SUVs. Sunni Arab fighters have retaliated in kind.

The bombings and subsequent attacks have killed 524 people, including 181 whose bodies were left in Baghdad's streets, and injured 653 since Thursday, according to government tallies obtained by The Times.

The mounting carnage is another sign that Iraq's civil war is gaining momentum faster than either the U.S. or Iraqi governments can respond.

In Baghdad, mortar shells have continued to pummel neighborhoods, and bands of men drive people out of their homes at gunpoint. Authorities find corpses in trash heaps and side streets on a daily basis; at least 44 were found Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0098787

Residents are blocking roads with blasted cars and tree trunks. Guns and ammunition are being passed out in mosques and homes. Throughout Baghdad, men end their workdays by taking up positions on rooftops and minarets.

Fighters on both sides of Iraq's sectarian conflict say that the recent growth of militias stems from deep distrust of the intent and capability of the nation's security forces, whose reputation has been crippled by corruption and sectarian infiltration.

Sunnis have long complained that Shiite militias dominate the police force, and that members have committed thousands of death-squad slayings. Shiites say that the Iraqi army, with its many Sunni Arabs, has failed to guard their communities from attacks such as the series of car bombs Thursday.

Salam Saedi, 29, a cleaner at a downtown Baghdad hotel, said he signed up with Sadr's militia the day after the Sadr City bombings.

"I was not a part of the public committees or the Mahdi army, but after the attacks I saw the people who were killed and my feelings changed," Saedi said. "So I contacted some friends and I went and I signed up with the Mahdi army. They gave me an AK-47."

In the wake of the Sadr City bombings, members say, the Al Mahdi army has boosted the ranks of its "popular committees," a recently formed armed wing.

Each block of 1,500 homes in the neighborhood is guarded by 50 to 100 men, members said.

Across town in Dora, a mostly Sunni area, Juburi said he kept "several AK-47s, a BKC [high-caliber machine gun] and even a grenade launcher in my orchard."

He said his neighbors reactivated a group of retired Baathist officers that formed in February during similar sectarian reprisals that followed the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra. The bombing and its bloody aftermath are widely viewed as the turning point that pushed Iraq into civil war.

"Right now, there are anywhere between 400 and 500 organized fighters in my area doing patrols and setting up checkpoints for defensive measures in the event that we are attacked by militias," he said.

Juburi said the total force in Dora comprised 2,000 to 2,500 men organized in companies of 50 fighters each.

The continued growth and proliferation of paramilitary forces in Iraq threatens to hamper U.S. plans for withdrawal.

Complicating any solution are the ties between many of Iraq's paramilitary forces and leading political parties.

The Sadr movement, for example, has 30 seats in government — possibly enough to topple Prime Minister Nouri Maliki should they withdraw in protest.

Adnan Dulaimi, a prominent Sunni Arab legislator, also has a paramilitary squad deployed throughout west Baghdad, where members clashed with Shiites over the weekend.

This month, CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told a U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee that his field agents believed Iraq's sectarian forces were "descending into smaller and smaller groups fighting over smaller and smaller issues and over smaller and smaller pieces of territory."

Firas Kabi, 27, whose wholesale goods shop stands near Sadr City, thought of himself as a lone wolf until Thursday's attack. Now he mans an Al Mahdi army checkpoint.

"My feelings have changed. Before I was living my life and I didn't care to be part of any group," he said. "But now I feel I am part of this community that was being attacked and oppressed. I wanted to be a martyr with the people who lost their lives and went to heaven."

Although many fighters interviewed Monday emphasized the defensive purposes of paramilitary groups, some acknowledged taking part in retaliatory attacks against other sects. Some Sunni groups suggested that they were in contact with more militant organizations — a worrisome development for the U.S. military, which faces a stubborn insurgency.

Juburi, the Sunni fighter, said that since the Sadr City attack a band of Al Mahdi army fighters had kicked several Sunni Arabs out of their homes. The refugees sought help from Juburi's community security force, which kicked Shiites out and gave the refugees their homes, he said.

Omar Mohammed Hussein Dulaimi, 29, said that his Sunni Arab district in west Baghdad formed a neighborhood watch three months ago and fought with Al Mahdi militiamen Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0098788

"We close the roads with tree trunks and stay on our roofs with guns," Dulaimi said. "We contact each other with cellphones to check the situation."

Dulaimi said that the security force in his 100-man cell, including former Baathist military and intelligence officials, guarded 500 homes.

"The mujahedin are helping us," Dulaimi said, referring to Sunni Arab insurgents. "Today two cars with gunmen came from Abu Ghraib to help us defend our mosques and our area from militia attacks. They even brought white sheets to cover their bodies in case they are martyred. They also brought heavy machine guns."

Another member of the Sunni force, Ziad Raad Ani, 32, described how Shiite gunmen and police attempted to attack their neighborhood Friday.

"They came in government-issued SUVs and pickup trucks and starting shooting with all kinds of weapons," Ani said.

Ani said the two sides fought for two hours that day. Witnesses said Iraqi soldiers and policemen watched but did not interfere.

Anbar Picture Grows Clearer, And Bleaker (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

The U.S. military is no longer able to defeat a bloody insurgency in western Iraq or counter al-Qaeda's rising popularity there, according to newly disclosed details from a classified Marine Corps intelligence report that set off debate in recent months about the military's mission in Anbar province.

The Marines recently filed an updated version of that assessment that stood by its conclusions and stated that, as of mid-November, the problems in troubled Anbar province have not improved, a senior U.S. intelligence official said yesterday. "The fundamental questions of lack of control, growth of the insurgency and criminality" remain the same, the official said.

The Marines' August memo, a copy of which was shared with The Washington Post, is far bleaker than some officials suggested when they described it in late summer. The report describes Iraq's Sunni minority as "embroiled in a daily fight for survival," fearful of "pogroms" by the Shiite majority and increasingly dependent on al-Qaeda in Iraq as its only hope against growing Iranian dominance across the capital.

True or not, the memo says, "from the Sunni perspective, their greatest fears have been realized: Iran controls Baghdad and Anbaris have been marginalized." Moreover, most Sunnis now believe it would be unwise to count on or help U.S. forces because they are seen as likely to leave the country before imposing stability.

Between al-Qaeda's violence, Iran's influence and an expected U.S. drawdown, "the social and political situation has deteriorated to a point" that U.S. and Iraqi troops "are no longer capable of militarily defeating the insurgency in al-Anbar," the assessment found. In Anbar province alone, at least 90 U.S. troops have died since Sept. 1.

The Post first reported on the memo's existence in September, as it was being circulated among military and national security officials. Several officials who read the report described its conclusions as grim.

But the contents have not previously been made public. Read as a complete assessment, it paints a stark portrait of a failed province and of the country's Sunnis -- once dominant under Saddam Hussein -- now desperate, fearful and impoverished. They have been increasingly abandoned by religious and political leaders who have fled to neighboring countries, and other leaders have been assassinated. And unlike Iraq's Shiite majority, or Kurdish groups in the north, the Sunnis are without oil and other natural resources. The report notes that illicit oil trading is providing millions of dollars to al-Qaeda while "official profits appear to feed Shiite cronyism in Baghdad."

As a result, "the potential for economic revival appears to be nonexistent" in Anbar, the report says. The Iraqi government, dominated by Iranian-backed Shiites, has not paid salaries for Anbar officials and Iraqi forces stationed there. Anbar's resources and its ability to impose order are depicted as limited at best.

"Despite the success of the December elections, nearly all government institutions from the village to provincial levels have disintegrated or have been thoroughly corrupted and infiltrated by Al Qaeda in Iraq," or a smattering of other insurgent groups, the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0098789

The five-page report -- written by Col. Peter Devlin, a senior and seasoned military intelligence officer with the Marine Expeditionary Force -- is marked secret, for dissemination to U.S. and allied troops in Iraq only. It does not appear to have been made available to Iraqi national forces fighting alongside Americans.

The report, "State of the Insurgency in Al-Anbar," focuses on conditions in the province that is home to 1.25 million Iraqis, most of whom live in violence-ridden towns such as Fallujah, Haditha, Hit, Qaim and Ramadi.

Devlin wrote that attacks on civilians rose 57 percent between February and August of this year. "Although it is likely that attack levels have peaked, the steady rise in attacks from mid-2003 to 2006 indicates a clear failure to defeat the insurgency in al-Anbar."

Devlin suggested that without the deployment of an additional U.S. military division -- 15,000 to 20,000 troops -- plus billions of dollars in aid to the province, "there is nothing" U.S. troops "can do to influence" the insurgency.

He described al-Qaeda in Iraq as the "dominate organization of influence in al-Anbar," surpassing all other groups, the Iraqi government and U.S. troops "in its ability to control the day-to-day life of the average Sunni."

Al-Qaeda itself, now an "integral part of the social fabric of western Iraq," has become so entrenched, autonomous and financially independent that U.S. forces no longer have the option "for a decapitating strike that would cripple the organization," the report says. That is why, it says, the death of al-Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June "had so little impact on the structure and capabilities of al-Qaeda," especially in Anbar province.

The senior intelligence official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of his work, said yesterday that he largely agrees with Devlin's assessment, except that he thinks it overstates the role of al-Qaeda in the province. "We argue that it is a major element in Anbar, but it is not the largest or most dominant group," he said.

In a final section of the report, titled "Way Ahead," Devlin outlined several possibilities for bringing stability to the area, including establishing a Sunni state in Anbar, creating a local paramilitary force to protect Sunnis and to offset Iranian influence, shifting local budget controls, and strengthening a committed Iraqi police force that has "proven remarkably resilient in most areas."

Devlin ended the assessment by saying that while violence has surged, the presence of U.S. troops in Anbar has had "a real suppressive effect on the insurgency." He said the suffering of "Anbar's citizens undoubtedly would be far worse now if it was not for the very effective efforts" of U.S. forces.

The Marine Corps headquarters had no comment on the August report or the updated assessment, Lt. Col. Scott J. Fazekas, a spokesman, said yesterday.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Iraq Panel Inks Draft Report (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

The Iraq Study Group met yesterday at an undisclosed location to discuss its first draft report that calls for increased diplomatic engagement in the region and new military moves to rescue Iraq from a descent into civil war.

The panel's co-chairmen, James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat, finished work on the draft during the weekend. It contains an assessment of where violence-racked Iraq stands more than three years after the U.S. ousted Saddam Hussein.

It also includes a list of recommendations on diplomatic and military fronts. A final report to President Bush is expected next month.

Mr. Baker is said to be pushing a recommendation for the Bush administration to engage in direct talks with Syria and Iran, two U.S.-designated state sponsors of terrorism who are supporting various insurgencies and terrorist attacks in Iraq.

David Satterfield, the State Department's top adviser on Iraq, told Congress earlier this month that the administration is willing to talk with Tehran but not Damascus. Mr. Satterfield listed several of Syria's pro-terrorism policies, such as backing Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Mr. Hamilton told The Washington Times last week that the first draft is a working document that can be changed by the 10-member panel created by Congress.

Defense sources said it will be difficult for the group of five Democrats and five Republicans, all former officeholders, to reach a unanimous report if it recommends a significant shift away from Mr. Bush's policy of no specific timetable for removing U.S. troops, which now number close to 150,000.

The Pentagon is conducting its own extensive review, from which Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, will make recommendations to the president. Pentagon officials say they want Mr. Bush to have options that include input from generals.

Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the region, has told Congress that he does not want a troop increase or a withdrawal timetable. He said a troop increase would send the wrong signal that the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) have more time to prepare to take over counterinsurgency missions.

Pentagon officials say it is doubtful Gen. Pace would overrule Gen. Abizaid.

U.S. soldiers in Iraq are caught between killing sprees of Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims, especially in greater Baghdad, where ramped-up security operations during the past two months did not meet their objectives, the command acknowledged.

Anthony Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, issued a paper yesterday on Sunni extremists' desire for a civil war and for a much larger religious struggle in the region.

"The attackers have several advantages," Mr. Cordesman said. "They are hitting at very soft civilian targets; they only need very limited numbers of attackers and can use car bombs or suicide bombs that are very hard to detect and defend against."

He warned against talk of a quick U.S. pullout.

"It is also clear that threatening to leave is not going to help," he said. "Iraqis need to see positive measures towards security, conciliation and economic aid."

How Iraq Panel Went From Obscure To High Profile (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

Rep. Frank Wolf (R) of Virginia has traveled to the most difficult war and civil war zones on the planet - from Chechnya and Bosnia to Sudan and Algeria. He had visited Iraq twice before, both times without a military escort. On his third visit, in September 2005, he had an epiphany.

He was about to tour a maternity ward in Tikrit when armed security guards were called in. Noting the mothers' and nurses' reaction, he recalls, "I said: 'We've got to get out of here. We can't walk through a maternity ward with guns like this scaring people." He concluded then that the US needed "fresh eyes" on its Iraq involvement.

From that small beginning has sprung one of the most-anticipated blue-ribbon commissions in recent years - the Iraq Study Group, which began deliberating over final conclusions this week.

How an obscure panel became a policy touchstone for Republicans and Democrats is a story in itself. More important, it illustrates those rare moments when a crisis reaches such a point that official Washington temporarily loosens hold of the reins. It's in those moments that experienced outside voices - think the 9/11 and Warren commissions - can make themselves heard. The Iraq panel, in particular, may prove particularly influential because of the escalating chaos in Iraq.

"We're losing," says Michael O'Hanlon, a policy analyst at the Brookings Institution. "One of the few hopes we have left is someone who is close enough to [President] Bush that he will be listened to by Bush - and smart enough and independent enough to see this in a different way."

Unlike the 9/11 commission, the Iraq Study Group has conducted its review of US engagement in Iraq in strict secrecy. Panelists were not publicly vetted. There were no open hearings or regular updates on whether the administration was being cooperative in releasing needed documents.

"If they had held open hearings or gone on television talk shows, like the 9/11 commission, they would have been forced into positions by the very nature of the questions that they would have lost their independence," says Congressman Wolf, who is the co-chairman of the human rights caucus in Congress.

While he would have liked to see Congress take up the serious work of oversight and recalibrating strategy on the Iraq war, he opted instead for a panel of "wise persons," because the Congress was too divided along partisan lines to play that role effectively. Like the 9/11 commission, the panel is to report to the American people, not just to the president or the Congress, he says. "This will be the defining issue of our time: How do we deal with the issue of terrorism? - and it has to be done in a bipartisan way," he says.

The Iraq Study Group is the flip side of the usual blue-ribbon panel, whose launch is often its high point. It began modestly as a one-line earmark in last spring's emergency defense spending bill - "$1 million ... for activities relating to Iraq."

It was born from the deteriorating security situation in Baghdad in 2005, which Wolf says was a sharp contrast to his second visit in 2003, with Rep. Christopher Shays (R) of Connecticut. While even then they traveled anonymously in old, beat-up vehicles for security reasons, they could visit villages, homes, hospitals, and schools relatively freely. In Al Kut, they were welcomed to join a wedding celebration and told how people loved America.

After his 2005 trip, Wolf urged Mr. Bush to select a group of "capable and distinguished individuals" to go to the region to "comprehensively review our efforts" in Iraq. He also began rounds of quiet consultations on the idea from Congress to the State Department, the Pentagon, and private think tanks.

"Frank Wolf is a very creative member of Congress," says David Abshire, a longtime diplomat who is advising the Iraq Study Group.

The reason the group caught on so quickly in official Washington is because, "they're all groping," says Mr. Abshire. "Ultimately, they all recognize the seriousness of the situation and want to do the right thing for the country."

Cochaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton, the 10-member group includes retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, former Attorney General Edwin Meese, former Clinton aide Leon Panetta, lobbyist Vernon Jordan, former Defense Secretary William Perry and former Sens. Charles Robb and Alan Simpson. Former CIA Director Robert Gates left the group after Bush nominated him to be secretary of Defense.

Launched last spring, the ISG took on a much higher profile this fall, as elections neared and the situation on the ground got worse in Iraq.

"No one paid attention to this until the fall when it became clear that the Republican majority was going to fall and Iraq was the issue over which Republicans would lose," says Ivo Daalder, a senior fellow at Brookings in Washington, D.C.

Wolf says he welcomes the high profile his simple idea has assumed. "I get amused when I think how we struggled to get it done, and now even Senator Kerry is supporting it," he says. "I think the attention will make the report even better."

Iraq Panel's Real Agenda: Damage Control (CSM)

By Andrew J. Bacevich

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

BOSTON

Even as Washington waits with bated breath for the Iraq Study Group (ISG) to release its findings, the rest of us should see this gambit for what it is: an attempt to deflect attention from the larger questions raised by America's failure in Iraq and to shore up the authority of the foreign policy establishment that steered the United States into this quagmire. This ostentatiously bipartisan panel of Wise Men (and one woman) can't really be searching for truth. It is engaged in damage control.

Their purpose is twofold: first, to minimize Iraq's impact on the prevailing foreign policy consensus with its vast ambitions and penchant for armed intervention abroad; and second, to quell any inclination of ordinary citizens to intrude into matters from which they have long been excluded. The ISG is antidemocratic. Its implicit message to Americans is this: We'll handle things - now go back to holiday shopping.

The group's composition gives the game away. Chaired by James Baker, the famed political operative and former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, former congressman and fixture on various blue-ribbon commissions, it contains no one who could be even remotely described as entertaining unorthodox opinions or maverick tendencies.

Instead, it consists of Beltway luminaries such as retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and lobbyist Vernon Jordan. No member is now an elected official. Neither do its ranks include any Iraq war veterans, family members of soldiers killed in Iraq, or anyone identified with the antiwar movement. None possesses specialized knowledge of Islam or the Middle East.

Charging this crowd with assessing the Iraq war is like convening a committee of Roman Catholic bishops to investigate the church's clergy sex-abuse scandal. Even without explicit instructions, the group's members know which questions not to ask and which remedies not to advance. Sadly, the average Catholic's traditional deference to the church hierarchy finds its counterpart in the average American's deference to "experts" when it comes to foreign policy. The ISG exemplifies the result: a befuddled, but essentially passive-electorate looks for guidance to a small group of unelected insiders reflecting a narrow range of views and operating largely behind closed doors.

The guardians of the foreign policy status quo are counting on the panel to extricate the US from Iraq. More broadly, they are counting on it to avoid inquiring into the origins of our predicament. So don't think for a moment that the ISG will assess the implications of America's growing addiction to foreign oil. Don't expect it to question the wisdom of President Bush's doctrine of preventive war or the feasibility of his Freedom Agenda, which promises to implant democracy across the Islamic world.

Far be it from the group to ask whether an open-ended "global war on terror" makes sense as a response to 9/11 or to ponder the flagrant manipulation and misuse of intelligence in the months leading up to the Iraq war. The ISG won't assess the egregious flaws in US military planning for the Iraq invasion or the manifest deficiencies in American generalship since the war began. On the role that Congress has played in enabling presidential fecklessness, you can be certain that Baker and Hamilton will remain silent.

The ISG will provide cover for the Bush administration to shift course in Iraq. It will pave the way for the Democratic Congress to endorse that shift in a great show of bipartisanship. But it will hold no one responsible.

Above all, it will leave intact the assumptions, arrangements, and institutions that gave rise to Iraq in the first place. In doing so, it will ensure that the formulation of foreign policy remains the preserve of political mahatmas like Baker and Hamilton, with the American people left to pick up the tab.

In this way, the ISG will make possible - even likely - a repetition of some disaster akin to Iraq at a future date.

Britain May Start Pulling Out Of Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Quinn

AP, November 28, 2006

LONDON (AP) - Britain said Monday it expects to withdraw thousands of its 7,000 military personnel from Iraq by the end of next year, while Poland and Italy announced the impending withdrawal of their remaining troops.

Polish President Lech Kaczynski said his country, a U.S. ally in Iraq and Afghanistan, would pull its remaining 900 soldiers out of Iraq by the end of 2007. And Italian Premier Romano Prodi said the last of Italy's soldiers in Iraq - some 60-70 troops - will return home this week, ending the Italian contingent's presence in the south of the country after more than three years.

British Defense Secretary Des Browne was the second senior official in recent days to talk of reducing the number of British troops in Iraq. In a speech to the Royal Institute of International Affairs, Browne also warned Iran that it faces increasing isolation if it does not use its influence in Iraq constructively.

Last week, Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said Britain may be able to hand over security responsibility in the southern port city of Basra by the spring of 2007. Britain also hopes to hand security control over to the Iraqis in the province of Maysan on the Iranian border in January.

Full Image"We have said that we and the Iraqis hope they will be ready to take over Maysan in January," Browne said. "We have said - and the foreign secretary reiterated last week - that we hope they will be ready to take over Basra in the spring.

"If both of these go to plan, we will be able to start drawing down our forces."

Browne said that handing over security would not mean a complete British withdrawal.

"I do not believe it is right to give precise numbers, nor to assume what the next 12 months will hold.

DOJ_NMG_0098793

"But I can tell you that by the end of next year I expect numbers of British forces in Iraq to be significantly lower - by a matter of thousands. The planning for this has been going on for some months."

(AP) Britain's Prime Minister Tony Blair gives his speech at the Guildhall at the Lord Mayor's Banquet,...

Full ImageAny troop pullback, he said, would be "driven not by arbitrary deadlines but by reality on the ground."

"We will stay as long as we are making a positive difference, and as long as the Iraqi government need our support," Browne said.

Sectarian divisions in Iraq will not be resolved quickly, Browne said, but he argued against dividing the country into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish sections, warning that doing so would destabilize the region further.

The defense secretary also called on Iraq's neighbors to support efforts to calm the violence.

"Even Syria, whose motives the international community has often had cause to question, has shown signs of constructive engagement," Browne said.

Syria's foreign minister has indicated his country is willing to help stabilize Iraq, and on a visit to Baghdad last week he announced the full restoration of diplomatic relations.

Iran's behavior, Browne said, remained troubling. The U.S., Britain and others have accused Iran of providing support to Shiite militias blamed for much of the sectarian killing in Iraq. Iran has denied the claims.

Iran "has influence inside Iraq, the power to turn up or turn down the heat, to turn on or turn off the dialogue. It is not using that influence well," Browne said.

"Iran's interest is in a stable and non-aggressive Iraq," he added.

"So the message to Iran is simple. Be a constructive partner, help yourself as well as the wider region - or face increasing isolation."

A New House Democrat With An Insiders' View Of Iraq (NYT)

By James Risen

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 27 — The sudden rise of Chris Carney, a pre-Iraq war Pentagon intelligence analyst turned newly elected Democratic congressman, has a remarkable quality about it.

In early 2002, Mr. Carney, a Naval Reserve officer, was assigned to work in a tiny intelligence unit created by Douglas J. Feith, then the under secretary of defense for policy, to search for links between terrorist groups and their possible state-sponsors, most notably Iraq. After the 2003 invasion, the Feith unit, the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group, was caught up in the debate over the Bush administration's handling of prewar intelligence, and the office was investigated by a Senate committee and an independent presidential commission.

Today, Mr. Carney is back in Washington in a very different role, as the Democratic representative-elect from the 10th Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Carney, a 47-year-old political science professor at the Worthington campus of Pennsylvania State University and still a Naval Reserve officer, won his race in a heavily Republican district in northeastern Pennsylvania by defeating the Republican incumbent, Don Sherwood, who had been weakened by accusations that he had abused his former mistress.

Mr. Carney's victory was one of the building blocks in the Democratic takeover of the House, and as it happens, the Democrats will soon be considering whether to use their new power to further investigate the Bush administration's handling of prewar intelligence. If they do, they will not have far to look for an eyewitness account.

In the summer and fall of 2002, Mr. Carney was at the center of the storm, briefing George J. Tenet, then the director of central intelligence, and Stephen J. Hadley, then the deputy national security adviser, on the Feith unit's assessment of any links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. At the time, the unit was creating controversy within the government for arguing that there was significant evidence of ties between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

Ultimately, the Bush administration emphasized the threat the United States supposedly faced from Iraq's unconventional weapons as the primary justification for invading, while the Iraq-Qaeda connection gradually faded as a major talking point. In 2004, the independent Sept. 11 commission said it had seen "no evidence" that the contacts "ever developed into a collaborative operational relationship," challenging the administration's prewar assertions.

Today, Mr. Carney says he still believes there were links between Iraq and Al Qaeda, although he is careful not to overstate them.

"On a scale of 0 to 10, where 0 was no connection and 10 was operational control, I would say it's about a 2½," he said in an interview. "It was a relationship of keeping your friends close and your enemies closer," he added. "Saddam was a savvy guy, and I think he wanted to make sure that if Al Qaeda someday became a force, that he wanted to keep his options open. I thought that there was a relationship. Whether it was strong enough to go to war, that's the president's decision."

Mr. Carney said he was far more troubled by the way the Bush administration dealt with Iraq after the invasion, when he said it became clear that the United States was not prepared to deal with the growing chaos in the country. Mr. Carney recalled that there was a wealth of prewar intelligence predicting that an insurgency would develop quickly after the invasion, and he said he was stunned by the Pentagon's failure to plan for it or even acknowledge its scope.

"There was a lot of intelligence prewar," Mr. Carney said, "saying that Saddam wasn't going to fight force-on-force, like in the gulf war; it would be an insurgency." Referring to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, he added: "It bothered me when the secretary started calling the insurgency a bunch of dead-enders. The intel certainly didn't depict them as dead-enders."

He said of Pentagon officials: "They were saying that the looting was just the way the Iraqis behaved. It showed that we didn't seem to get it."

"I think they still thought they were fighting Desert Storm," he added. "That's the war they thought they had, and that's how they managed it."

After returning home to Pennsylvania in 2004 after his stint at the Pentagon, Mr. Carney began to gear up for what seemed to be a long-shot bid for Congress.

He said Iraq was a factor in his decision to run but not the overriding one. "It was one straw among many," he said. "It was the politics of division, and the way Congress eschewed its role of oversight and accountability. We didn't have any checks on the administration. I think that was the bottom line for me."

Mr. Carney describes himself as "probably to the right" of most House Democrats on Iraq and opposes calls for an immediate withdrawal of American troops. Instead, during his campaign he proposed that for every new Iraqi battalion trained, one United States battalion should be brought home. He said the United States had to leave Iraq "at some point," but added, "We can't leave behind a mess; we have to focus on training Iraqi forces, who can then train other Iraqis."

But while Mr. Carney talked about Iraq during the campaign, it was Mr. Sherwood's missteps, mainly the abuse accusations made by his former mistress, that made the race competitive.

"I think Iraq was an issue everywhere this year, but the central issue in this race was the personal-values thing with Sherwood," said Ed Mitchell, a Democratic political media strategist in Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Mr. Mitchell, who did not work for the Carney campaign, said Mr. Sherwood was "playing defense" for much of the campaign, making it hard for him to gain traction with any attacks on Mr. Carney.

"Chris pivoted off his military background to talk about honor and character," Mr. Mitchell added, "which was a nice way of presenting the contrast between him and Sherwood, without him attacking Sherwood for his indiscretions."

Republicans made a last-ditch effort to tar Mr. Carney on Iraq, sending out fliers late in the campaign criticizing him for his involvement in prewar intelligence, but they seemed to have little effect on the race. "They were playing catch-up ball from day one," Mr. Mitchell said of the Sherwood campaign.

Mr. Carney's campaign certainly caught the attention of some major players in the Bush administration's decision to go to war. Richard Perle, the former senior adviser to Mr. Rumsfeld who was an influential advocate of war with Iraq but has more recently criticized the administration's conduct of the war, was the host of a fund-raiser for Mr. Carney.

Immediately after Mr. Carney's election, Mr. Feith called to congratulate him. "He's a talented, intelligent person," Mr. Feith said. "Some of my best friends are Democrats."

Today, Mr. Carney is one of at least four newly elected Democratic members of the House with recent military credentials, a fact that was emphasized during the campaign by the Democratic Party leadership. Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois, who ran the party's Congressional campaign nationwide, said he thought Mr. Carney and the others would have a significant impact on the debate over Iraq in the new Congress.

"They are going to affect the debate on what you do for the troops, for veterans, and on what questions get asked," Mr. Emanuel said.

But Mr. Carney is not enthusiastic about the possibility of a new Congressional investigation of prewar intelligence, which he said would be a major distraction. For Mr. Carney, there is an element of been there, done that to looking back at the now-familiar cast of prewar characters, including Mr. Feith; Mr. Tenet; Paul D. Wolfowitz, the former deputy defense secretary; and Ahmad Chalabi, the Iraqi opposition leader who was a prewar favorite of many in the Defense Department to take the reins of a future Iraqi government.

"Let's win the war first, then maybe look at how we got into it," Mr. Carney said. "The more energy spent on answering Congressional investigations, the less time will be spent on winning the war."

The Cowards Turned Out To Be Right (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

For several years, the White House and its Dobermans helpfully pointed out the real enemy in Iraq: those lazy, wimpish foreign correspondents who were so foolish and unpatriotic that they reported that we faced grave difficulties in Iraq.

To Paul Wolfowitz, the essential problem was that journalists were cowards. "Part of our problem is a lot of the press are afraid to travel very much, so they sit in Baghdad and they publish rumors," Mr. Wolfowitz said in 2004. He later added, "The story isn't being described accurately."

Don Rumsfeld agreed but suggested that the problem was treason: "Interestingly, all of the exaggerations seem to be on one side. It isn't as though there simply have been a series of random errors on both sides of issues. On the contrary, the steady stream of errors all seem to be of a nature to inflame the situation and to give heart to the terrorists and to discourage those who hope for success in Iraq."

As for Dick Cheney, he saw the flaw in journalists as indolence. "The press is, with all due respect — there are exceptions — oftentimes lazy, often simply reports what someone else in the press says without doing their homework."

Mr. Cheney and the others might have better spent their time reading the coverage of Iraq rather than insulting it, because in retrospect those brave reporters based in Baghdad got the downward spiral right.

"Many correspondents feel a sense of vindication that the administration finally accepts what we were screaming two years ago," notes Farnaz Fassihi, who provided excellent Iraq coverage for The Wall Street Journal. Now Ms. Fassihi wonders how long it will take for the administration to acknowledge the reality of 2006 that Iraq correspondents are writing about: the incipient civil war.

Dexter Filkins, who covered Iraq brilliantly for this newspaper until his departure this summer to take up a fellowship at Harvard, says he was constantly accused of reporting only the bad news, of being unpatriotic, and of getting Americans killed.

"I don't think it ever affected our reporting," he said. "But I did find it demoralizing, the idea that the truth — the reality on the ground that we were seeing every day — did not matter, that these overfed people sitting in TV studios and in their living rooms could just turn up the volume on what they wanted to be happening in Iraq and that that could overwhelm the reality."

Mr. Filkins added: "I have almost been killed in Iraq 20 or 30 times — really almost killed. "I've lost count. Do these people really believe that we were all risking our lives for some political agenda?"

Richard Engel of NBC says he was taken aback when pundits accused him of standing on a balcony in the Green Zone and simply feeding the world bad news. "Like most journalists in Iraq, I have never lived in the Green Zone," he notes, adding: "To imply from afar we were just lazy was missing the point, and also dangerous. I know several reporters who were so incensed by similar criticism, they took extra risks."

While it's the right that led those toxic attacks, the left is also vulnerable to letting ideology trump empiricism. Mr. Filkins notes that while he used to get nasty letters and e-mail primarily from conservatives, much of the fire more recently has come from liberals accusing him of covering up atrocities — all of it from people whose ideological certitude is proportional to their distance from Baghdad.

As we try to extricate ourselves from Iraq, a basic lesson for the administration is that it should deal with bad news in ways more creative than clobbering the messenger. From the beginning of the war, the Pentagon has had an incredibly sophisticated news operation (now including its own news channel, carried on some cable networks), but it has often seemed more concerned with disseminating propaganda than with gathering facts.

Take the Defense Department's Early Bird news clipping service, which traditionally had been a dispassionate collection of outside articles to keep senior military officers informed. Lately it has been leading with in-house spin. The Early Bird of Nov. 20, for example, began with three separate unpublished letters to the editor by Pentagon officials before getting to the news from around the world.

So how about if the administration devotes itself less to managing the news and more to trying to manage Iraq?

IN January 1968, Americans turned on their televisions to find scenes of chaos and carnage as Vietnamese communists unleashed their surprise Tet offensive. It would go down in history as the greatest American battlefield defeat of the cold war.

Twenty-five years later, in December 1992, the United States began a humanitarian intervention in Somalia that would be viewed as the most striking failure of the post-cold-war era. Then, in March 2003, American tanks charged across the dunes into Iraq, beginning, in the eyes of many Americans, the worst foreign policy debacle of the post-9/11 world. Tet, Somalia and Iraq: the three great post-World War II American defeats.

Except that, remarkably, Tet and Somalia were not defeats. They were successes perceived as failures. Such stark divergence between perception and reality is common in wartime, when people's beliefs about which side wins and which loses are often driven by psychological factors that have nothing to do with events on the battlefield. Tet and Somalia may, therefore, hold important lessons for Iraq.

The Tet offensive was an unmitigated disaster for the communists. Despite the advantages of surprise, the South Vietnamese insurgents, the Vietcong, failed to hold on to a single target in South Vietnam and suffered staggering losses. Of the 80,000 attackers, as many as half were killed in the first month alone, and the Vietcong never recovered. The United States had clearly won this round of the war.

Yet most Americans saw the Tet offensive as a failure for the United States. Approval of President Lyndon B. Johnson's handling of the war slipped to a low of 26 percent. Before Tet, 58 percent of Americans described themselves as "hawks" who wanted to step up American military involvement in the war, while 26 percent described themselves as "doves" seeking to reduce it. Two months after Tet, doves narrowly outnumbered hawks.

How did perceptions become so detached from reality? A key factor was overblown expectations. In the months before Tet, Johnson had begun a "progress campaign" to convince Americans that victory in Vietnam was just around the corner. Reams of statistics showed that infiltration rates were down and enemy casualties were up. And it worked. Public confidence ticked upwards. But after Johnson's bullish rhetoric, Tet looked like a disaster. The scale and surprise of the offensive sent a shock wave through the American psyche. As Johnson's former aide, Robert Koner, later recalled, "Boom, 40 towns get attacked, and they didn't believe us anymore."

The illusion of defeat was heightened by two powerful symbolic events. First, the communists attacked the American Embassy in Saigon. It was one of the smallest-scale actions of the Tet offensive, but it captured America's attention. The attackers had breached the pre-eminent symbol of the United States presence in South Vietnam: if the embassy wasn't safe, nowhere was. News outlets reported that the embassy had been captured when in reality all of the attackers were soon lying dead in the courtyard.

Gen. William Westmoreland, the commander of the American forces in Vietnam, held a press conference at the embassy to announce that Tet was an American victory. But behind the general, dead Vietcong were still being dragged away from the blood-spattered lawn. Reporters could scarcely believe what they were hearing. Said one: "Westmoreland was standing in the ruins and saying everything was great."

Second, Eddie Adams's photograph of South Vietnam's police chief executing a Vietcong captive in the street caused a sensation. After he fired the shot, the police chief told nearby reporters: "They killed many Americans and many of my men. Buddha will understand. Do you?" Back home in the United States, the image spoke powerfully of a brutal and unjust war. For some Americans, this image was the Tet offensive.

Finally, the American news media painted a picture of disaster in Vietnam. Even though communist forces incurred enormous losses, reporters often lauded their performance. As the Times war correspondent Peter Braestrup put it, "To have portrayed such a setback for one side as a defeat for the other — in a major crisis abroad — cannot be counted as a triumph for American journalism."

A similar story later unfolded in Somalia. From 1992 to 1994, the American humanitarian intervention in Somalia saved the lives of more than 100,000 Somalis and cut the number of refugees in half, for the loss of 43 Americans. Back in the United States, however, this noble mission was widely viewed as the greatest foreign policy disaster since Vietnam. By October 1993, approval for President Bill Clinton's handling of Somalia fell to 30 percent. Only 25 percent of Americans viewed the intervention as a success, and 66 percent saw it as a failure.

Like Tet, the mission in Somalia suffered from overblown expectations. Intervening in an anarchical, war-ridden country was bound to be difficult. But early efforts to provide food and security in Somalia went so well that the project looked deceptively easy. The American public and news media lost interest — until early October 1993, when American soldiers were killed in the infamous "Black Hawk Down" battle in Mogadishu.

With echoes of Saigon in 1968, powerful images of the Mogadishu battle pushed Americans towards a perception of defeat. Press coverage was dominated by pictures of the captured pilot, Michael Durant, and mutilated American corpses, often with the tagline of America's "humiliation." Journalists tended to ignore the bigger picture, in this case large pro-American demonstrations in Somalia and successful efforts to save lives and restore order outside of the capital.

Memories of Vietnam, and fears of getting bogged down in another messy quagmire, also promoted perceptions of failure. In October 1993, 62 percent of Americans thought that the intervention in Somalia "could turn into another Vietnam," even after Mr. Clinton announced that America was pulling soldiers out of Somalia, and at a time when American casualties were a thousand times lower than in Vietnam.

What does this mean for Iraq? At the least, Tet and Somalia suggest we should be very careful before concluding that Iraq is a defeat. There is real evidence of failure, especially the escalating sectarian violence. But our perceptions are nevertheless easily manipulated. Iraq looks like a defeat in part because the Bush administration fell into the same trap as President Johnson: raising expectations of imminent victory by declaring "mission accomplished" before the real work had even begun. And as with Somalia, fighting shadowy insurgents in Iraq while propping up a weak government engenders negative memories of Vietnam.

Perceptions of success and failure can change the course of history. Reeling from the supposed disaster at Tet, the United States began to withdraw. Memories of "failure" in Somalia were a major reason — perhaps the major reason — that the United States did nothing to stop the genocide in Rwanda in 1994. If Iraq is perceived as a failure, it is only a matter of time before America pulls out, leaving who-knows-what behind. With the stakes so high, Americans must be certain that their perception of failure in Iraq is not a mirage.

Wheat Monopoly Cited In Iraq Oil-for-food Scandal (WT/AP)

By Rod Mcguirk

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- Top officials from Australia's monopoly wheat exporter deceived the United Nations and likely broke Australian law by paying more than $200 million to Saddam Hussein's regime under the Iraq oil-for-food program, an inquiry reported yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0098798

Former Judge Terence Cole said he found no evidence of wrongdoing by government officials in his months-long investigation into kickbacks, but recommended police investigate 11 executives from the wheat exporter and a 12th from another company.

Prime Minister John Howard said the inquiry's key recommendations would be acted upon immediately. The Howard government instituted the inquiry after AWB -- formerly the state-owned Australian Wheat Board -- was named as the largest single payer of kickbacks in the corruption-ridden U.N. program.

Mr. Howard said a police task force would be set up to investigate AWB executives mentioned by Judge Cole, who identified possible crimes but did not have the power to file charges.

Mr. Howard also said the government would review the system granting AWB a monopoly over Australia's wheat exports. The system has been criticized as unfairly protective by Australia's competitors on world grain markets.

Mr. Howard said the report vindicated him, Foreign Minister Alexander Downer and former Trade Minister Mark Vaile, who claimed to have had no knowledge of the kickbacks.

In his five-volume, 2,000-page report, Judge Cole said he found no evidence of illegal activity by the government.

"The government has hidden nothing," Mr. Howard told a press conference after the report was released. "The commissioner has found in the most emphatic terms imaginable that there is no evidence of wrongdoing" by the government.

The inquiry's government-given mandate was to examine company executives -- not government officials. Mr. Howard denied the investigative powers were set deliberately narrow to ensure the government was not implicated in the scandal.

The report said 11 AWB officers may have breached Australian corporate and criminal law. Among them was AWB's former chairman, Trevor Flugge, who became widely known after a photograph became public of him, shirtless, brandishing a revolver during a trip to Iraq in 2003.

At the inquiry, Mr. Flugge said he was unaware the payments were in breach of U.N. sanctions. Brendan Stewart, AWB's chairman, said his board "deeply regrets" the way in which the wheat trade with Iraq was conducted.

From 1999 to 2003, AWB executives purportedly authorized $222 million in bogus transport fees to a Jordanian trucking company, Alia Transport, that was partly owned by Saddam's government. Payments to Saddam were illegal under U.N. sanctions.

AWB purportedly inflated the cost of wheat it was charging to the oil-for-food program by as much as $50 per ton to cover the bogus transport fees, which the Iraqi Grain Board demanded as a condition for lucrative grain contracts.

Judge Cole also found that the U.N. knew Iraq was breaching sanctions, but took no steps to stop the practice.

Australian Panel Says Firm Paid Bribes To Hussein (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia, Nov. 27 — A high-level commission investigating corruption in the United Nations oil-for-food program released a long-awaited report on Monday stating unequivocally that a major Australian wheat company paid more than $224 million in kickbacks and bribes to Saddam Hussein's government.

The commission also found that the company, ABW Ltd., had "deliberately and dishonestly" devised a scheme for the payments — from 1999 until the overthrow of Mr. Hussein in 2003 — that would deceive the United Nations. When the United Nations conducted its investigation in 2005, headed by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman, AWB withheld thousands of pages of documents and its lawyers made statements to Mr. Volcker that were patently false, the commission found.

The Australian commission's report was the most thorough — and damning — investigation of corruption in the United Nation's oil-for-food program. It is certain to have repercussions for politicians in Canberra as well as in Washington, where incoming Democratic lawmakers have pledged to hold their own hearings.

The program was set up to alleviate the hardships of the Iraqi people while isolating Saddam Hussein's government. Its aim was to allow Iraq to trade some oil for food and other necessities under close United Nations supervision while the country remained under international sanctions.

Instead, the report found that both AWB and the Iraqi government used the program for profit.

In Canberra, the government of Prime Minister John Howard claimed vindication because the commission declared that it found no evidence that any government officials had knowledge of AWB's kickback scheme.

But the commission's chairman, Terence Cole, a retired state supreme court justice, left open the question of whether Australian officials could, or should, have known about the scheme — all AWB contracts were submitted to the government for approval — if they had conducted their own investigation. His mandate from the government for the inquiry did not include that question, he said.

The opposition leader, Kim Beazley, said that even if the government was not criminally culpable, it was at least negligent and incompetent for not knowing about the kickbacks.

The scheme AWB and the Iraq government set up for making the kickbacks involved using a Jordanian trucking company, Alia, which was a front for the Iraqi government, the report concluded.

At first, AWB paid Alia $12 for each ton of wheat it sold to the Iraqi government, money that went into the pockets of Iraqi officials. Later, the amount was increased by Iraqi government to $55 a ton, which included a "service fee." The money was supposedly for moving the wheat inland from the Iraqi port. But Alia had no trucks in Iraq.

AWB then passed on the cost of the bribes to the United Nations by recovering the inflated payments from the oil-for-food program's escrow account.

The commission's report — 2,065 pages in five volumes, costing more than $7 million and taking nearly a year to compile — was based on the testimony it took from some 70 AWB and Australian government officials during 75 days of public hearings. It also examined more than 1,500 internal company and government documents. (The report can be found at www.oilforfoodinquiry.gov.au).

When investigated by the Volcker commission, which found that AWB was the largest payer of kickbacks to Iraq under the oil for food program, lawyers said that the company had been deceived by Iraq and Alia, and that it did not know Alia was a front for the Iraqi government and had never paid a service fee.

And AWB lawyers repeatedly denied they had any knowledge that the payments they were making through Alia were in fact going to the Iraqi government.

"Neither statement was true," Mr. Cole concluded, rejecting the claims almost in totality.

"The facts are not now in doubt," he said.

Mr. Cole was blistering in his criticism of AWB, which has enjoyed a monopoly on wheat exports. The illegal payment scheme grew out of a "lack of culture of ethical dealing" at AWB, he said. He was also noticeably critical of AWB's lawyers for advising the company on how to hide the payments, and for lying to the Volcker committee.

The commission recommended that criminal prosecutions be considered against 11 AWB officials, including the general counsel, and against a former officer of BHP Billiton, one of the world's largest mining companies, who, Mr. Cole said, may have "conspired with or aided and abetted AWB" in transferring $8 million to the Iraqi regime as a part of debt supposedly owed to BHP.

BHP issued a statement on Monday saying that it had received the Cole Commission report and would have no further comment until it had reviewed it and completed its own internal investigation.

The current chairman of AWB, Brendan Stewart, who replaced one of the men who now faces criminal charges, said the company "deeply regrets" the manner in which the trade with Iraq was conducted. He said the company would issue a fuller statement in the next few days.

In Washington, Sen. Tom Harkin, Iowa Democrat, who is slated to become chairman of the House Agricultural Committee in January, has indicated he will hold hearings on the matter.

"The exact form and details of the inquiry have yet to be decided, although the report issued by the Cole Commission should be quite helpful to our efforts," Mr. Harkin said in a statement on Monday.

During the commission's hearing here, documents were introduced showing that in 2003, when the allegations of AWB's bribes began to seep out, the Australian ambassador in Washington, Michael Thawley, lobbied senior Bush administration officials on AWB's behalf. It is not clear what they did, if anything.

DOJ_NMG_0098800

The ambassador also lobbied Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, who had been a loud critic of corruption in the oil-for-food program, but called off an investigation after being assured by Mr. Thawley that AWB had done nothing illegal. Mr. Coleman later said he had been misled by the ambassador. Senator Coleman said Monday that he would "review the Cole report with a fine-tooth comb to determine whether U.S. interests were hurt by AWB's gross misconduct." A major concern, he said, "is whether Australian officials were less than honest in their dealings with the subcommittee."

Mr. Thawley has said that the representations he made to Mr. Coleman were based on assurances from AWB that it had not made any illegal payments.

The U.S. Wheat Associates, a trade group, could also claim vindication. In June, 2003, it had written a letter to Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, suggesting that AWB was inflating its wheat contracts and that some of the excess had gone to the Iraqi regime.

The Australian government called the allegations "slanderous and outrageous" at the time and said they were part of an "insidious campaign" by AWB's chief competitor in the Iraqi wheat market.

Australia Cleared In Kickback Probe (WSJ)

By Barbara Adam And Ray Brindal

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- A yearlong inquiry into $221.7 million in kickbacks paid to Saddam Hussein's former regime in Iraq cleared the Australian government of any wrongdoing, but the findings could increase pressure on the government to dismantle the country's powerful wheat-export monopoly.

U.S. and European growers have long tried to persuade Australia to end its wheat-marketing system, whereby growers sell their export wheat through a "single desk" managed by listed AWB Ltd., which then handles sales to foreign buyers. U.S. and European growers contend the monopoly distorts the world market by giving Australian farmers more clout overseas than they would have if they sold their wheat individually.

Australia is one of the world's most important wheat producers and recently ranked second among exporters behind the U.S.

AWB has survived many attacks in the past. But more recently it has come under renewed fire amid revelations that it paid illegal kickbacks to Mr. Hussein's government to secure wheat contracts as part of the scandal-plagued United Nations oil-for-food program. Australia was the dominant wheat supplier to Iraq beginning in the mid-1990s. By 1999, sales to Iraq accounted for 10% of Australia's annual wheat exports. In the past year, however, the U.S. has muscled AWB out of the Iraq wheat market, and the American wheat lobby has agitated for an inquiry into AWB's activities in Iraq.

Retired Australian Judge Terence Cole found AWB may have broken several Australian laws, including criminal and banking codes, by making payments to the Iraqi regime between 1999 and 2003 in breach of U.N. sanctions.

In a report to the Australian government yesterday, Mr. Cole named 11 former AWB executives, including a former BHP Billiton PLC executive, as possibly acting illegally.

In a statement to the stock exchange, AWB Chairman Brendan Stewart expressed "deep regret" about the way the company, based in Melbourne, conducted the wheat trade with Iraq under the oil-for-food program. He said AWB won't respond to allegations made against its former employees but added that it will hold a briefing tomorrow after reviewing the report.

BHP Billiton Chief Executive Chip Goodyear said he wouldn't be able to respond to the Cole report until it had been thoroughly reviewed.

The government pledged to introduce legislation in Parliament within two weeks to facilitate Mr. Cole's recommendation of a police task force to consider criminal prosecutions against AWB and those named in the report.

Two U.S. senators pledged yesterday to investigate the Australian wheat monopoly in light of the report. Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa, probable chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee after the next Congress convenes in January, said the AWB report would be helpful for his panel's inquiry. Sen. Norm Coleman, while praising the Australian probe, said its findings raise worries about whether actions by the exporter harmed U.S. farmers. The Minnesota Republican, who heads the Senate's

Homeland Security and Government Affairs investigative subcommittee until January, said he would examine whether AWB officials lied in testimony to the subcommittee.

Prime Minister John Howard, who appeared before the Cole inquiry in April to give sworn evidence about what he knew, said the government is reviewing Australia's wheat-marketing arrangements; the role of AWB in the nation's wheat trade, valued at as much as five billion Australian dollars, or about US$4 billion, a year; and the duties of AWB's regulator, the Wheat Export Authority.

Many analysts believe the Cole report's findings will make it difficult for Australia to avoid some kind of overhaul of AWB.

Some agricultural-industry groups in Australia still back a wheat-export monopoly so growers don't compete against each other on world markets, driving returns down. But they don't necessarily support AWB's operation of the monopoly. Meanwhile, a sizable minority of growers now supports freeing wheat exports.

The main national growers' lobby, the Grains Council of Australia, said the findings of the Cole inquiry will undermine growers' confidence in AWB.

The Australian government set up the Cole inquiry a year ago, after a U.N.-commissioned probe by Paul Volcker, former chairman of the U.S. Federal Reserve, found AWB paid kickbacks to Mr. Hussein's regime through the oil-for-food program. That program allowed Iraq to sell oil in exchange for humanitarian goods, using the U.N. as an intermediary. Mr. Volcker found AWB was one of about 2,200 companies and individuals from 66 countries that paid a total of US$1.8 billion in illegal kickbacks to Iraq.

A report commissioned by AWB said changes to monopoly arrangements are probably warranted but must be done slowly, and not before 2010.

AWB's stock price has dropped more than half since the inquiry's public hearings began in January.

The Cole report found Mr. Howard, Deputy Prime Minister Mark Vaile and Foreign Affairs Minister Alexander Downer were never told of AWB's irregular payments in Iraq.

Shooting The Messenger (WP)

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

IN THE MESS that is Iraq, there's one entity that has done an unquestionably good job: the special inspector general for Iraqi reconstruction. Under the leadership of Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the inspector general's office has found that the Coalition Provisional Authority could not account for almost $9 billion distributed to Iraqi ministries. Mr. Bowen's office determined that the U.S. government lost track of thousands of pistols and hundreds of assault rifles given to Iraqi security forces. It found that Halliburton Co. wasted $75 million on a failed pipeline project and that Parsons Corp. bungled construction of a $75 million police academy in Baghdad so badly that human waste dripped from the ceilings. Its audits have saved the government more than $400 million.

Now there's a move to close down Mr. Bowen's shop. More than a move, actually: A mischievous provision, slipped into the defense authorization bill by House Republicans without the knowledge of key senators, set an October 2007 termination date for the office. The bill was signed into law last month, but a number of senators, including Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee; Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the committee's ranking minority member; and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), are trying to reverse this foolish plan during the lame-duck session.

Unfortunately, a promising legislative vehicle for their attempt, a military construction spending bill, is snarled in a separate dispute about earmarks. The Senate is poised to approve a stand-alone fix, but House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), who was responsible for the early termination, is said to be resisting a fix. The rationale is that the need for the inspector general's services is diminishing along with U.S. reconstruction funds and that remaining work can be picked up by State and Defense Department inspectors general. But that ignores an additional $3.6 billion provided for reconstruction efforts in the latest defense bill and the expertise that Mr. Bowen's shop has demonstrated in doing this difficult work. When it returns next week, the Senate should pass the measure extending Mr. Bowen's tenure, and the House should go along.

Bush Visits Baltic Ally Ahead Of Talks On Afghanistan, Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson

DOJ_NMG_0098802

USA Today, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia — President Bush arrived here Monday to promote freedom and democracy, using this small Baltic nation, a former republic of the Soviet Union, as a model.

Bush came to the seaport of Tallinn in advance of this week's NATO summit on Afghanistan and meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan.

Estonia and Latvia — site of the two-day summit — are U.S. allies in the war on terrorism. In a 2005 speech, Bush hailed Estonia and its neighbors Latvia and Lithuania for "one of the most dramatic" political transformations that proved "the love of liberty is stronger than the will of an empire."

Charles Kupchan, an international relations professor at Georgetown University, said Bush's freedom agenda has been challenged by the rising violence in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"It's grown increasingly difficult for Bush to talk the talk of democratization as Iraq and Afghanistan spiral downward," Kupchan said.

Bush's first trip to Estonia, however, provides a different backdrop for the debate. Since the Soviet occupation here ended 15 years ago, "we have seen Estonia consolidate its sovereignty and build a thriving free-market democracy," said Judy Ansley, a senior director for the National Security Council.

In Tallinn's Old Town, where serpentine cobblestone streets and stone towers date to the 13th century, many residents said they were pleased about the first visit to Estonia by a U.S. president. In Town Hall Square, Estonians sold ceramics and clothing as a sound system blared White Christmas and an Estonian rendition of Here Comes Santa Claus. Several residents, however, said they are worried about conditions in Iraq.

"I'm not for the war, so I am not for Bush," said Anna Dytyna, 22, who sells home furnishings not far from the central Town Hall Square.

Natalja Ikonnikova, 44, questioned whether the United States or another country could force democracy on Iraq or Afghanistan. "They must decide what to do in their country," she said.

Evi Tigane, 74, said Bush's visit to her hometown is strictly about politics. As for Iraq, she said: "This is (about) oil."

Bush's hopes for democracy in Iraq and Afghanistan have been threatened by ongoing insurgencies in both countries, which will be major topics of his week-long, three-country trip.

"Things are not proceeding well or fast enough," said national security adviser Stephen Hadley, declining to characterize the violence in Iraq as a civil war.

"We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase," he said.

Bush plans to spend half a day today in Tallinn, meeting with the president and prime minister as well as local democratic activists. Bush and Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves have scheduled a brief news conference.

Bush then heads to Latvia's capital, Riga, site of the NATO summit. The meeting will be dominated by the situation in Afghanistan, where 32,000 NATO troops are battling a resurgent Taliban. A U.S.-led invasion in 2001 deposed the Taliban for harboring planners of the 9/11 terrorist attacks.

The trip ends Thursday in Jordan, where Bush will huddle with al-Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II. Hadley said Bush wants to hear from al-Maliki about his strategy for moving forward.

Hadley said Bush is open to all ideas, including recommendations coming soon from a special commission on Iraq headed by former secretary of State James Baker and former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton.

NATO Chiefs Focus On Afghanistan (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

RIGA, Latvia -- One issue will dominate this week's NATO summit: Afghanistan.

The 26 presidents and prime ministers know that the future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is playing out in the deserts of Kandahar and mountains of Uruzgan rather than in their conference hall on the Baltic Sea.

DOJ_NMG_0098803

The rise in Taliban violence since NATO's 32,800-strong force moved into those southern provinces and the resultant casualties among civilians and Western soldiers has called into question the strategy behind NATO's "stabilization" force in Afghanistan.

Before traveling to Europe for the summit, U.S. President George W. Bush spoke on the phone with his Afghan counterpart. "President Bush assured President Hamid Karzai that the United States of America will reiterate its commitment at the NATO summit to the strengthening of security and reconstruction in Afghanistan," said a statement from Mr. Karzai's office in Kabul.

The dangers to the NATO force were underscored by attacks that ended a period of relative calm. Two Canadian soldiers serving with the NATO force were reported slain by a suicide car bomber yesterday. A day earlier, a suicide bomber killed 15 Afghans in a restaurant.

The summit today and tomorrow in Latvia's capital, Riga, will be Mr. Bush's first meeting with European allies since he was chastened by Democrats' success in the midterm elections and bid farewell to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Bush To Pursue Fresh NATO Commitments (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia, Nov. 27 -- President Bush will seek fresh troops and equipment for the fight in Afghanistan, and fewer restrictions on how they can be used, when he sits down this week with NATO allies to review the state of the dangerous mission there, according to senior U.S. officials.

Bush flew Monday to this scenic capital, on his way to a summit of NATO's leaders in Riga, Latvia, that begins Tuesday. There, U.S. officials say, they are hoping allies will renew their commitments in Afghanistan, where a stepped-up Taliban insurgency is posing stiff new challenges for some 33,000 NATO troops, about a third of them American.

The mission is shaping up as the major issue for discussion among Bush and the leaders of the 25 other NATO member countries, who are gathering for the first time in two years. A failed operation in Afghanistan would threaten NATO's ambition to one day play a more robust role in helping address the world's crises.

Briefing reporters on Air Force One on the way to Estonia, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley cited "an increasing awareness at how important this is for the war on terror, how important it is for Afghanistan and how important it is for NATO not to fail."

Some key NATO countries, including Germany, France, Italy and Spain, have placed sharp limits on how their troops can be used, to the growing consternation of the United States and other countries whose forces are involved in fierce battles with the Taliban in southern parts of Afghanistan. Only the United States, Britain, Canada and the Netherlands have combat troops in the south.

Meanwhile, calls for more troops from NATO commanders have faced resistance from member countries, some of which have seen public support for the mission wane as casualties have increased. On Monday, a suicide bomber attacked a Canadian armored vehicle in the south, killing two soldiers and bringing to 44 the number of Canadian troops killed in the country.

"Events in Afghanistan are reaching a critical juncture, and European politics and perceptions, as well as U.S. commitments in Iraq, may prevent NATO from getting the assets necessary to ensure victory," said retired Gen. Joseph W. Ralston, the former U.S. supreme allied commander in Europe, at a briefing held by the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

U.S. officials say they hope the summit will help focus attention on the needs of the mission in Afghanistan, which they say include not only greater military assistance but also economic and political reconstruction efforts.

NATO military spokesmen in Kabul said they will seek to review the issue of troop restrictions, or "caveats," in the hopes that some personnel already stationed in Afghanistan might take on broader roles or be able to shift from one sector to another if needed. "If the caveats can be reduced, that is essentially the same as adding new troops, because it frees up troops that are here," said Maj. Luke Knittig, chief NATO spokesman in the Afghan capital.

Daniel Fried, the assistant secretary of state in charge of European and Eurasian affairs, told reporters of the "hard price" being paid by Canada as he sought to explain the need for more flexibility for NATO commanders.

"A country like Canada, and the Netherlands, has every right to expect that their allies are at their back, which means if they get into trouble, they can count on support from all of NATO," Fried said last week.

Privately, U.S. officials are playing down the prospects of any breakthrough this week. In Germany, where public opinion seems strong against lifting restrictions that keep troops in the safer northern areas, Chancellor Angela Merkel last week reiterated her determination to keep them from moving south. U.S. officials remained hopeful, however, that Merkel could continue to frame the debate to allow for some loosening of restrictions in the future.

The United States provides the largest number of NATO troops, with 11,800. Second is Britain, with 6,000; third is Germany, with 2,700; then Canada, with 2,500; followed by the Netherlands, Italy, France, Romania, Spain and Turkey. The United States also has several thousand troops who operate in Afghanistan outside the NATO umbrella.

In 2002 and 2003, NATO troops were confined to Kabul as the International Security Assistance Force. Over the past three years, the mission has been gradually extended to the entire country, with NATO troops moving into the east just last month.

In the past six months, NATO and U.S. troops have faced an unexpectedly aggressive insurgency by the revived Taliban militia. Officials report that attacks have increased fourfold since a year ago, reaching 600 a month, and that between 3,700 and 4,000 people have died in insurgent-related violence this year. The insurgents have also begun using suicide bombs, a new phenomenon for Afghanistan.

NATO commanders in Afghanistan have repeatedly asked for more troops and equipment. So far, only Poland has responded, pledging to send 1,000 troops in the new year.

The central message NATO commanders hope to deliver in Riga is "to put more in focus why we are here in Afghanistan," said Knittig, noting the country's importance in the wars against terrorism and drugs, and in the future security of NATO states. "We need to punch that message through."

Some European diplomats in Kabul expressed disappointment with the reluctance of NATO countries to send more troops and equipment.

"Some countries in Europe need to be reminded that Afghanistan is not just a faraway place we know little about," said Francesc Vendrell, the senior European Union representative in Kabul. "It is a country that is central to the security interests of the West. If Afghanistan were to collapse or the Taliban were to take over, the leaders would probably form close relations with al-Qaeda."

Ronald D. Asmus, executive director of the German Marshall Fund's Transatlantic Center in Brussels, said there is a gap between NATO's expressed desire to play a more active role in addressing world crises and its members' will to do so. "In the Cold War, no one would have dared to put a caveat on how their forces are used at the front lines," he said. "People don't really believe in their hearts that they need to take the big risks to succeed."

But U.S. officials said the mission in Afghanistan is succeeding. "When you take a look at it, obviously NATO was challenged by the Taliban when they moved into the south," said Judy Ansley, the senior director for European affairs on the National Security Council staff. "But NATO has responded very strongly. They've stood and they've fought, and have been very successful against the Taliban. So I don't see Afghanistan as being a mission in trouble or someplace where we have a problem."

A NATO Bid To Regain Afghans' Trust (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, November 27, 2006

PANJWAI, Afghanistan -- The road to this southern Afghan farming town is wide, smooth and utterly empty, except for an occasional old man on a bicycle or a meandering herd of baby camels.

It was paved last year with Japanese funds to help farmers send their grapes to market and patients reach hospitals in the city of Kandahar, 20 miles to the east. But that was before war came to Panjwai, making its name synonymous with the physical destruction and political mayhem wrought by months of Taliban attacks and NATO bombing.

Now almost no one dares to drive on the road. NATO forces declared victory here in late September, claiming to have killed about 1,500 insurgents in a campaign named Operation Medusa. Yet Taliban fighters still linger in the surrounding orchards and launch sporadic attacks. On Monday, insurgents fired at several NATO bases in the district, although no one was injured.

Many shops in Panjwai remain shuttered, and most of the estimated 80,000 people who fled nearby villages have not returned. Some harbor bitter memories of NATO bombings that destroyed their homes and fruit crops. At least 50 civilians were killed over several weeks of bombing, and President Hamid Karzai last month ordered an investigation into the deaths. NATO officials have said the insurgents used villagers' homes as shelter, provoking the deadly airstrikes.

"I lost three of my sons, my brother, my wife, two daughters-in-law and many grandchildren," said Abdullah Shah, a white-haired farmer, wiping his eyes with a dirty shawl. "I moved the whole family into a tent for safety when the fighting started. The international forces said there were 20 Taliban in that tent, but it was not true. How could there be, when we were so crowded already?"

In an effort to regain public trust, NATO forces have moved into Panjwai with bricks, bulldozers and lots of cash. Local men have been hired to repair damaged buildings, the renovated high school reopened last week, and a new road is being laid from the town to several grape-growing villages that suffered the heaviest bombing damage.

NATO has pledged $8 million to improve Panjwai and the adjacent Zhari district, in hopes of creating a Taliban-proof development zone and a model for other post-conflict areas. Canadian troops have set up a base above the town and patrol the bazaar in armored convoys, while NATO officers meet often with local elders.

"Panjwai is a microcosm. The key is to move fast once the fighting stops, work with local institutions, get development projects going and get local people involved in their own security," said Maj. Steve Murray, deputy commander of a military reconstruction team in Kandahar. "We can fight the Taliban until the cows come home, but we can't make the area safe if we don't deal with the other issues."

Last Tuesday, a Canadian officer arrived as bulldozers were clearing land for the new road. He was soon surrounded by frowning farmers who demanded extra money to let the road cross their fields. The mayor joined the negotiations, calculating acreage on a pad of paper. The officer politely insisted on the previously agreed price.

In the chilly Panjwai bazaar, turbaned men huddling around sidewalk teapots raised more serious issues. They expressed deep ambivalence about the presence of international troops and both fear of and admiration for the Taliban insurgents.

"The coalition forces have brought us nothing but problems. They enter our houses and mosques without permission," said Abdul Jan Mohammed, a grape grower whose vineyards were damaged by NATO airstrikes. "The Taliban don't want to fight. They are just tired of all the corruption, as we are."

Bismillah, 45, whose farm is a half-hour walk from town, said his neighbors had begun to return home since the bombing ended but that insurgents were still lurking nearby. Like many Afghans, Bismillah uses just one name.

"Everything is confused now," he said. "At night we hear shooting and rockets, and we cannot light our lamps for fear of the Taliban. But if a mine explodes on the road, the army and coalition forces come and pressure us to find out who did it. The best thing to do is negotiate, but the Taliban will never negotiate as long as the foreign troops stay here."

One obstacle to security is the shortage of Afghan police and soldiers in the region. In terms of size and competence, the new national army and police force have lagged far behind what officials hoped for, so the government recently began recruiting and training local auxiliary police officers to serve in conflict zones such as Kandahar province.

The program has drawn praise and criticism. It gives men in poor rural areas an income and a vested interest in protecting their communities. But recruitment standards are low, training is cursory, and many who sign up are rejected because of hashish use or other habits.

Commander Ehsanullah Alizai, the provincial police chief, said local elders and district officials are choosing applicants for the new force and that each recruit is further vetted by his office. But he acknowledged that the two weeks of training they will get are far from adequate.

"Of course it is not enough. It takes a lot of time and education to become a police officer. But this is an emergency," Alizai said, adding that 250 of the expected 1,000 new police officers have completed training and started work. "The security situation in Panjwai and Zhari was getting worse, and the government had to take action."

But the threat of further NATO bombing has not stopped the Taliban from launching new attacks, often against civilians. Last month, two insurgents on a motorbike ambushed Fazel Mahmad, a Panjwai elder, as he was taking his daughter to a doctor in Kandahar. Mahmad, who works with a government program that helps local insurgents return to civilian life, was shot in the neck and throat but survived after surgery at a NATO base.

"The local Taliban are sons of our soil, but the Taliban trained by al-Qaeda see all Afghans as infidels and Americans. They do not want any reconciliation," said Mahmad, who now speaks with a lisp. He said he saw many wounded Taliban fighters being treated at the NATO field hospital, where he said they cursed the medical staff and refused to eat.

In a second recent attack, insurgents opened fire on a clinic at a camp for nomads and refugees beside the highway from Kandahar to Panjwai and briefly kidnapped the doctor. Now the clinic building sits abandoned beside the colony of patched tents and thorn-bush camel corrals.

On Tuesday, several women in the refugee camp said they had fled there after airstrikes on their villages near Panjwai. One woman, Badro, shrieked and wept, saying two of her brothers and all the family's sheep and camels had been killed.

"Everyone is a witness. There were no Taliban there at all," she cried, shaking a fist. "The dead bodies of my family are still there. It is not safe to collect the pieces."

[On Sunday, a Pakistani suicide bomber detonated himself in Paktika province, killing 15 people and wounding 24, including an Afghan special forces commander, the Associated Press reported.]

The Afghan government has made efforts to console and aid survivors in Panjwai. Abdullah Shah said he was paid about $8,000 as compensation for his dead relatives. He was also taken to Kabul, where he said Karzai gave him a hug and promised him a new house.

Last week, the minister of rural development flew to Kandahar and met with a large group of elders from Panjwai, asking what they needed most. He was accompanied by Christopher Alexander, deputy U.N. representative for Afghanistan, who told them the goal was to transform their region "from this year's battlefield to next year's construction ground."

The delegation did not visit Panjwai because it was considered too dangerous, but Alexander said elders from several villages told him security was better because young men who had been fighting for the Taliban were now earning money on NATO construction projects. He also noted that several elders did not attend the Kandahar meeting, suggesting that they were suspicious of the government and sympathetic to the insurgents.

Mahmad, a fruit grower who remained in Panjwai that day, complained bitterly that the residents were trodden upon by everyone.

"We don't support the Taliban, but we don't want the foreign troops here, either," he said. "I blame President Karzai, too. If we had laws and honest government in this country, the Taliban wouldn't be fighting."

Abroad, Bush Tests His Persuasive Powers (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, November 28, 2006

RIGA, LATVIA

What was sketched into the presidential agenda as a transatlantic foray to address the North Atlantic Alliance's future has instead become one of the more consequential foreign-policy trips of the Bush presidency - and one of the tougher tests of his international leadership.

From the NATO summit he attends in this Baltic capital Tuesday and Wednesday, to the sit-down with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he has added to his agenda, this has become the trip of the George W. Bush wars.

By adding a leg to Amman, Jordan, to meet with Mr. Maliki, the White House has made this trip a crucial part of the president's deliberations on policy adjustments to address the deteriorating situation in Iraq. But before that, Mr. Bush will take up the war in Afghanistan with his NATO colleagues - and Afghanistan is something the president dare not disregard even in the midst of Iraq developments.

Not only is the NATO-led war in Afghanistan facing its own mounting challenges, with potentially deep consequences for the international war on terror, but of the two wars, it is also the one where the United States has important allied assistance.

Yet between the NATO focus on Afghanistan and the Jordan stop to address Iraq, Bush has essentially undertaken a trip focused on the broader Middle East. The test for him will come in his ability to press others into closer cooperation with the US.

"The way Bush's trip has evolved, it highlights how the major security issues we face are no longer in Europe but in the Middle East," says Ronald Asmus, executive director of the German Marshall Fund's Transatlantic Center in Brussels. "Rhetorically the US and Europe are together on that, but politically and psychologically the alliance hasn't really made the leap."

NATO leaders may not like the prospect of a summit with an American president preoccupied with Iraq, Mr. Asmus adds, but that should prompt them "to consider whether they are really addressing the central security challenges facing us today."

In Riga, Bush will press the 26-nation alliance for both more money and more troops for Afghanistan, according to White House officials. To make his case, Bush will emphasize the connection between international security and the battle to defeat a resurgent Taliban and elements of Al Qaeda.

"If NATO is to be successful [in Afghanistan], it will need enough troops and the right kinds of troops to be able to do the mission," says Judy Ansley, senior director for European affairs at the National Security Council. "If you look to the threats of the 21st century, most of them are not right on the borders of Europe as they used to be during the cold war. Afghanistan is a perfect example. You have a terrorist threat that has already hit our shores," she adds, and it "obviously will threaten NATO and NATO member nations if we don't deal with it there."

NATO already commands more than 30,000 foreign troops in Afghanistan. Gen. James Jones, the supreme allied commander, is looking for summit leaders to add 2,500 troops to the total.

The challenge for Bush, however, will be skepticism about his leadership in the wake of perceived defeat in the midterm elections, and what is viewed internationally as his lame-duck status.

"The alliance needs some honest discussion about what it will take to lead a successful counterinsurgency and win in Afghanistan, and normally that would take prompting and leadership from the American president," says John Hulsman, scholar in residence at the German Council on Foreign Relations in Berlin. "The problem is that Bush is in no position, given his political weakness and the shambles of his foreign policy, to lecture anyone at the [NATO] summit."

Afghanistan has become the central test of whether NATO will be able to act as a true alliance to take on the global security issues of the 21st century, says Mr. Hulsman, an expert in transatlantic issues. Too many countries are resorting to so-called "caveats" to exempt themselves from the most dangerous combat missions, he notes, and that raises questions about those members' dedication to the common goals of the alliance.

"The Germans say, 'We are deployed in the north of Afghanistan and that is all we can do,' but being in the north is kind of like guarding New Jersey. It's a little beside the point," he says. "If they and others aren't prepared to put troops in the south where the heavy fighting is and where they might take casualties, then what is the point of the alliance?"

Having that discussion at the summit "risks ruining the party," Hulsman says. "But if you can't get everybody to share the burden of facing the enemies that threaten all of us - and by that I mean Al Qaeda and the forces in the larger battle with terrorism - then why have the party at all?"

Moreover, tough decisions about issues like troop deployment will be extra hard to come by in Riga, other experts say, because NATO countries generally are in a period of weakened leadership.

"President Bush is not the only weak political leader going there. Most of them are rather weak or on their last political lap," says Simon Serfaty, a global security expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. Noting that British Prime Minister Tony Blair and French President Jacques Chirac will be out of the picture by next summer, while others like German Chancellor Angela Merkel face growing challenges at home, he says, "You do have a great deal of political weakness, which makes it all the more difficult to make some of the more demanding decisions related to this renewal of the alliance."

DOJ_NMG_0098808

One thing working in Bush's favor, some experts underline, is that US-Europe tensions have eased since the falling-out over Iraq. Misgivings among partners still exist, they add, but are now more common between those taking on the bulk of the burdens and those sitting out the "hot war" assignments in Afghanistan.

"These tensions go to the heart of whether NATO is really going to work as an alliance on the security challenges we all face and where we face them - and for the foreseeable future that means the Middle East," says Asmus of the German Marshall Fund. "If you really believed the security of your nation was at stake, would you put such conditions on how your soldiers could fight for your defense?"

Bush To Spur NATO On In Afghan Fight (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 28, 2006

TALLINN, Estonia -- President Bush will push for a stronger NATO commitment to fighting in Afghanistan during a summit in Latvia this week, before heading to Jordan to try to work through what the White House acknowledges is "a new phase" of sectarian violence in Iraq.

The Jordan detour, a late addition to the itinerary, will consist of meetings with Jordanian King Abdullah II and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki tomorrow night and Thursday morning, and promises to dominate the four-day trip.

The White House said Mr. Bush will also use the trip to make it clear that, even with control of Congress changing and independent recommendations such as the Iraq Study Group pending, the president still decides foreign policy.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said Mr. Bush is "listening to all of these voices for ideas," but will assure Mr. al-Maliki that in the end, "it is the president who will be crafting the way forward on Iraq."

Mr. Bush finds a situation rapidly deteriorating on the ground in Iraq, and decided he needed to meet face to face with Mr. al-Maliki to fine-tune the course in Iraq. Mr. Hadley said the president wants to hear how the prime minister plans to rein in militias, what he will do to speed up shifting control to Iraqi security forces, and how he can bring more political groups into his coalition government.

On his second international trip since voters handed control of Congress to Democrats on Nov. 7, Mr. Bush finds this trip dominated by the two wars to which he has committed U.S. troops.

He is trying to resist being pushed around by the political situation at home, where expectations are running high for the Iraq Study Group, the congressionally mandated panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton.

Yesterday, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next year, said the commission "faces a tremendous opportunity and responsibility. The opportunity is to generate a bipartisan way forward in Iraq. The responsibility is to make the hard choices required to turn Iraq around."

While still resisting the term "civil war" for the Iraq conflict, the White House did acknowledge the situation is deteriorating and efforts to stop it have failed so far.

"We're clearly in a new phase characterized by an increase in sectarian violence that requires us to adapt to that new phase," Mr. Hadley said, though he had little specific to say about how Mr. Bush plans to respond.

Some Shi'ite leaders in Iraq have threatened to withdraw from the government there if Mr. al-Maliki travels to meet with Mr. Bush.

Meanwhile, Abdullah this weekend broadened the stakes of the meeting and the Iraqi conflict by saying it cannot be solved unless there is also a solution to the Israel-Palestinian issue.

Adding to the situation is Lebanon, which is teetering after the recent murder of the industry minister and continued political conflict between Hezbollah and the U.S.-backed government.

"We could possibly imagine going into 2007 and having three civil wars on our hands," the king said Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

DOJ_NMG_0098809

Meanwhile, expectations for the NATO summit are low. European nations are resisting Mr. Bush's push for committing more troops to the dangerous areas of Afghanistan, and want to go slowly on expanding the alliance's ties to non-NATO nations who are assisting with security operations.

Mr. Hadley said the difficulties are understandable but said the leaders at the summit will make some announcements on those issues.

"I think there is an increasing awareness at how important this is for the war on terror, how important it is for Afghanistan and how important it is for NATO not to fail," he said.

Mr. Bush spent the night in Tallinn, Estonia, for what amounts to a brief social call, before flying today to neighboring Latvia for the NATO summit in Riga. He will also deliver a speech at Latvia University.

It is the first NATO summit on the territory of the former Soviet Union.

Slouching Toward Riga (NYT)

The New York Times, November 28, 2006

When NATO leaders gather in Latvia this week, there will undoubtedly be a lot of grand talk about how the cold-war alliance has managed to elude irrelevance, bringing in new members, dispatching humanitarian aid and deploying peacekeepers beyond Europe's borders.

But the real issue before the annual summit meeting is that NATO is failing its most significant post-Soviet test: stabilizing Afghanistan. Violence is spiraling as the Taliban and Al Qaeda reassert their power. The economy is addicted to opium production. The pro-Western government in Kabul looks increasingly powerless and irrelevant.

Unless NATO's members commit to sending in more troops and more resources, Afghanistan could go the way of Iraq. There may not be many more chances after this week's meeting.

The current 32,000-member NATO force is too small. Some provinces — including those along the border with Pakistan, where the Taliban have their sanctuaries — have little or no allied presence.

Many of the participating countries have imposed "national caveats" limiting how their contingents fight. Some cannot patrol at night, some cannot leave their assigned area, and some cannot mount offensive operations. That makes it much harder for commanders to fight the enemy or even defend their forces, and it leads to an unfair division of labor. Canadian, Dutch, British and American forces in southern Afghanistan are doing most of the heavy fighting, while the French, Germans and Italians patrol relatively quiet northern regions.

In Riga, President Bush will urge more troops and fewer caveats. But the president can't do much more than cajole the allies. Iraq has deprived him of both international credibility and the military forces to do more. It is now up to the rest of the alliance. All NATO members must acknowledge that the Afghan war is not just some post-9/11 gesture, nor publicity for the New NATO. There is a life-and-death struggle under way against terrorists and extremism that is in all their national interests to win.

NATO And The Taliban (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

The NATO forces battling resurgent Taliban in southern Afghanistan call to mind the Normandy landing. Once again, mostly Canadian, British and American troops are fighting and dying. Most of the rest of Europe is absent from the fight, a fact sure to be discussed at the NATO summit this week.

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer is desperately seeking an additional 2,500 troops to suppress the Taliban. But with a few exceptions, such as the Dutch and Danes, most NATO members prefer the by now traditional division of labor: The Anglo-Saxons do the fighting while the others compete for popularity as armed aid workers.

The cover of last week's Der Spiegel magazine neatly captured the problem. "Germans Must Learn to Kill" read the headline above a picture of a German soldier in Afghanistan. The magazine wasn't advocating a more muscular German army. Rather, it was citing what American officials had told Karsten Voigt, Berlin's coordinator for U.S.-German relations.

The 2,900 German troops in Afghanistan are concentrated in the relatively safe north, focusing on reconstruction. France may withdraw its 200 special forces and opposes American plans for NATO to establish stronger links with like-minded countries outside the alliance. Most NATO members, including Italy, France and Spain, have placed absurd restrictions on their troops in Afghanistan. Some can operate only in certain (read: calm) regions; others won't fight in winter. These limits partly reflect the insufficient training and equipment of many European armies. While the U.S. spends about 4% of GDP on defense, the European average is half that.

Whatever the reason, this resistance to committing the troops and funds necessary to defeat the Taliban hardly matches the rhetorical commitment to the cause. The same NATO partners that refuse to provide adequate resources declare that losing Afghanistan is not an option. And right they are. If the Taliban are allowed to re-establish Afghanistan as global jihad's international headquarters, Europe would probably suffer more than the U.S. or Canada. The terrorists are opportunistic killers, attacking where there is the least resistance. Since September 11, they have failed to carry out another attack on U.S. soil. Scores have died in bomb attacks in Europe.

Afghanistan is both a test case for the West's resolve in the fight against Islamic terror and portent for the future of NATO. It is supposedly the "good" war, the multilateral war, the war that even the United Nations approved. If NATO can't muster the forces to defeat the remnants of al Qaeda's original state sponsor, what is it good for?

Afghan Opium Fight Hurts Poorest (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 28, 2006

U.S. and European efforts to end heroin production in Afghanistan have done little to hamper the drug industry and have hurt the country's poorest people, according to a new report by the United Nations and the World Bank.

The report, released today, is the latest indication of the difficulties faced by the British-led effort to eradicate Afghanistan's opium crop, which drives the economy in parts of the embattled nation and has helped to fund a resurgence of the Taliban. The report says the production of opium, whose poppies are used to make heroin, permeates daily life in Afghanistan and eliminating the illegal drug trade there could take decades.

The opium trade accounts for about $2.7 billion in Afghanistan's economy — equal to more than one-third of the nation's gross domestic product — and is responsible for thousands of jobs, the report says. The Taliban government, which had harbored al-Qaeda, virtually eliminated opium production in 2001, before U.S.-led forces toppled it. Production has soared since, even as the United States and its allies have stepped up efforts to kill fields of opium and persuade farmers to grow other crops.

Opium has remained the nation's most lucrative crop by far, and drug traffickers — through incentives and intimidation — have kept farmers in the opium business across Afghanistan, which the United Nations says produces about 87% of the world's opium. Last year, according to the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, Afghanistan produced 4,100 metric tons of opium, nearly as much as the biggest harvest in 1999. The United Nations predicts a record harvest in 2007.

Today's report describes how opium farmers' flexibility has helped harvests increase. When government officials end the opium trade in one province, opium brokers typically move cultivation and trade elsewhere, the report says.

Counter-narcotics efforts also have fueled corruption, the report says. Farmers who can afford it have bribed local officials to preserve opium crops, while the poorest farmers have been driven deeper into debt when their crops are destroyed, the report says. Investigators found several instances in which farmers planned to replant opium to pay their debts.

The report also says local government officials sometimes help drug lords drive competitors out of the market in exchange for a cut of the profits or protection payments.

Antonio Maria Costa of the U.N. Office of Drugs and Crime has recommended focusing agents on areas with less opium cultivation to keep such farming from spreading and help establish an alternative economy. The U.S. State Department's Anne Patterson, acknowledging “there is no silver bullet” to the opium problem, has said much of the growth in production is in areas with weak local governments.

Apology sought

DOJ_NMG_0098811

The national commander of the American Legion called on Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, to apologize for suggesting that American troops would not choose to fight in Iraq if they had other employment options.

"Our military is the most skilled, best-trained, all-volunteer force on the planet," National Commander Paul A. Morin said yesterday. "Like that recently espoused by Sen. John Kerry, Congressman Rangel's view of our troops couldn't be further from the truth and is possibly skewed by his political opposition to the war in Iraq."

According to Mr. Rangel, "If a young fellow has an option of having a decent career, or joining the Army to fight in Iraq, you can bet your life that he would not be in Iraq. If there's anyone who believes these youngsters want to fight, as the Pentagon and some generals have said, you can just forget about it. No bright young individual wants to fight just because of a bonus and just because of some educational benefits."

Mr. Rangel was responding to a question during an interview on "Fox News Sunday."

Narrow victory

Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce, Ohio Republican, won re-election yesterday by a margin so slim that a recount will be required.

Unofficial results announced by Franklin County, the last to finish counting absentee and provisional ballots in central Ohio's 15th District, showed Mrs. Pryce led Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy, a Franklin County commissioner, by 1,055 votes.

Mrs. Pryce lost Franklin County, the district's most populous, but she retained her lead thanks to votes she picked up in two other counties that announced results last week, Madison and Union, the Associated Press (AP) reports.

The race was one of a handful that had remained unresolved across the country since Election Day, when Democrats took control of Congress.

Mrs. Pryce ended up with 50.2 percent of the vote, compared with 49.8 percent for Mrs. Kilroy in the unofficial totals. An automatic recount is triggered if the difference between the two candidates is less than one-half of one percent.

Jersey barrier

Conservative groups in New Jersey are pushing a proposal that would grant the rights of marriage -- but not the title -- to homosexuals, siblings and others involved in domestic partnerships, the AP reports.

The plan comes in reaction to a state Supreme Court ruling last month that said same-sex couples in New Jersey should have the same rights and benefits as married couples. Whether to call those rights "marriages," civil unions or something else was left up to lawmakers.

Under the conservatives' plan, rights would be available to twosomes who are not eligible to marry, said Len Deo, president of the New Jersey Family Policy Council. Besides homosexuals, such couples would include blood relatives, or simply two unmarried friends of the same sex. Unrelated opposite-sex couples, who can legally marry, would not be eligible for the designation.

'Civil war' fight

NBC News yesterday began calling the Iraq conflict a "civil war," adopting a phrase that President Bush and many other news organizations have avoided, the AP reports.

Matt Lauer said on the "Today" show that "after careful consideration, NBC News has decided that a change in terminology is warranted, that the situation in Iraq with armed militarized factions fighting for their own political agendas can now be characterized as civil war."

The Bush administration said yesterday that it does not think Iraq is in a civil war, and that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki does not, either.

"You have not yet had a situation also where you have two clearly defined and opposing groups vying not only for power, but for territory," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "What you do have is sectarian violence that seems to be less aimed at gaining full control over an area than expressing differences, and also trying to destabilize a democracy."

StopHerNow.com

A Dallas businessman has launched a Web site with a single, simple objective: prevent Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton from becoming president.

DOJ_NMG_0098812

StopHerNow.com aims "to shed light on the REAL Hillary Clinton and the danger she and her ideas pose for America," proclaims the site created by Dick Collins, a Texas newspaper publisher and Republican activist.

The site features links to news articles and commentary about the former first lady, as well as a humorous animated series, "The Hillary Show."

The first installment of the cartoon series shows Mrs. Clinton sparring with potential 2008 rival Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. Mr. Collins says he hopes to continue the series with new episodes reflecting the latest news surrounding Mrs. Clinton's much-anticipated White House bid.

The cartoon was created by a group of artists who are "a bunch of libertarians, not really political, but they all dislike Hillary Clinton," Mr. Collins said.

"The Republican Party over the last couple of decades has had the problem of appearing to be a party of anger, and we wanted our effort to be ... one that would deliver a smile," Mr. Collins tells Robert Stacy McCain of The Washington Times.

Mr. Collins says the site is "a grass-roots effort to define Hillary Clinton. She's trying to be something that she's not. She's attempting to become a centrist Democrat, and in fact she's an ultraliberal Democrat."

Bad move, Alcee

When Rep. Alcee L. Hastings started naming names of his critics -- and lashing out at "anonymous bloggers" -- the Florida Democrat may have bit off more than he could chew.

"I hope that my fate is not determined by Newt Gingrich, Sean Hannity, Ann Coulter, Michelle Malkin, Michael Barone, [Matt] Drudge, anonymous bloggers, and other assorted misinformed fools," Mr. Hastings wrote last week in a five-page letter to House Democratic colleagues, seeking support for his bid to become chairman of the House intelligence committee.

"The letter may have done more harm than good to Hastings' cause, however, because Malkin answered in kind with a post that labeled Hastings a 'fool' and his letter to colleagues an 'unhinged rant,' " K. Daniel Glover wrote at National Journal's Web site (www.nationaljournal.com).

Mrs. Malkin's response to Mr. Hastings at michellemalkin.com "included plenty of background links on the Hastings bribery case and current criticisms of his leadership bid," Mr. Glover noted.

Other bloggers, not all of them conservatives, have joined in the anti-Hastings response, highlighting the facts of the former federal judge's 1988 impeachment and removal from office for bribery, including the names of prominent Democrats who condemned Mr. Hastings as guilty of corruption.

The public-relations debacle unleashed by Mr. Hastings' letter prompted Glenn Reynolds (www.instapundit.com) to observe that Mr. Hastings is "the perfect target for hostile bloggers -- a guy with a really lousy record who'd rather people didn't think about it, whose every complaint just provides an opportunity to remind people how lousy that record is."

U.S. Attorney Garcia Faces Tough Calls (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, November 28, 2006

Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia knew there would be some tough calls to make when he accepted an appointment to one of the most high-profile law enforcement jobs in the country.

Garcia, 45, was sworn in as U.S. Attorney on Sept. 6, 2005. During a little more than a year as the top federal prosecutor in Manhattan, he had to pull the plug on several celebrated cases to defend subordinates from almost unprecedented criticism over their handling of a non-prosecution agreement with KPMG.

But Garcia does not take refuge in the fact that the cases he has had to clean up were launched well before he took office last year.

"We don't measure the value of this office in terms of wins and losses," he said in a recent interview in his office at One St. Andrew's Plaza in lower Manhattan. "The value is in the type of cases we bring and the example we set for the rest of the country."

DOJ_NMG_0098813

Garcia said that the Southern District has always taken "hard cases, cutting edge cases," that come with some risk attached.

"We go in because we believe the case is strong and we do the right thing," he said. "We have some assistants saying 'I'm 11-0,' but what does that mean? A guy might be 5-5 but he's bringing very tough, important cases."

Garcia opted in August to avoid a retrial and reach a deferred prosecution agreement with former investment banking heavyweight Frank Quattrone on charges that he obstructed investigations into the process for allocating shares in initial public offerings while head of the Credit Suisse First Boston Technology Group.

Then, after a jury in September was unable to reach a verdict in the third racketeering trial against John Gotti Jr., Garcia announced it would not be in the interests of justice to pursue a fourth trial.

And last week, the office dismissed charges against five New York Stock Exchange specialists who were accused last year with defrauding customers of millions of dollars by exploiting their position as middlemen by trading ahead of buy and sell orders. Prosecutors previously had dropped charges in two other cases. They have obtained guilty pleas or verdicts from five specialists. Two other defendants have been acquitted at trial, and one case is pending.

While the Quattrone, Gotti and stock exchange cases received their share of media attention, they are far removed from the day-in, day-out work done by the office on issues including international narcotics trafficking, violent gang crimes, organized crime and white-collar cases such as stock fraud and market manipulation.

When Garcia took office, he emphasized his great respect for its traditions and national reputation, and said he had no intention of radically changing the way the office does business.

Garcia indicated he would pay particular attention to public corruption, announcing a higher profile in the district's northern counties by establishing a corruption hotline.

Last month, he announced the indictment of state Assemblyman Brian M. McLaughlin, a labor leader, for stealing, with others, more than $2 million from labor organizations, nonprofits and the state of New York.

Garcia has pressed the ongoing investigation into corruption in the United Nations sponsored "Oil-for-Food" program. The program, which was designed to mitigate the harm done to civilians in Iraq from international sanctions against the regime of Saddam Hussein, allegedly spawned a series of insider deals for connected businessmen and prominent public officials.

On Nov. 1, Garcia announced the indictment of Sanjaya Bahel, a former procurement agent at the United Nations, who allegedly received real estate in return for steering more than $50 million worth of United Nations' contracts to Nishan Kohli of Thunderbird Industries. Kohli was also charged in the scheme.

And Nov. 20, Garcia announced the indictment of Salvatore "Hot Dogs" Battaglia, president of the Local 1181 of the Amalgamated Transit Union on racketeering charges in connection with his status as a member and associate of the Genovese organized crime family.

DUAL USE TECHNOLOGY

The personnel of the office has remained relatively stable since Garcia took office.

But he has made some changes in the structure of the office, including breaking up the organized crime and terrorism unit into two distinct groups. Richard Daddario is chief of the organized crime unit.

The newly formed terrorism and national security unit, headed by Edward O'Callaghan and David Raskin, is charged with augmenting and supporting what Garcia said is primarily a military battle against terrorism.

The unit focuses on crimes such as immigration and document fraud, violations of trade sanctions regimes with outlaw nations, and, of particular interest to Garcia, enforcement of import-export restrictions on technology that has both a military and civilian use, such as machine tools that have a benign purpose but could be used in a nuclear program. Garcia had previously worked on the issue as an assistant secretary of commerce.

He has formed an "ad hoc working group" with his office, Commerce Department officials and his old organization within the Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Its efforts, he said, are geared toward "pro-active investigations."

"We might start to see some results soon in that area," he said. "It might not be a pipeline going directly to Hamas, but there is some stuff that is going into very sensitive areas, such as Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0098814

Garcia said he has made a priority of interagency cooperation, sending O'Callaghan and Raskin to regular morning meetings with their counterparts in other federal agencies to review the latest "real-time" intelligence on possible threats.

The meetings, he said, "send a great message to our law enforcement partners" and brings "focus" to the anti-terror efforts of prosecutors in New York and Washington D.C.

Other changes at the office this year included the departure of Richard Owens as chief of the securities and commodities fraud unit for a partnership in the New York office of Latham & Watkins. Owens' shoes were filled by David Esseks.

PROSECUTORS CRITICIZED

Garcia has faced major challenges stemming from his office's tactics in the KPMG case.

The criminal case, touted as the largest tax fraud prosecution in U.S. history, alleges that KPMG partners and employees sold illegal tax shelters to wealthy clients, costing the U.S. Treasury more than $2 billion in revenue. The government reached a non-prosecution agreement with the firm in August 2005 that had strings attached -- KPMG must provide real cooperation to prosecutors trying to win convictions against the former partners and employees.

But in June 2006, Southern District Judge Lewis Kaplan blasted the government for using its leverage over KPMG to force it to cap the payment of legal fees for ex-employees under investigation.

The judge said that, in following the guidelines for determining whether a company is cooperating fully with an investigation, outlined in the Justice Department's Thompson Memo, the government "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment," and violated the Fifth and Sixth amendments.

"KPMG refused to pay because the government held the proverbial gun to its head," he said.

Garcia jumped to the defense of his prosecutors.

"The actions of the government were entirely consistent with appropriate Justice Department policy, and we believe that the prosecutors acted ethically and properly throughout this case," he said in a statement following the decision.

Garcia declined to specifically discuss the KPMG case during a recent interview. But generally, he said, on one hand, he would not make it a point to just "sail into a dispute" with a federal judge and on the other, "I certainly don't want to see assistants criticized unfairly."

The case had forged an unusual set of bedfellows opposing the government, with the Chamber of Commerce and the Association of Corporate Counsel teaming up with the defense bar to fight the Thompson memo.

Veteran defense lawyer Gerald Lefcourt said the case has riveted the defense bar and that his colleagues were pleased to hear that top Justice Department officials are reconsidering some of the policies enshrined in the memo.

TOUGH APPROACH

Lefcourt said Garcia has reinforced what he called an increasingly harsh, or "Calvinistic" approach, to plea negotiations and charging decisions in the Southern District. One example was the recent attempt by the government to obtain a 30-year sentence for defense lawyer Lynne Stewart, who was convicted of providing material support for terrorism by helping the Islamic Group of Egypt send messages to and from its imprisoned spiritual leader, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman.

Judge John Koeltl opted instead to give Stewart 28 months in prison, which the defense attorney and her followers hailed as a victory outside of the courthouse at 500 Pearl Street.

Garcia laughed at the term "Calvinistic," and said his approach to charging decisions and plea negotiations is entirely consistent with past Southern District policy, a policy he said has a proven track record.

"This office, as much as any other, has traditions and has things that are tried and true and work," he said.

Garcia said the prosecution of Stewart, Mohamed Yousry, and Ahmed Abdel Sattar was "a complex trial that we got convictions on" -- an example of a cutting-edge prosecution that was risky and sent an important message.

His office is expected to appeal Koeltl's sentence of Stewart.

Lefcourt and other defense lawyers said of the few setbacks suffered by the office that Garcia "shouldn't be tagged with the problems people see."

"It's too early" to judge Garcia's performance to date, Lefcourt said. "The jury is still out."

U.S. Attorneys are appointed to four-year terms.

A graduate of Albany Law School, Garcia was an associate at Cahill, Gordon & Reindell and clerked for state Court of Appeals Judge Judith S. Kaye before joining the Manhattan U.S. Attorney's Office in 1992.

He served in the office for nine years, successfully prosecuting the defendants in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing case and the four defendants charged in the Osama bin Laden indictment for the bombing of two U.S. embassies in Africa.

He left the office in 2001 to become assistant secretary for export enforcement at the Department of Commerce and was named acting commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service in November 2002.

Following the reorganization that resulted in the Department of Homeland Security, he was named by President George W. Bush in March 2003 as assistant secretary for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a position he held until August 2005.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Affiliated Computer Ousts King, Edwards After Probe (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Benedikt Kammel

Bloomberg, November 28, 2006

Nov. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Affiliated Computer Services Inc., the world's biggest processor of student loans, ousted Chief Executive Officer Mark A. King and finance chief Warren D. Edwards after a probe showed that stock options were backdated.

King, 49, and Edwards quit yesterday after violating the company's code of ethics with options awards, according to a statement today. Chief Operating Officer Lynn Blodgett, 52, will become CEO and John Rexford, 49, will be chief financial officer.

The two managers at the Dallas-based company are among more than 60 executives that have left their jobs after investigations into whether options grants were backdated and compensation costs misreported. Options probes to see whether grants were retroactively dated to increase their value to executives and other recipients have affected at least 187 companies.

``Investors need to be on their guard" with companies that backdated options plans, said Pieter Wind, head of securities at ING Private Banking in Amsterdam, which oversees about $14.4 billion and doesn't hold stock in Affiliated Computer. ``We're not talking Enron here, but it makes you wonder if they did more to the expense of shareholders."

Shares of Affiliated Computer rose as much as 5.6 percent to $53.60, and traded at $52.46 as of 10:10 a.m. in New York. Before today, they had lost 14 percent this year.

`Intentional Misdating'

The Affiliated Computer managers ``used hindsight to select favorable grant dates" on options after Chairman Darwin Deason had authorized the issue of the option grants, the company said. Another unidentified manager was also aware of the ``intentional misdating" of the documents, Affiliated Computer said.

King and Edwards will no longer be entitled to their existing severance agreements and will have their salaries cut while they remain at Affiliated Computer in a transition period through June 30, 2007, the company said. The two executives will no longer be eligible for any bonus plans.

The incorrect accounting unearthed in the probe, which scrutinized option practices between 1994 and 2005, will lead to about $51 million in costs plus tax-related expenses, the company said. The sum may be higher or lower depending on the final outcome. Affiliated Computer said it has yet to determine whether it will need to restate earnings as a result of the adjustment.

``Neither Mr. King nor Mr. Edwards told the company's directors, outside counsel or independent accountants that the company's stock options were often granted by looking back and taking advantage of past low prices," Affiliated Computer said.

Delayed Earnings

Affiliated Computer had delayed its fiscal first-quarter earnings report because of the options grants. The company on Nov. 1 said earnings dropped 6.9 percent to 60 cents a share from 74 cents a year earlier, more than analysts had predicted, as sales advanced at the slowest pace in six quarters and new orders declined.

King's tenure as CEO only lasted for a little more than year. He was appointed in October 2005 to replace Jeff Rich, who had run the company since 1999. King, who was chief operating officer, was replaced by Blodgett at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0098816

Blodgett joined Affiliated Computer in 1996 after the company he founded, Unibase Technologies Inc., was acquired by ACS. Rexford joined the company the same year and was previously in charge of overseeing the mergers and acquisitions program at Affiliated Computer.

Multiple Probes

Affiliated Computer has been investigated on several occasions in recent years. In May this year, it said a current and a former employee may be charged with crimes uncovered in a Justice Department antitrust probe. In February 2004, the company said the SEC was investigating contracts in Florida, where the company has acknowledged employees manipulated wage rates and start-date information to make their performances look better.

In January 2004, a former vice president of Affiliated Computer was convicted on charges that he orchestrated a $3.8 million billing fraud.

More than 150 companies have disclosed internal or federal reviews of their options-granting practices to determine if they manipulated grant dates to enrich employees.

Brinkley Morse, the former CFO of Quest Software Inc. quit after refusing to answer questions about past option grants at the maker of database-management programs, the company said on Nov. 24. Property and casualty insurance seller HCC Insurance Holdings Inc. said on Nov. 17 that CEO Stephen L. Way and General counsel Chris L. Martin resigned after accountants found misdated options that may lead to restatements of as much as $37 million.

Affiliated Computer received a subpoena from the U.S. Attorney for New York's Southern District and an informal inquiry from the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, both concerning options grants.

Corporate In-house Lawyers No Longer Low-key And Low-paid (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, November 28, 2006

Becoming a corporate general counsel used to be something leading American lawyers did to slow down.

The jobs were considered relatively low-key, low-profile and low-paid, at least in comparison to a partner at a big law firm, and lawyers who went in-house often held their jobs until they retired or got bored.

Not any more. In the wake of the 2002-03 corporate scandals and the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate accountability law, general counsels are now central figures at most US companies, often reporting directly to the board and often appearing on the list of the five highest paid corporate officers.

The post has also become a much riskier assignment. In the past six months, 12 public companies have changed chief legal officers amid investigations into whether the firms illegally backdated stock options grants to pump up executive compensation.

Hewlett-Packard is also in the market for a lawyer to replace general counsel Ann Baskins, who resigned after the company's use of "pretexting" during an investigation of board leaks came to light.

"These positions are not for the faint-hearted," says Catherine Nathan, head of general counsel practice for search firm Spencer Stuart. "The whole environment has changed. Corporations are under a microscope. CEOs are under intense scrutiny and they rely heavily on their general counsels."

Between the departures over stock options and ordinary turnover, the American market for in-house lawyers is hopping, search firm executives say. In-demand candidates are fielding multiple inquiries and compensation packages are rising.

The average bonus for the nation's 100 highest-paid general counsels was $906,820 last year, up 16 per cent, and the average restricted stock grant was nearly $1m, up 35 per cent, according to a study of Securities and Exchange Commission filings by Corporate Counsel magazine.

When salaries were included, the total average package reached nearly $2.5m.

"I'm seeing a bit of sticker shock [at the size of the wage bills]," says June Eichbaum, senior partner at the search firm Heidrick & Struggles, which has been hired to fill at least four of the positions vacated in the options scandal.

"Historically, the general counsel was not thought of as a profit centre," she says, adding that the job had now become a critical business function.

DOJ_NMG_0098817

Worried boards are asking for candidates with a different set of skills than they did 15 years ago. Back then, companies wanted merger-and-acquisition experience and investment banking ties.

Now even companies not facing immediate regulatory problems want former prosecutors and SEC enforcement lawyers.

Search firms date the shift to the Enron and WorldCom scandals, which put corporate fraud on the public radar. Since then, Fortune 500 companies PepsiCo, Lockheed Martin, Boeing and Estée Lauder have all turned to lawyers with Justice Department experience.

"The board wants someone who can walk into the offices of the SEC and the justice department and know people there . . . someone who understands what the regulators care about today, not what they cared about 10 years ago," Ms Eichbaum says.

Today's boards are equally clear about what they do not want - anyone with ties to options backdating. With 160 companies enmeshed in the scandal, boards have become insistent that candidates are scandal-free.

"They have to have clean hands," says Martha Fay Africa, managing director of legal search firm Major, Lindsey & Africa. She says boards are asking: "How can we know that this person wasn't implicated?"

The new focus on regulatory issues dovetails with the on-the-job experience of in-house lawyers.

For the second year in a row, "keeping apprised of company activities that may have legal implications" has replaced "reducing outside legal spending" as the main concern of American in-house lawyers, with 86 per cent mentioning it in a survey for the Association of Corporate Counsel.

"With all of the international operations, they are really on call 24/7," says James Wilber, a leader of services to corporate law departments at Altman Weil, a consulting firm. "The pressure has increased significantly."

Date Set For Milberg Weiss Trial (WSJ)

By Andrew Simons

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- The trial of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, a prominent class-action law firm, and two of its top partners, will get under way here Jan. 8, 2008, a federal judge said at a hearing Monday.

The setting of the trial date came amid further questions from defense lawyers about whether government prosecutors would file additional indictments, a subject that has been a sticking point in setting a firm trial date.

Prosecutors had been aiming for a trial date in October 2007, while defendants were seeking a February 2008 setting.

Federal Judge John Walter started Monday's hearing suggesting an October trial date. Defense attorneys balked, saying that wasn't enough time to prepare for a case if more indictments were filed against Milberg Weiss.

"October is unrealistic to get this done in an orderly way," said Bill Taylor, the lead attorney for Milberg Weiss.

So far, the government's efforts to obtain further indictments have remained under seal at the request of prosecutors, and Judge Walter said at the hearing that the efforts were "a red herring" in the case.

In May, a federal grand jury here indicted the firm on fraud charges. According to the 20-count indictment, the firm paid plaintiffs millions of dollars in exchange for filing more than 150 lawsuits. Two of the firm's top partners, Steven Schulman and David Bershad, also were charged with participating in the alleged kickback scheme.

In addition, Seymour M. Lazar is accused of acting as a paid plaintiff in some of the firm's cases and Paul T. Selzer is charged with laundering money on Mr. Lazar's behalf.

The defendants have maintained their innocence.

At one point in Monday's hearing, government prosecutors said they would not add charges in the case if the trial date could be set in October. Defense attorneys shot back that the government could still pursue the charges later in a future case.

"Are we simply postponing allegations?" asked Mr. Taylor.

Judge Walter was critical of government prosecutors taking so long to investigate the case, as he had been at a hearing in September. "The problem is this continuing moving target," he told government prosecutors, in reference to more indictments.

Milberg Weiss has been one of the most aggressive law firms in the U.S., essentially pioneering the business of filing giant securities class-action lawsuits -- bringing together hundreds or thousands of investors into one big case against a corporation.

DOJ_NMG_0098818

The firm's lawyers have engineered $100 million-plus settlements against Prudential Insurance Co., Lucent Technologies Inc. and CVS Corp., among others. In cases such as these, shareholders typically sue a company claiming it misstated its finances.

Federal law prohibits lead plaintiffs from being paid more than other plaintiffs in securities class-action lawsuits (with some exceptions for incidental expenses). The government charged the firm, as well as Messrs. Bershad and Schulman, with multiple fraud counts.

The Deferred Prosecution Racket (WSJ)

By Richard A. Epstein

The Wall Street Journal, November 28, 2006

Corporations suffer a peculiar vulnerability. The rules of criminal liability allow federal and state prosecutors to unduly punish those corporations that fall within their crosshairs. But the recent emergence of deferred prosecution agreements (DPAs) to force major changes in corporate governance should give pause to even the most ardent populist.

A DPA is a provisional settlement of a criminal lawsuit whereby the prosecutor agrees to suspend -- but not to dismiss -- any prosecution in exchange for the corporation's promise to reform its internal operations in specified ways. A sensible settlement can split the difference, by having a defendant pay half the maximum fine or sentence. But with corporations they take on an entirely different -- and sinister -- complexion. * * *

The last thing a corporation fears (since it cannot be imprisoned) is the maximum fine from a successful criminal conviction. Rather, the deadly force of the DPA rests in a combination of two key factors: vicarious corporate criminal liability, and the collateral consequences of the initial indictment prior to, and independent of, any eventual conviction.

Vicarious liability, as first developed in tort law, allows innocent third parties to sue not only an individual wrongdoer for damages, but also his employer, so long as the wrongdoer's act is within the scope of his employment. In the context of tort law, this rule ensures funds for compensating innocent victims, while giving a firm the incentive to monitor its employees. Many judicial decisions have, however, unwisely imported this doctrine wholesale into the criminal arena -- allowing a corporation to be punished criminally for the actions of any midlevel or senior employee, even if the corporation neither authorized nor condoned the wrongful action.

Writing in January 2003, Larry Thompson, then deputy U.S. attorney general, exhorted federal prosecutors to use vicarious liability to extract favorable settlements to reform corporate defendants from the outside. The Thompson memorandum insisted that corporations receive a temporary reprieve only if they purge themselves of individual wrongdoers and agree to extensive government oversight to make them walk the straight and narrow path.

In pursuing Mr. Thompson's strategy, prosecutors face both a dilemma and an opportunity. Their only credible threat against a recalcitrant corporation is the criminal indictment -- yet simply filing an indictment triggers huge collateral repercussions sufficient to drive the firm out of business, as teams of state and federal regulators are now duty-bound to suspend the licenses and permits under which the corporation does business. Thus, the corporation that has strong protections against false convictions -- proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the elements of the crime, the ability to examine evidence or cross-examine witnesses -- is helpless to protect itself. A conviction carries at most a million-dollar fine, but simple indictment, which lies wholly within the prosecutor's discretion, imposes multibillion-dollar losses.

Faced with that kind of pressure, the indictment is all that matters. Yet given these weird incentives, DPAs no longer serve the public interest. The agreements often read like the confessions of a Stalinist purge trial, as battered corporations recant their past sins and submit to punishments wildly in excess of any underlying offense.

Evidence of the gravity of the situation is only a mouse-click away. In one such notable agreement, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey, Christopher J. Christie, put the screws to Bristol-Myers Squibb, which got into hot water because of a potential securities violation for inflating its quarterly earnings by a business practice known as channel stuffing. BMS told its distributors that they had to take into inventory large amounts of BMS products immediately, with the understanding that down the road they could return the excess for a refund. The alleged securities violation arises from the overstated earnings quarterly reports, without indication of any expected future write-offs.

The naïve reader might think that a DPA should prohibit the firm from engaging in future conduct of the sort that got it into hot water in the first place. But Mr. Christie had larger ambitions. The most striking evidence of the abuse of power is paragraph 20 of the agreement, which requires BMS to "endow a chair at Seton Hall University School of Law," Mr. Christie's alma mater, for teaching business ethics, a course that he himself could stand to take.

That mild government peccadillo is a mere prelude to the sterner stuff to come. BMS agreed not only to abide by the law and to purge its ranks of the parties responsible for the scheme, but also to exhibit "exemplary corporate citizenship." To that end, all its activities have been overseen by Mr. Christie's independent adviser, former federal district court judge Frederick B. Lacey, who has the power to attend all meetings and review all documents -- and to report his findings to Mr. Christie. BMS was ordered to restructure its internal operations and appoint a new chief compliance officer to assist Mr. Lacey. It also agreed to pay a $100 million fine and make contributions of $350 million to a fund for present and former shareholders.

All these key provisions flunk the most elementary standards of business rationality -- if the object of these DPAs is to restore the confidence of shareholders in the firm. How can any firm act decisively with a government mole in its midst? What other firm would seek to acquire BMS, knowing that they must thereby give Mr. Christie the keys to its boardroom? And what purpose do shareholder funds serve, other than to impose random transfers among shareholders?
